It was urged by the plaintiff that the defendant was guilty of negligence because it failed to provide proper rules for the conduct of its large and complicated business, in that it had no written or printed rule fixing the place in a train in which a crippled car should be put, or prohibiting car inspectors from riding upon a train while it was being run in upon the track for inspection. As the proper place in a train for a crippled car would depend upon the character of its injury, it would be impracticable to prescribe by a general rule the place in which all such cars should be placed. It appears to have been usual for the car inspectors to ride upon trains while being run in on the tracks for inspection, and that this, if not absolutely necessary, was a convenience to them in the prosecution of their work. We are of the opinion that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant in failing to provide rules.

Having found that the death of Shuster was not occasioned by any negligence for which the defendant is liable in this action, it is not necessary to consider whether there was contributory negligence on the part of Shuster. Nor is it necessary for us to consider the assignments of error relating to the rulings of the court below as to the admission and rejection of testimony, as this subject was not discussed in the argument before us, and none of said rulings appear to affect in any way the question as to the negligence of the defendant.

We are of the opinion that there was no evidence upon which the jury would have been justified in finding a verdict for the plaintiff, and that the jury were properly instructed to find for the defendant, and that the judgment below should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

LAYTON et al. v. JACOBS.

(Superior Court of Delaware. Sussex. April 8, 1904.)

1. WILLS—PROBATE—REVIEW—PARTIES.

When proceedings are taken, either on caveat or for review of the probate of a will, all the parties in interest must be in court either by citation or voluntary appearance.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 611.]

2. JUDGES — DISQUALIFICATION — RELATIONSHIP.

Where the register of wills with whom a petition for review was filed was the great-uncle of the wife of one of the petitioners for review, he was disqualified by relationship and interest to hear the petition.

Issue from the register of wills by Robert R. Layton and others against John T. Jacobs, as executor of Philip Richards, deceased. Remanded to the register of wills.

Argued before LORE, C. J., and SPRUANCE and BOYCE, JJ.

R. C. White, J. M. Richardson, C. W. Whiley, Jr., C. W. Cullen, and J. L. Cahall, for plaintiff. Charles M. Curtis and Herbert H. Ward, for Susan W. Davis, legatee.

The following motion to dismiss petition for review was made:

"Susan W. Davis, one of the legatees under the will of the said Philip Richards, deceased, and one of the parties interested, by her attorney specially appearing in this proceeding for the purpose, hereby moves the court to vacate and dismiss the petition for review of the said will and that the court decline to hear the issue heretofore sent to this court by the register of wills, for the following reasons, among others: (1) Because no citations were issued to the said Susan W. Davis and others interested under said will or to the other heirs at law of the said Philip Richards, deceased, who were not parties to said petition for review. (2) Because the register of wills waived a hearing of said petition for review without consent of all the parties interested. (3) Because the register of wills sent to this Superior Court an issue respecting said will without issuing citations to the parties interested, and without consent of all the parties interested, and without a hearing before the parties interested, and without affording any opportunity to the parties interested for a hearing before him. (4) Because the order made by the said register of wills on the 12th day of March, A. D. 1904, was in other respects informal, irregular, and erroneous."

LORE, C. J. The counsel for the heirs state that they now represent and did represent the respective heirs at law, except John T. Jacobs, at the time the caveat was filed. Mr. Jacobs is in court by the waiving of notice as executor, and it appears to us, from statements made here by counsel in open court, that all the parties who are interested are now in this court virtually, and have met this requirement of the statute. We therefore cannot grant your motion to remand the issue to the register. It is only fair to say that we think when proceedings are taken, either on a caveat or for a review, that at that time the parties must all be in court, either by citation or voluntarily (here they come in voluntarily); otherwise, there would be no end to interminable reviews, one after another. And it is therefore well enough for the parties to understand that

Mr. Curtis then made the following motion to remit the petition for review to the orphans' court:

"Susan W. Davis, residuary legatee under the will of Philip Richards, deceased, and one of the parties interested, by her attorney specially appearing in this proceeding for the purpose, hereby moves the court that the said petition for review and of record in this cause be certified and remitted by this court to the orphans' court of the state of Delaware in and for Sussex county, to be there heard by the judges thereof, instead of by the said register of wills, for the reason that there is a legal exception to the hearing of the said petition by the said Daniel J. Layton, as register of wills, who is interested in said cause by reason of his relation by consanguinity and affinity to some of the persons and parties interested, as appears by the affidavit herewith submitted, or that the said petition and record be certified and remitted by this court to the said Daniel J. Layton, register of wills, with an order that he proceed no further respecting said petition for review, but that he forthwith transmit said petition of record, with a certified copy of the order of this court, to the orphans' court of the state of Delaware in and for Sussex county, in order that the same may be heard."

Accompanying said motion was the following affidavit of Susan W. Davis, the residuary legatee: "That she had no notice or knowledge of the filing of said petition for review or the order made thereon by the register of wills prior to the making of said order and the sending of said issue to the said Superior Court, and that she did not attend before the register of wills at any time while said petition was pending before him. That only a part of the persons interested have joined in said petition for review, there being other persons who are heirs at law of the said Philip Richards, deceased, who did not join in said petition for review. That the said Daniel J. Layton, register of wills in and for Sussex county aforesaid, with whom said petition for review was filed and by whom the said order was made, is interested in said cause, being the great-uncle of Rachel Layton, the wife of Robert Reese Layton, one of the petitioners for review, and by reason of said relationship is interested in said cause and therefore disqualified to hear the said petition for review or make any order respecting the same."

In support thereof the following brief was filed:

A judge who is related in any degree by blood or affinity to a party of record is disqualified to hear the cause. Bayard v. McLane, 3 Har. 139; Moses v. Julian, 45 N. H. 52, 84 Am. Dec. 114. In Bayard v. McLane, there was an appeal from the Chancellor to the Court of Errors and Appeals, and in this latter court the judges were R. H. Bayard, C. J., and Judges Harrington, Layton, and Milligan. The Chief Justice was a party, and Judge Milligan was the brother-in-law or uncle of another party. The court was asked to certify to the Governor for appointment of a judge ad litem, and it was so ordered. Judge Harrington said: "The common law seems to have been very jealous on this subject and anxious to exclude the judge in any case where there was any degree of interest or relationship calculated to bias his judgment. It would be difficult and improper at present to lay down any general rule on the subject. The books do not announce any such rule; but those of high authority indirectly apply to it the same reasons that would operate as an objection to an arbitrator or constitute a ground of challenge to a jurymen."

The register of wills, at a hearing on a petition for review of a will, is both judge and jury, and the strict rule of disqualification of jurymen should be applied to him. The rule as to disqualification of jurymen in Delaware is very strict. State v. Williams, 9 Houst. 508-525, 18 Atl. 949; Armstrong v.

Timmons, 3 Har. 342; Robinson v. Wilmington, 8 Houst. 409, 32 Atl. 347. A person related by blood or marriage to the ninth degree to a party is disqualified to sit as a juror. State v. Williams, 9 Houst. 508-525, 18 Atl. 949. In Armstrong v. Timmons, 3 Har. 342, it was held: A cousin of one of the parties was disqualified; also another juror whose wife was a cousin to one of the parties; also a juror who was a cousin to a party in interest, though not a party on the record. In Robinson v. Wilmington, 8 Houst. 409, 32 Atl. 347, it was held that a taxpayer of the city was disqualified to sit as jurymen in a suit against city.

Affinity always arises by the marriage of one of the parties so related. A husband is related by affinity to all the consanguineal of his wife, and vice versa the wife to the husband's consanguineal; for, the husband and wife being considered one flesh, those who are related to the one by blood are related to the other by affinity." 1 Bl. Com. 435 (Christiana note 5). It seems that a statute was necessary to remove the disqualification of a taxable of the county as judge in any cause involving liability of the trustees of the poor in such county to support any poor person. Rev. Code 1852, amended in 1893, p. 379, c. 48, § 19.

Messrs. Cullen and White replied, contending that the mere relationship of the register of wills to one of the heirs was not such an "interest" as was contemplated by the Constitution.

LORE, C. J. The court are very clear in their judgment that under the constitutional provision Register Layton is disqualified to sit by reason of relationship and interest, and that the authority vests in the orphans' court to hear the petition for review.

The court thereupon made the following order: And now, to wit, this 8th day of April, A. D. 1904, a motion having been made to the court in behalf of John T. Jacobs, executor of Philip Richards, deceased, and Susan W. Davis, legatee and devisee under the last will and testament of said Philip Richards, deceased, that the record and issue heretofore certified to this court, in the above-stated cause, by Daniel J. Layton, Esq., the register of wills for the said county of Sussex, be remanded to the said register of wills by the order of this court; and it appearing to this court, by the affidavit of Susan W. Davis filed in this cause and by the admission in open court by counsel representing the petitioners in this cause and all of the heirs at law of the said Philip Richards, deceased, that the said Daniel J. Layton, said register of wills, is related by affinity within the fourth degree to Robert R. Layton, one of said petitioners in this cause (the said Robert R. Layton having intermarried with Rachel Layton, the grandniece of the said Daniel J. Layton, the said register of wills), it is considered, adjudged, and decreed by this court that the said Daniel J.

Layton, said register of wills, is under the Constitution and laws of this state, by reason of such interest and relationship, disqualified to take or have cognizance of the said petition for the review of the probate of the said last will and testament of said Philip Richards, deceased, mentioned in said record so certified by the said register of wills as aforesaid, and that said record and issue be forthwith remanded to the said Daniel J. Layton, the said register of wills."

McCARTER v. KETCHAM.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Nov. 28, 1905.)

1. CORPORATION—EXISTENCE—EVIDENCE.

Facts proved held to show the existence of a corporation de facto.

2. SAME—DISSOLUTION.

Where rights of third persons have arisen by reason of the acts of a corporation de facto, such corporation cannot be dissolved by any agreement or acts of the incorporators, so as to affect such rights.

3. SAME—ACTIONS ON SUBSCRIPTIONS.

The statute of limitations commences to run, as to unpaid subscriptions to the stock of a corporation which has become insolvent, after a call and assessment has been made for the amounts necessary to pay creditors.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Essex County.

Action by Thomas N. McCarter, Jr., receiver, against William S. Ketcham, Jr. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Frank E. Bradner and Chandler W. Riker, for plaintiff in error. James E. Howell, for defendant in error.

GARRETSON, J. On the 23d day of January, 1893, Edward S. Campfield, William S. Ketcham, William S. Ketcham, Jr., Frank D. Holloway, and George W. Ketcham signed the certificate of incorporation of the Clinton Hill Lumber & Manufacturing Company. The certificate set forth the name of the company; the place where the business of the company was to be carried on; the objects for which the company was formed, being to manufacture and sell sashes, doors, blinds, and all planing mill work and carpenters' supplies, and to buy and sell lumber; the total amount of capital stock, being $75,000, divided into 750 shares, of $100 each; the amount with which the company would commence business, being $40,500, being 405 shares, of $100 each; the names and residences of stockholders and the number of shares held by each, being 100 shares by each of the first four named above and 5 shares by George W. Ketcham; and the time of the existence of the company, 50 years. This certificate was filed in the Essex county clerk's office. The certificate was never filed in the office of the Secretary of State. On the same 23d day of January, the first meeting of the stockholders was held, at which a temporary chairman and secretary were elected. It was moved and carried that certificate of incorporation and waiver of notice of meeting be filed. By-laws were adopted and the original incorporators were elected directors. Upon the same day the directors met, William S. Ketcham was elected president, Edward S. Campfield vice president, F. D. Holloway secretary, and William S. Ketcham, Jr., treasurer. The oath of office was taken by the secretary. The treasurer was instructed to give bonds in $5,000 and procure necessary stationery. The fixing of the principal office was laid over for the present, and a bill of sale was made by F. D. Holloway, one of the incorporators, to the company; said bill of sale representing what Holloway owed William S. Ketcham, another incorporator, and the property so transferred to be paid for by the stock of the company to be issued to William S. Ketcham.

By the bill of sale, dated the same 23d of January, Frank D. Holloway, in consideration of $1 paid by the Clinton Hill Lumber & Manufacturing Company, stated to be a corporation of New Jersey, sold to the company the stock of lumber then in the hands of Frank D. Holloway & Co. or in course of shipment, also lease of premises corner Rose street and Jelliff avenue, buildings and improvements thereon, good will, accounts receivable, fixtures, and everything appertaining to the business of the said Frank D. Holloway & Co. On the 6th of February, 1893, a special meeting of the stockholders, called for 9 o'clock in the forenoon of that day, was adjourned to February 7th at 2 p. m. On the same 6th day of February, a special meeting of the directors was held, at which all were present except George W. Ketcham. The board of directors were authorized to call upon the stockholders for 40 per cent. of the amount subscribed to the stock of the company, to be paid into the treasury on or before Tuesday, February 7th, and certificates be issued therefor. The resignation of F. D. Holloway as secretary and director of the company was read and accepted. W. S. Ketcham, Jr., was elected secretary in place of Holloway, and the board adjourned until February 7th. On the same 6th of February a paper was signed by William S. Ketcham, Jr., treasurer, with the name of William S. Ketcham, president, to it, and with the seal of the company attached, which certifies that William S. Ketcham, Jr., is entitled to 40 shares of stock in the company. No payment was ever made on account of the stock subscription of William S. Ketcham, Jr.

On or about March 12, 1893, Holloway confessed judgment to Storeby, Sprague & Co., and also a judgment to the Cumberland Lumber Company. The consideration for these judgments was lumber sold to him prior to January 28, 1893. On March 16, 1893, these judgment creditors filed a bill in chancery against the Clinton Hill Lumber & Manufacturing Company, the object of which was to set aside the bill of sale made by Holloway to that corporation. That company filed an answer to the bill setting up an advance of moneys to Holloway by William S. Ketcham, Sr.; that Holloway's business was at a standstill for lack of capital to prosecute the same and pay the debts contracted by Holloway; that Holloway agreed a company should be formed with capital sufficient to carry on the business; that the corporation was formed and organized; that Holloway stated that all the assets of his business had been procured with moneys advanced to him by William S. Ketcham, and offered to convey all said business either to William S. Ketcham direct or to the defendant, and, if made to the defendant, that the defendant would issue to William S. Ketcham its stock for the value of the same as property purchased, and Ketcham agreed to accept the stock of the company for the same; that Holloway made the bill of sale and the company issued to Ketcham its certificate of capital stock in payment of the purchase price or value of the business and property; that the defendant attempted to take possession of the property. The answer denies that the transfer from Holloway to the company was without consideration, or was made by him to delay, defeat, and defraud Holloway's creditors. This answer had attached to it an affidavit of William S. Ketcham, Jr., in which he swears that he is the secretary of the Clinton Hill Lumber & Manufacturing Company, and as to the truth of the matter in the answer.

A final decree was made in this suit November 14, 1893, adjudging that the bill of sale be set aside as against the judgments and executions of the complainants; that Thomas N. McCarter, Jr., be appointed receiver to take possession of the property transferred by Holloway to the company by the bill of sale; that the defendant forthwith transfer to the receiver all the property as received from Holloway and convert the same into cash, to be applied to the payment of the complainant's judgments and report to the court; and, if sufficient was not realized to pay the amounts due the complainants, the receiver was given leave to apply to the court for further relief. An appeal from this decree was taken to the Court of Errors and Appeals and the decree affirmed. April 1, 1895, upon petition filed by the complainants, it was ordered that the defendant pay the complainants the amounts due on their judgments and that execution issue to levy and make said sums. Execution was issued and returned unsatisfied. April 9, 1895, the same complainants filed a bill against the Clinton Hill Lumber & Manufacturing Company, alleging that it was insolvent, and praying for the appointment of a receiver, and May 18, 1895, Thomas N. McCarter, Jr., was appointed receiver. The claims as above stated of the complainants against the defendant were presented to the receiver and by him allowed, and upon appeal to the Chancellor from his allowance the determination of the receiver was affirmed.

November 8, 1899, the receiver in the last suit presented a petition to the Chancellor asking the court to levy an assessment against the stockholders, or direct the receiver so to do, requiring them to pay to the receiver such amount of their unpaid subscription as might be necessary to pay the debts of the corporation, and that the receiver have leave to bring actions to recover the money assessed against the stockholders. June 9, 1903, it was ordered and decreed by the Chancellor that the receiver be and is directed and authorized to assess, call, and collect the sum of $6,344.97, with interest, from George W. Ketcham, George W. Ketcham, administrator of William S. Ketcham, Sr., and William S. Ketcham, out of their respective subscriptions as incorporators and stockholders of the Clinton Hill Lumber & Manufacturing Company, which have not been fully paid up (but not to exceed 60 per cent. thereof), and to enforce payment of such assessment and call by suit, if necessary, against each of the above-named delinquent subscribers and stockholders of the said corporation. July 17, 1903, the receiver gave notice to William S. Ketcham and George W. Ketcham, individually and as administrator of William S. Ketcham, Sr., that by virtue of a decree of the Court of Chancery of June 9, 1903, a copy of which was annexed to the notice, he (the receiver) did thereby levy an assessment upon them as original subscribers to the certificate of organization of the Clinton Hill Lumber & Manufacturing Company to raise and pay the sum of $6,344.97, with interest, and that the amounts levied and assessed separately were: William S. Ketcham, $3,095; George W. Ketcham, administrator, $3,095; and George W. Ketcham, $254.75. In said notice the receiver called upon the persons named to pay the same within 30 days, and, unless paid, he would bring suit.

In September, 1903, the receiver began suit against William S. Ketcham, in the Essex circuit court, alleging in his declaration the incorporation of the Clinton Hill Lumber & Manufacturing Company and the matters set out in the certificate of incorporation. He avers that the defendant subscribed for 100 shares of the capital stock, and agreed to pay therefor in cash at the par value whenever lawfully required, and that the defendant has not paid the amount of the subscription; that the corporation became involvent and the plaintiff was appointed receiver; that the Court of Chancery had authorized him to collect from the defendant and others, out of their subscriptions, an amount sufficient to pay claims which had been presented to the receiver; and that the plaintiff made an assessment against the defendant of the sum of $3,095, and notified him that he had levied the assessment, and by reason thereof the defendant became indebted to the plaintiff. To the declaration the defendant pleaded: (1) The general issue; (2) that the Clinton Hill Lumber & Manufacturing Company was never incorporated; (3) that the persons who had subscribed for stock of said alleged company agreed among themselves to cancel the subscription of the defendant; (4) the statute of limitations. Issue was joined on these pleas. Upon the trial of the cause the judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and judgment was thereupon entered.

The plaintiff in error seeks a reversal of that judgment chiefly upon the ground that the Clinton Hill Lumber & Manufacturing Company was never a corporation. It is not disputed that the incorporators signed the certificate of incorporation, which was in the form required by law; that the certificate was filed in the Essex county clerk's office; that the incorporators met, adopted by-laws, and elected a board of directors; that the directors met and elected officers; that the secretary took the oath of office; that the bond of the treasurer was fixed, and a bill of sale was made to the company of property of Holloway, and stock authorized to be issued to William S. Ketcham for the value of that property; that the board of directors was authorized to call upon the stockholders for 40 per cent. of the amount subscribed to the stock of the company; that the resignation of the secretary of the company was received, and a successor elected; that as a corporation it afterwards filed an answer to a bill of complaint filed to set aside the bill of sale which it had received from Holloway, and resisted the making of decree declaring that bill of sale a fraud upon Holloway's creditors. The company was a fully organized, active corporation de facto. It needed only the filing of its certificate in the office of the Secretary of State to be a corporation de jure. When the corporation purchased from Holloway property which Holloway's creditors might reach, the rights of outside persons intervened, and the original stockholders and incorporators could not end the corporation by agreement among themselves to abandon the enterprise or by destroying the certificate of incorporation. Bibb v. Hall, 101 Ala. 79, 14 South. 98; Aultman v. Waddle, 40 Kan. 195, 19 Pac. 730.

The original subscription for stock in the certificate of organization was liable to be paid immediately and as soon as call for the same was made. At the directors' meeting held February 6, 1903, a call for 40 per cent. of the amount subscribed to the stock was authorized. This amount then became due and payable, and left 60 per cent. subject to be called when required. When this was needed to pay creditors, and a call for that purpose was made, it then became due and payable, and the statute of limitations began to run from the time of such call. It could not be considered as payable until the creditors' claim had been established and it had been ascertained that the corporation had no assets outside of its stock subscriptions to pay that debt. In the present case the Court of Chancery, in the suit to set aside the bill of sale, established the judgment obtained by the complainants in that suit against Holloway as a debt of the corporation, and by the subsequent proceedings to declare the corporation insolvent ascertained that the only assets out of which that debt could be satisfied were the unpaid stock subscriptions, and then made call upon the subscribers to pay. Unpaid subscriptions to stock are assets, and, the corporation being insolvent, the existence of creditors subjects these liabilities to the rules applicable to funds held in trust, and statutes of limitations do not commence to run in respect to them until after a call and assessment has been made. Hawkins v. Glenn Trustee, 131 U. S. 334, 9 Sup. Ct. 739, 33 L. Ed. 184.

We find no error in the proceedings below, and the judgment is affirmed.

STATE v. ROSA.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Nov. 22, 1905.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—FORMER ACQUITTAL—DETERMINATION OF PLEA.

Ordinarily a plea of former acquittal raises an issue for the jury; but where, upon its face, it is insufficient in substance, it may be so adjudged on demurrer.

2. SAME—SUFFICIENCY OF PLEA.

A plea to an indictment for the murder of A. that defendant has been lawfully acquitted of the offense charged, in that he was previously indicted for the murder of B., who was shot at the same time and place and by the same person as A., and was tried and acquitted of the murder of B., the entire facts of the shooting of both A. and B. being presented and passed upon by the jury on the trial for the murder of B., and constituting one and the same offense, was obnoxious to demurrer, in that it failed to either allege or show that both homicides were produced by the same act.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 383, 407-409.]

3. HOMICIDE — EVIDENCE — THREATS — REMOTENESS.

In homicide, threats made by defendant about three weeks before the homicide were not too remote in time to be admissible.

4. SAME.

In homicide, where it appeared upon the trial that defendant, an Italian, had shot deceased and another, who were both Italians, statements made by defendant, previous to the homicide, that he had a grudge against a couple of his countrymen and was going to shoot them, were admissible; it being for the jury to determine whether the statements referred to the men actually killed or not.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 295.]

5. SAME—ADMISSIONS — STATEMENTS IN DEFENDANT'S PRESENCE.

In homicide, a conversation between witness and another, overheard by defendant, in which one of the parties narrated a statement which he said had been made to him by defendant as to what the latter would do in case he was convicted of murder, was competent.

6. SAME.

In homicide, a conversation containing a statement prejudicial to defendant, which took place immediately outside of the door of the room in which defendant was confined, was not rendered inadmissible because defendant made no reply thereto, and did not appear to the witness who was narrating the conversation to have been paying any attention to it; but whether defendant did hear the conversation, so as to render it competent evidence against him, was a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 898.]

7. CRIMINAL LAW—FORMER ACQUITTAL—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for killing A., the record of an acquittal of defendant on an indictment charging the killing of B., who was killed at the same time and by the same person as A., was properly excluded, in the absence of an accompanying offer to show that the same evidence was introduced on the trial for the killing of B. as on the trial for the killing of A.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 675.]

8. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS — CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

A charge in a criminal case that contradictory testimony of witnesses "must" be considered by the jury as affecting their credibility was properly excluded as invading the province of the jury.

9. SAME.

A charge in a criminal case that, if the testimony of a witness differed from testimony previously given by him on another occasion, it was the duty of the jury to consider that fact and to determine how his credibility was affected thereby, but that the mere fact that there was a discrepancy in the testimony of the witness on the two occasions did not justify the jury in immediately rejecting his evidence, and that they must consider the variance and determine whether it affected his credibility, was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1891, 1892.]

Error to Court of Oyer and Terminer, Bergen County.

Jerry Rosa was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

See 58 Atl. 1010.

Peter W. Stagg, for plaintiff in error.
Ernest Koester, for the State.

GUMMERE, C. J. The writ of error in this case brings up for review the conviction of Jerry Rosa upon an indictment charging him with the murder of one Demetrio Denofrio.

The first reason assigned for the setting aside of the conviction is that the trial court erred in ruling that a plea of autrefois ac- quit filed by the defendant did not set out the facts necessary to constitute that defense, and in sustaining the demurrer to that plea filed by the state. The plea was in the following words: "This defendant hereby pleads to the above indictment that he has been lawfully acquitted of the said offense charged in said indictment, in that he was heretofore, at the April term, 1904, lawfully indicted for the murder of one Benedetto Galante, who, by the evidence in said cause, was shot at the same time and place, by the same person, as Demetrio Denofrio, and that this defendant was tried at said April term, 1904, by a jury, and lawfully acquitted; and for that the entire facts of the shooting of both persons, Benedetto Galante and Demetrio Denofrio, were presented by the evidence before said jury, which was one and the same offense as charged by this indictment and passed upon by said jury. This defendant pleads that acquittal as a bar to the trial of this indictment." Ordinarily a plea of former acquittal raises an issue for the jury; but, where upon its face it is insufficient in substance, it may be so adjudged on demurrer. Commonwealth v. Bressant, 128 Mass. 246; Gormley v. State, 37 Ohio St. 120; Ency. Plead. & Prac. vol. 9, p. 640; Cyc. vol. 12, p. 368. The present plea, in our opinion, is manifestly insufficient in a substantial respect. Although it sets out that Galante was shot at the same time and place that Denofrio was, and that they were shot by the same person, it fails to allege or show that it was the same act which produced both homicides, and this is universally held to be the essential feature in a plea of this nature; for it is the character of the act, not the results which flow from it, which determines the question of the guilt or innocence of the person who does it. In State v. Cooper, 13 N. J. Law, 371, 25 Am. Dec. 490, a case of note in our reports upon this subject, it is said: "The writers concur in stating that these pleas 'must be upon a prosecution for the same identical act.'" And, although that case was decided over 70 years ago, an examination of the text-books, and of the later decisions bearing upon this point, will disclose no change or modification of this rule. It is not intended to intimate that a common-law plea of former acquittal is bad unless it expressly alleges that the indictment under which the acquittal was had, and that to which the plea is interposed, rest upon one and the same act. It is enough if from the facts set out in the plea such an inference necessarily follows. But no such conclusion necessarily follows from the facts set out in the pleading now under consideration. Circumstances may readily be imagined, not at all contradictory of the plea, under which the killing of Galante would have been justifiable, and that of Denofrio criminal; each resulting from a separate act. For instance, if Galante and Denofrio, being together, had met the defendant at night on the street (as was the fact), and Galante had attacked the defendant and attempted to rob him, Denofrio standing by and taking no part in the affair, but, on the contrary, remonstrating against it, and the defendant had, in resisting Galante, shot and killed him, his act would have been entirely justifiable (State v. Bonofiglio, 67 N. J. Law, 239, 52 Atl. 712, 54 Atl. 99, 91 Am. St. Rep. 423); but, if he had then immediately turned and shot and killed Denofrio, his act in doing so would have been criminal, unless Denofrio, notwithstanding his apparent opposition to his companion's act, was in reality a participator in it, aiding and abetting it, or, at least, unless the defendant had reasonable ground for so believing. In such a situation the "entire facts of the shooting of both persons" might justify an acquittal on the charge of feloniously killing the one, and a conviction on the charge of feloniously killing the other. As the plea does not show that the death of Galante and of Denofrio resulted from one and the same act of the defendant, we have not considered it necessary to decide the question whether an acquittal upon an indictment charging the felonious homicide of A. is a bar to a conviction upon an indictment charging the felonious homicide of B., when it is shown that the death of each was produced by the same act of the person indicted.

Other reasons, upon which the conviction before us is attacked, are rested upon alleged erroneous rulings of the trial court upon the admission and exclusion of evidence. It is first objected that the state was permitted to prove by two witnesses that the defendant, about three weeks before the homicide, exhibited a revolver to them, stating at the same time that there were a couple of his countrymen that he had a grudge in for, and that, if they bothered him, he was going to shoot them. The ground of objection is that the time of the making of the statement was "too remote" from the date of the homicide. and, further, that the defendant did not state that either of the two men against whom the threat was made was Denofrio. Why the time of making the statement was so remote as to render it incompetent we are not informed by counsel, nor are we able to perceive for ourselves. Nor do we consider that the failure of the defendant to disclose the identity of the two men against whom he had the grudge rendered the testimony incompetent. If, in fact, one of them was Denofrio, it is not denied that the evidence was competent. Whether or not such was the case was a matter of inference, to be drawn from the other facts proved; and the drawing of that inference was for the jury, not for the court.

The second objection to the admission of evidence was that the court permitted one Buonocore to relate a conversation had by him with one Conti, embodying a statement which Conti declared had been made to him by the defendant, as to what the latter would do in case he was convicted of the murder. The conversation was alleged to have taken place at the second-floor door of the jail in which the defendant was then confined. According to the story told by the witness, he himself was then standing just outside the door, and Conti and the defendant were standing right by him, just inside the door. There were a number of other Italians standing about the door at the time. On his cross-examination the witness stated that the defendant did not say anything in reply to Conti's statement, and that he (the defendant) was not paying any attention to what Conti was saying. The contention is that the court should have suppressed this conversation because it was manifest that the defendant did not hear it. That the evidence was competent, if the defendant heard the conversation, cannot be controverted. In Donnelly v. State, 26 N. J. Law, 601, this court thus declared the rule: "When a matter is stated in the presence of a person which injuriously affects his rights, and he understands it, the statement and his reply, or silence, are both admissible." Whether the defendant did hear the conversation, or not, was for the jury. He was in a position where he might have heard it. His failure to make any reply is not conclusive proof that he did not. Nor is the statement of the witness that the defendant was not paying any attention to what Conti said conclusive upon the point. It was merely his opinion, based upon his observation of the defendant at the time, and did not at all determine the fact. It was therefore proper to allow this evidence to go to the jury.

It is also contended that the trial court erred in excluding the record of the acquittal of the defendant on the indictment for the killing of Galante. The ground upon which this contention is rested is thus stated by counsel in his brief: "The defendant had a right to offer the record in evidence to show that he was not the person that killed Galante, and that proof would have corroborated the defendant's denial" that he was guilty of the charge upon which he was then being tried. The fallacy of this contention lies in the assumption that the record would have shown that the defendant had not killed Galante. It would only have shown that the evidence produced on the trial of that cause had failed to satisfy the jury that the defendant had feloniously taken the life of Galante. As we have already pointed out, the acquittal of itself constituted no bar to the conviction of the defendant for the wrongful killing of Denofrio. Whether it would have been evidential of his innocence of the latter offense, if it had been shown to have been rested upon precisely the same evidence as that produced upon his trial for that offense, is a question which the case before us does not present, for no offer was made to show that such was the fact. The only question which is now presented is whether the record of his acquittal of the one offense, without more, was evidential of his innocence of the other; and this question must be answered in the negative.

It is further argued that the conviction should be set aside for the refusal of the trial court to charge the following request, submitted on behalf of the defendant: "Where a witness, when testifying on a former occasion respecting the same interview to which his evidence on this trial is now directed, testifies differently, in an important incident, which he now narrates, that circumstances must be considered by the jury as affecting his credibility on the question as to whether they will believe the interview which he has testified to, notwithstanding any explanation which he may give for the discrepancy." This request, as submitted, was properly refused. Its vice lies in the proposition that such a variation in the testimony of a witness "must" be considered by the jury as affecting his credibility. The determination of the amount of credit to be given to a witness is peculiarly the province of the jury; and any attempt on the part of the court to invade that province, and to restrict the jury in that regard, would be highly improper. The court properly instructed the jury upon this matter that, if the testimony of a witness given on the trial differed from that given by him on another occasion, it was the duty of the jury to consider that fact, and to determine how his credibility was affected thereby, but that the mere fact that there was a difference in the testimony of the witness on the two occasions did not justify the jury in immediately rejecting his evidence, and that they must consider the variance, and determine whether his credibility was affected by the contradiction.

Other reasons assigned for the reversal of the conviction are directed at alleged errors existing in the charge of the court to the jury. Our examination of the charge leads us to the conclusion that the various instructions which have been made the subject of criticism by counsel contain no legal error. But one of these alleged errors presents a question of sufficient importance to require discussion. Among the witnesses produced upon the part of the state was one Michael Buckino, who was called to prove a confession of guilt made to him by the defendant. The testimony of this witness was that the defendant, while they were both inmates of the county jail, told him that he had shot both Galante and Denofrio; that at the time of the shooting he was in the company of a man known in the case as "Frank"; that he first shot Demetrio Denofrio and then Benedetto Galante; that then he "handed this revolver to Frank, and that Frank put this revolver in Denofrio's hind pocket." From other evidence in the case it had been made to appear that shortly after the shooting there was found in the coat pocket of Galante a five-chambered revolver, four of the chambers of which were loaded. A loose cartridge was also found in the pocket. The revolver carried a bullet of different size from that which produced Denofrio's death, and had no discharged cartridge in it. The court, in its charge, after speaking of the fact of the finding of this revolver upon the person of Galante, and pointing out the fact that it was impossible that this could have been the weapon with which the killing of Denofrio was done, referred to the bearing which these facts had upon the testimony of Buckino in these words: "The evidence of Buckino is that the defendant told him that he (the defendant) 'handed this revolver to Frank and Frank put this revolver in Denofrio's hind pocket.' This is the witness' statement of what the defendant told him, and the fact that the pistol could not have been the one with which the shooting was done cannot cast any discredit upon the witness' statement." The alleged error in this instruction is that it took from the jury the determination of the question whether the finding upon Galante of this pistol cast discredit upon the story told by the witness of the defendant's confession to him. It is difficult to perceive how the fact that a pistol which had not been discharged, and which could not have been used to produce Demetrio's death, had been found upon Galante, threw any discredit upon the statement of the witness that the defendant had told him that the pistol which he (defendant) had used had afterward been placed by Frank in Denofrio's hind pocket. But, assuming that it had a bearing upon the credibility of the witness, it seems to us that the language of the court, construed in connection with the rest of his charge upon this point (which is too voluminous to set out in full), was nothing more than an emphatic declaration of the court as to its own view of the effect of this fact upon the credibility of the witness, and not an instruction to the jury as to its legal effect thereon.

Finding no errors in any of the matters complained of, we conclude that the judgment under review should be affirmed.

STOVER v. HELLYER et al.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Nov. 20, 1905.)

MORTGAGES—LIEN—PRIORITIES—JUDGMENTS.

A mortgage made by a grantee of lands to the grantor thereof, and which recites that it is a purchase-money mortgage, and contains a clause that certain judgments against the grantee which are mentioned therein shall have priority in lien over the lien of the mortgage, is by such clause rendered subject to the lien of the judgments.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 35, Cent. Dig. Mortgages, § 312.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Court of Chancery.

Bill by Henry W. Stover against Josiah Hellyer and others. Judgment for defendants (59 Atl. 470), and complainant appeals. Affirmed.

B. W. Ellicott, for appellant. James Buchanan, for respondents.

FORT, J. The bill in this case is filed for the foreclosure of a mortgage and for an injunction to restrain the three defendants, who are the executors of the late Samuel K. Wilson, from further prosecuting a certain action of ejectment to recover the mortgaged premises pending the foreclosure. The executors of Samuel K. Wilson claim title to the property under a deed made by the sheriff of Mercer county upon a sale of the mortgaged premises under three separate judgments held by them against the defendant Hellyer, the mortgagor, and which judgments were so held at the time the mortgage was made, and which are expressly referred to in the mortgage. The facts as to the making of the mortgage, and the circumstances under which it was made, are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the learned Vice-Chancellor in the court below.

There is, as it seems to us, but a single question for decision, viz., does the complainant's mortgage, which is concededly a purchase-money mortgage by its terms, give priority of lien upon the mortgaged premises to the Wilson judgments over the mortgage itself? The mortgage contains this clause: "It is understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that the lien of three judgments recovered in the New Jersey Supreme Court against said Josiah Hellyer and now held by Samuel K. Wilson shall have priority over the lien of this mortgage, together with all and singular the profits, privileges and advantages, with the appurtenances to the same belonging or in any wise appertaining." Upon the margin of the mortgage, after the above clause and near the end of the mortgage, this clause is written, viz.: "It is hereby understood by the parties herein interested that this mortgage is given to secure so much of the purchase money." This latter clause was inserted in the mortgage at the time it was executed upon the requirement of the mortgagee. Such at least is the proof. Both these clauses appearing, it is the duty of the court, if it can do so, to so construe the mortgage that both may stand.

In my view the mortgage is upon its face free from ambiguity. Both these clauses can be given full force without producing conflict or uncertainty. The clause above quoted, giving priority to the Wilson judgments over the lien of the mortgage, is too clear for construction. There is no contention that, if it stood alone in the mortgage, it would not give the judgments priority. Does the inserted clause, declaring the mortgage to be a purchase-money mortgage, nullify the priority given the Wilson judgments?

We are unable to so construe it. It seems to us that the two clauses may stand together in the mortgage and both be enforced. Where the parties have expressed the agreement in plain words, there is nothing to construe, and the only thing the court can do is to enforce the agreement. Bower v. Hadden Blue Stone Co., 30 N. J. Eq. 171. A mortgage may well be a purchase-money mortgage and be by agreement postponed in priority to other liens. The statement that it is a purchase-money mortgage is merely the statement of a fact. Whether the ordinary consequence shall follow from that fact may be regulated by agreement. Here it is done by the plain terms of the mortgage itself. There is no difficulty to give force to both clauses so that both may stand. By its terms the mortgage is a purchase-money mortgage, but expressly made subject to the lien of the Wilson judgments.

We have not considered the other questions raised or passed upon in the opinion below. On the ground here stated, we think the decree of the Court of Chancery should be affirmed.

MOORE et al. v. GALUPO.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Dec. 5, 1905.)

APPEAL—DISMISSAL.

Where, since decree for defendant in an action to compel performance of a contract to purchase real estate, the complainant has so altered the condition of the real estate as to make it impossible to enforce the contract, this is not cause for dismissing complainant's appeal; the proper practice being to present that fact by bill of review in case the judgment is reversed.

Action by Samuel W. Moore and others against Joseph Galupo. From a decree dismissing the bill, plaintiffs appeal. Heard on motion to dismiss appeal. Denied.

See 55 Atl. 628.

Clarence L. Cole, for the motion. Joseph H. Gaskill, opposed.

PER CURIAM. On a verified petition of respondent, setting out that the bill (which by the decree appealed from, was dismissed) sought to compel respondent to perform an alleged contract to purchase certain real estate, and that since decree, appellant has so altered the condition of the real estate as to make it impossible or inequitable to enforce the contract, it was prayed that this court would allow a rule on appellant to show cause why the appeal should not be dismissed for that reason.

If the appeal goes to hearing and is decided in favor of petitioner, the matter will be entirely disposed of. If the decree below should, however, be reversed, and a decree requiring performance be made, petitioner, if entitled to it, can obtain the relief he now seeks by a bill of review upon the newly discovered matter. Norris v. Le Neve, 3 Atk. 26; Story, Eq. Pl. pp. 404, 408; 2 Daniell, Chan. Pl. & Pr. 1637; Mitford, Pl. 79. While a bill of review for such a cause can only be filed by leave of the court, such leave will doubtless be obtained, if respondent's petition here correctly states the facts. There may occur cases in which, to prevent injustice, this court will intervene and determine questions of fact affecting the status of an appeal. But such intervention should be necessary to prevent injustice, and not be resorted to for the mere convenience of the respondent. Where an order denying a preliminary injunction against the execution and delivery of a lease was appealed from, this court, after allowing and discharging a rule to show cause why the appeal should not be dismissed, because the lease had been actually executed and delivered, proceeded to hear and determine the appeal, and reversed the order appealed from, and remitted the cause, with direction that the injunction issue "unless it appears by such proceedings as may properly be taken in the court below that some essential change * * * has taken place in the status of the case by reason of which the equities are changed," etc. Black v. Del. & Raritan Canal Co., 24 N. J. Eq. 455, 483. It appears by the dissenting opinion of Beasley, C. J. (page 488), that the court decided not to admit evidence in proof of extrinsic facts, by which he evidently meant the fact that the lease had in truth been executed and delivered, so that an injunction against its execution would be a mere brutum fulmen. The court in that case laid down the practice that must be followed in this case. Although the respondent there placed before the court facts which, if established by proof, would render the appeal of no avail, the proposition to investigate was not adopted, but refused. The appeal was heard and decided, and obviously the refusal to admit the proof, and the proceeding to hear the appeal, went on the ground that the relief which might be appropriate could more properly be granted in the court below.

This is the situation of the case before us, and, for the reasons above mentioned, the motion is denied.

VINCENT v. VINCENT et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 16, 1906.)

1. WILLS—PROBATE—JURISDICTION.

Since the orphans' court has exclusive jurisdiction of the probate of a will, and has the power generally to revise proceedings for probate tainted with mistake, fraud, or illegality, a court of equity will not entertain jurisdiction to set aside a will or the probate thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 543.]

2. COURTS—COURT OF GENERAL JURISDICTION.

The orphans' court is a superior court of general jurisdiction, and has the same authority over its decrees by inquiring into the authority of its attorneys to appear as may be exercised by any court of general jurisdiction.

Suit by Harry J. Vincent against Amella Vincent and others. Heard on demurrer to bill. Sustained.

Jerome D. Gedney, for complainant. Howe & Davis, for demurrants.

EMERY, V. C. The bill demurred to discloses this case: Thomas Vincent died on February 18, 1904, seised and possessed of considerable real and personal estate, leaving a widow and, as heirs at law and next of kin, four sons, three daughters, and two infant children of a deceased son. After his death a paper writing, purporting to be his will, was offered for probate to the surrogate of Essex county. No caveat appears to have been filed, but on account of the appearance of the paper itself (its informality, interlineations, changes, and erasures, and its lack of an attestation clause), the surrogate declined to admit the writing to probate, and on March 2, 1904, issued citations to the widow and all of the next of kin to appear before the orphans' court on March 12, 1904, in the matter of the probate. The statute (orphans' court act [Rev. 1898, § 13; P. L. p. 718]) directs that "in case doubts arise on the face of the will, the surrogate shall not act in the premises, but issue citations to all persons concerned, to appear before the orphans' court of the county, which court shall hear and determine the matters in controversy." Complainant signed a paper authorizing by name a proctor of the court to acknowledge service of the citation on his behalf, and due service was acknowledged by the proctor on March 4, 1904, by indorsement in writing upon the citation. The authority to acknowledge service was filed in the surrogate's office. The paper offered as decedent's will was admitted to probate by the orphans' court on March 15, 1904, three days subsequent to the return day of the citation and letters testamentary were issued to the widow and two of the brothers of complainant, the executors named in the will. They have taken possession of the estate, filed an inventory (alleged in the bill to be below the value of the property), and are proceeding under the will to sell and dispose of the personal estate and the real estate not specially bequeathed.

The bill alleges that this paper authorizing the proctor to acknowledge service of the citation, was signed at the request of one Teed, and under false representations by him that it was a paper of a different character, and for an entirely different purpose, viz., an application to have the widow appointed guardian of one of the daughters, who was non compos mentis, and that if not signed by complainant the court would appoint a stranger as guardian; that complainant, being willing to do this, and being unacquainted with business or legal matters, signed the paper, supposing it was for this purpose, relying on Teed's representations, and without consultation or advice. Complainant himself never employed or retained the proctor. He alleges that by reason of these false representations, the proctor's acknowledgment of service was unauthorized, that he was never served with the citation, did not appear at the return thereof, and knew nothing of the proceedings for probate, and has been deprived of his day in court in reference to the probate. He prays that the probate may therefore be set aside as to him. The bill further alleges that Teed had been a bookkeeper employed by the deceased, and that at the time of procuring complainant's signature, he was in the employment of the sons of decedent, who had been connected with their father in the business, and were still continuing it, but beyond this does not disclose any connection between Teed and the executors, who are the widow and two sons, Charles and Edward, nor charge that they are in any way parties to Teed's misrepresentation, nor does it charge that the proctor had any knowledge or information of the misrepresentation. Neither does it allege that the paper was not the will of deceased, nor that on the proofs submitted the will should not have been submitted to probate. The whole case stated by the bill, and the relief asked, extends only to controlling the effect of the probate itself.

The probate of a will, so far as the personal estate is concerned, is a proceeding in rem, in the strict sense of that term, and within the exclusive jurisdiction of the orphans' court. Quidort's Adm'r v. Pergeaux, 18 N. J. Eq. 472, 477 (Zabriskie, Ch.; 1867). For this reason, and the further reason that courts invested with jurisdiction for probate have generally power to check and revise proceedings for probate tainted with mistake, fraud, or illegality, a court of equity will not entertain jurisdiction to set aside a will or the probate thereof. Broderick's Will (1874; Bradley, J.) 21 Wall. 503, 509-512, 22 L. Ed. 599. This court can neither review the proceedings of the orphans' court, nor revoke the probate, nor decree intestacy. For fraud in the proceedings for probate which the probate court has no power to reach, it was held in a case before Lord Hardwicke, that this court may afford a remedy under its general jurisdiction for fraud, but this remedy is only by a decree which will compel the parties who have fraudulently procured the probate, to consent that proper proceedings may be taken in the probate court upon another application for probate, and this remedy was given only because the fraud in the probate proceedings was of such a character that the ecclesiastical court could not give relief. Barnesley v. Powell, 1 Vesey, Sr. 284 (1749). This decision was based on a supposed lack of power in the ecclesiastical court in England to set aside a deed consenting to the probate, and was, as Mr. Justice Bradley says, altogether exceptional. It is not authority for an exercise of the jurisdiction, where the fraud alleged relates to the action of an officer of the court in the court of the proceedings. Where the fraud in the probate proceedings is such that a probate court itself has power to give relief, this court should not undertake to control the decree for probate, by directing consent to another probate. It is settled under our decisions that the orphans' court is a superior court of general jurisdiction in probate and other special cases, not an inferior court of limited or special jurisdiction. Hess v. Cole, 23 N. J. Law, 116 (Sup. Ct. 1851); Plume v. Howard Savings Inst., 46 N. J. Law, 211, 228 (Sup. Ct. 1884); Clark v. Costello, 59 N. J. Law, 234, 237, 36 Atl. 271. (Err. & App. 1896). Where a decree is entered in this court against a defendant on an unauthorized appearance of a solicitor, the decree will be set aside as against the defendant on motion (Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Pinner, 43 N. J. Eq. 52, 10 Atl. 184 [Van Fleet, V. C.; 1887]), and the same control over its judgments or decrees by inquiring into the authority of its attorneys to appear, may be exercised by every court of general jurisdiction. In the case (In re Myers' Estate [N. J. Prerog.] 59 Atl. 259 [Magie, Ordinary; 1904]), the probate of a will was set aside by the orphans' court, on an application by petition made nearly six years after the probate, one of the grounds being fraud in procuring the abandonment of contest of probate by caveators. The ordinary, on appeal, considered and determined the question of alleged fraud in the proceedings, reaching a conclusion in favor of the probate, and also denying the application, because of laches. But the right of the orphans' court and of the ordinary on appeal to pass upon the question of vacating the probate because of fraud in the proceedings, was acted on without question, and this was in line with the view expressed by Green, J., in Ryno's Ex'r v. Ryno's Adm'r, 27 N. J. Eq. 522, 525 (Err. & App. 1875), that if the probate of a will is irregular or voidable for any cause, the remedy is by appeal to the ordinary or by proceeding for the revocation of the letters. In Clement's Appeal, 25 N. J. Eq. 508 (1874; Runyon, Ordinary) an order of the orphans' court revoking letters of guardianship obtained through false representations, was sustained on appeal, and the power of the court to guard against frauds perpetrated on the court itself, was held to be sustained by the authorities.

The decree for probate, as a proceeding in rem, binds all the world, and must either stand or be revoked in toto, and any decree in this suit (brought only to revoke the probate) that the authorization of the proctor was procured by fraud on defendant, would be of no practical effect, except as incidental to a proceeding to revoke the probate and for a reprobate of the will before the orphans' court or the ordinary. If complainant has any relief in equity against the alleged fraud, it can only be for the reason that the orphans' court has no power to revoke the probate, and it is essential that complainant should show this lack of power, either by an application to that court in this case and its denial of its power, or by decisions in other cases, establishing this lack of power. No application appears to have been made to the orphans' court to revoke the probate and for a reprobate, nor does it appear that any such application is proposed. Nor has any decision been referred to showing the lack of power in the orphans' court. Until this does appear, this court should not exercise a jurisdiction over the decree, which can only be ancillary in its character, and which is, or at least may be, altogether unnecessary.

I should say, further, that if the jurisdiction of the court is to be exercised to relieve against alleged frauds of this character in the probate proceedings, this bill fails to disclose a case which entitles complainant to a personal decree against any of the defendants, based on any inequitable or unconscientious conduct. It fails to allege any facts showing on the part of any of the defendants any connection with or responsibility for the misrepresentations of Teed, or any knowledge thereof by them or their solicitor at the time of the probate, and is therefore defective. Kinney v. Emery, 38 N. J. Eq. 101 (1884; Runyon, Ch.). But the question of exercising the jurisdiction has been raised, and without passing on this aspect of the case I will advise a decree sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill without prejudice.

In re ELLIS.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 10, 1906.)

INSANE PERSONS—SUPERSEDING INQUISITION.

An order superseding an inquisition in lunacy will not be granted, where the proceedings sought to be superseded merely adjudged the person insane and directed his commitment to an insane asylum, without affecting his property rights.

In the matter of William B. Ellis, an alleged lunatic. On application to supersede proceedings in lunacy. Dismissed.

Joseph Callahan, for petitioner.

EMERY, V. C. On an application made to the Supreme Court of the state of New York, in and for the county of New York, for the commitment of petitioner as an insane person, an order was made by said court, on May 20, 1903, which adjudged petitioner insane and directed his commitment to a hospital for the insane in that state. Petitioner never was in fact committed, having escaped. He now resides in New Jersey, and applies to this court for an order in the nature of an order under our practice superseding the inquisition in lunacy. Orders of this character superseding the inquisition in lunacy and directing restoration of the lunatic's property are appropriate only when the proceedings against the lunatic are such as to divest him of the title to his property, or to form the basis of proceedings for that purpose. The proceeding in New York was not of this character. It was a statutory proceeding on the petition of the commissioner of charities for the sole purpose of securing the custody of his person in an asylum, and had no effect whatever on his property rights. The proceedings would not, in my judgment, be admissible in evidence against the lunatic, should the question of title to his property come in question. Leggate v. Clark (1873) 111 Mass. 308, 310. In this case an order of commitment to an asylum as an insane person, under statutory proceedings, was held not to be admissible as evidence. In a suit involving title to the alleged lunatic's rights, on the question of his capacity to transact business.

The application will therefore be dismissed.

PERRINE v. PENNSYLVANIA R. CO.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey. Nov. 18, 1904.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—RIGHT OF WAY—CONSTRUCTION.

Where a railroad company constructed a fill over a water course, it was bound to learn all the conditions as to the character of the stream, how it had been affected by previous rainstorms, etc., and to provide a suitable culvert to carry off the water; but no such duty rested on an upper riparian property owner, who might be injured by water turned back on his premises, because of such insufficient culvert, so as to prevent recovery for such injuries, where he failed to see that the culvert was of adequate size.

2. SAME—PROPERTY OWNER—INFORMATION—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where plaintiff's property was injured by water of a stream flowing back on his land because of an insufficient railroad culvert, the fact that plaintiff had erected his grain stacks on a knoll, which he had never known to be covered by water, did not raise a conclusive presumption that defendant railroad company, with the knowledge it should have obtained concerning the stream, should not have reasonably anticipated that this fill, as constructed, would be likely to flood the knoll.

Error to Supreme Court.

Action by Charles H. Perrine against the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff (61 Atl. 87), defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Alan H. Strong, for plaintiff in error. Theodore B. Booraem, for defendant in error.

REED, J. The defendant in error, Perrine, sued the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to recover the damages resulting to him from backwater in Indian Run, a stream which flowed through Perrine's land. The railroad company had dammed this stream, and had placed a culvert to carry through the embankment the water flowing in Indian Run. The plaintiff's case was rested upon the insistence that this culvert was insufficient in size and defective in structure, and that because of this the water of the creek was held back and flooded plaintiff's land. The jury so found.

The single ground assigned for the reversal of the judgment entered upon this verdict is that the trial justice permitted the jury, in estimating the damages, to include the injury caused to five stacks of wheat belonging to the plaintiff below. These stacks had been placed on a knoll about 18 inches higher than the surrounding land of the plaintiff. The request to charge was that the defendant was not liable for injury to these wheat stacks, which stood upon ground which never before was covered by water. The trial justice refused this request, but charged that if the wheat was damaged because of the smallness of the culvert—smaller than the defendant should have anticipated the needs to be—and the backwater came, and the wheat was flooded and injured as a result thereof, then he may recover what you think is proper to be allowed for that. The argument in support of this request to charge is rested upon the admission of the plaintiff, upon cross-examination, that he thought his wheat was perfectly safe on the knoll, and that he had never known that knoll to be covered by water. The argument drawn from this testimony by the counsel for the plaintiff in error is that, if the plaintiff below had no reason to anticipate that these stacks would be flooded by the insufficient culvert, the defendant could have had no reason to anticipate it. In the language of his brief, "each party had precisely the same means of gauging whether such a storm would occur, and, if so, whether the culvert would or would not prove adequate to keep the water from the wheat stacks."

This proposition assumed, first, that the knowledge of both parties was the same; secondly, that what each was bound to know was the same; and, thirdly, that each must be conclusively presumed to have drawn the same conclusions therefrom. Now, firstly, it does not appear what the defendant knew when it built the culvert or thereafter; and as to the plaintiff it only appears that he did not know that the knoll had ever been flooded during the 18 years which had passed since the culvert was constructed. Whether it had been flooded does not appear. Secondly, there was a duty imposed upon the defendant to learn all the conditions which it reasonably could to enable it to build a safe culvert. It was its duty, when damming the run, to ascertain the character of the stream; how it was fed; how it had been affected by previous rainstorms, or was, from its topographical position, likely to be affected by floods from future rainfalls and thaws. Then it was its duty, through its engineers, to calculate the space required to carry any volume of water which could be reasonably anticipated, and then to construct a culvert with a capacity and of a design calculated to accomplish this purpose. But no duty rested upon the plaintiff to collect this information, or to make calculations, or to see that the culvert, as built, was adequate in size or correct in construction. Then, thirdly, because the plaintiff thought the knoll safe from backwater is no conclusive proof that the defendant should not have reasonably concluded otherwise. The plaintiff's opinion of the safety of the knoll was of no more importance than that of any other witness with his information and judgment. It raised no conclusive presumption that the defendant, with the knowledge it should have had, could not have reasonably anticipated that the structure, as built, would be likely to flood the knoll. The request was properly refused.

The judgment should be affirmed.

HARRIS v. HARRIS.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 12, 1906.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—BILL FOR SEPARATE MAINTENANCE — COSTS.

Under P. L. 1902, pp. 508, 509, §§ 20, 21, authorizing suit by a wife for separate maintenance, and making it lawful to order a bond for such costs as may be awarded to the defendant, where there were no circumstances tending to justify such a suit, costs may be decreed against the wife.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 28, Cent. Dig. Husband and Wife, § 1099.]

Bill by Louisa Harris against Daniel Harris for alimony. On application to have costs decreed against defendant. Denied.

S. G. Narr, for complainant. A. H. Swackhamer, for defendant.

BERGEN, V. C. The complainant's bill having been dismissed after answer, hearing, and argument, upon the ground that she failed to make a case which justified her in leaving her husband's house and entitling her to support and maintenance in a home she had set up apart from that which her husband had provided, she now applies to have the costs which she incurred, as well as a counsel fee, decreed to be paid by her husband as a part of the final decree dismissing her bill of complaint. In support of this application, reputable authorities were cited sustaining the doctrine that, even where the misconduct of the wife warrants a decree of divorce against her, still circumstances may exist which would justify the awarding of costs against the husband. Assuming, without conceding, the correctness of this proposition, it would not avail this complainant; for, with the merits of the case against her, there was not disclosed a single circumstance which justified her in leaving her home or warranted her suit for alimony. Costs and counsel fees in divorce cases are not allowed as a matter of right, and awarding them is usually within the discretion of the court, and I am unable to discover any just cause for the favorable exercise of that discretion in this complainant's behalf.

In addition to the general rule on this subject, we are governed in this state by "An act providing for divorces and for decrees of nullity of marriage and for alimony and the maintenance of children." P. L. 1902, p. 502. Sections 20 and 21 of that act relate to the awarding of suitable support and maintenance to be provided by the husband for his wife, and it is under section 20 that this cause was instituted. It provides that in case a husband shall, without justifiable cause, abandon or separate himself from his wife, and refuse or neglect to maintain and provide for her, this court may decree a suitable maintenance to be paid by the husband for the wife, and empowers the court to enforce such a decree. This section of the act confers upon this court the only jurisdiction it has over cases of this character. Margarum v. Margarum, 57 N. J. Eq. 249, 41 Atl. 357. Section 21 makes it lawful for the chancellor, upon a proper application, to order a bond to be given with sureties conditioned to pay such costs as shall or may be awarded by the court to be paid to the defendant. While it has been doubted whether this section is imperative (Ballentine v. Ballentine, 5 N. J. Eq. 519), and so far as I am able to ascertain has seldom if ever been applied, I can see no reason why it may not in many cases be justly invoked, and it certainly discloses a legislative intent to provide the court with power to decree, in a proper case the payment of costs by the wife, to her husband, and to secure the payment thereof by exacting a bond.

My conclusion is that where a wife files a bill for alimony against her husband, without being able to prove the facts upon which the jurisdiction of the court must rest, it is a wise exercise of the discretion with which the court is vested in matters of this kind to decline to punish the husband, who is innocent of all wrong, by laying upon him the burden of his wife's unsuccessful contest. Frivolous suits of this character ought not to be encouraged, as they would be, if a dissatisfied wife, without just cause, can come into this court with an unfounded complaint against her husband, and compel him, not only to employ counsel and pay the costs of his defense, but also be subjected to the expenses she may incur in exhibiting her malicious disposition.

This application must be denied.

Appeal of BEARD.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Jan. 4, 1906.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — PAYMENT OF CLAIMS—DUTY TO HEIRS.

Where intestate died indebted to a bank on a demand note secured by a mortgage on real estate, the heirs were entitled to have intestate's personal assets applied as far as possible by the administrator in payment of such note and mortgage, to the exoneration of the land, though the note was not filed as a claim against the estate, and no demand was made by the holder for payment out of the personal estate.

2. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION — RIGHTS OF WIDOW.

A widow has no higher rights than any other distributee of her deceased husband with reference to her share of her husband's property in excess of dower.

Case Reserved from Superior Court, Fairfield County; George W. Wheeler, Judge.

Judicial accounting by James H. Beard, as administrator, etc. An order was entered by the probate court disallowing payment by the administrator of a note and mortgage given by his intestate, without presentation of the note or demand by the payee, from which the administrator appealed to the superior court. Reserved on a finding of facts for the advice of the Supreme Court of Errors. Disaffirmance of probate decree advised.

Robert L. Munger, for administrator. William S. Downs, for widow. Edward A. Hariman and George W. Klett, for heirs at law.

BALDWIN, J. The intestate owned at the time of his decease land which he had mortgaged to a savings bank to secure his own notes for $2,100, payable on demand, with interest, for money borrowed from it. By order of the court of probate the period allowed for the presentation of claims against the estate was fixed at six months from February 17, 1902. Within this time an inventory was returned, which showed that the land was subject to this mortgage indebtedness to the bank, and the administrator paid it the interest then due upon the notes. After the six months had expired he paid the bank $1,800 on the principal of the notes. These payments were made because he supposed it to be his duty, and not because requested; nor were the notes or mortgages, or any demand founded upon them, ever exhibited or presented to him as claims against the estate. The intestate left a widow, to whom he was married before 1877, and no issue. At her instance, the court of probate refused to allow a credit in the administration account of $1,800, for the money paid to reduce the principal of the mortgage debts. The title to the equity of redemption in the mortgaged lands upon his death became vested in his heirs at law, subject to her right to dower. They acquired at the time an equitable right to have the debts of the intestate, whether secured or unsecured, discharged out of the fund to which resort in all cases is primarily to be had; that is, the general personal estate, so far as it was adequate for that purpose and could be used without prejudice to the rights of unsecured creditors. Forrester v. Lord Leigh, Ambler, 171; Brainerd v. Cowdrey, 16 Conn. 1, 7; Jackson v. Bevins, 74 Conn. 96, 49 Atl. 899; Bulkley v. Seymour, 74 Conn. 459, 51 Atl. 125, 92 Am. St. Rep. 229.

It is one of the agreed facts that the bank "never exhibited or presented to the said appellant, as administrator, any claim or note or mortgage against said estate." With this ultimate conclusion none of the subordinate facts, as to which the parties also agreed, are inconsistent in law. That the land was inventoried as subject to the mortgages, and that interest was paid upon the notes before the lapse of the six months allowed for the presentation of claims, did not import that the bank had demanded payment from the estate. They were at least equally consistent with the supposition that both the administrator and the bank contemplated the continuance of the loan on the sole security of the land mortgaged. Dime Savings Bank v. McAllenney, 78 Conn. 141, 55 Atl. 1019. Every creditor of the estate who failed to present his claim within the six months allowed by the court of probate for that purpose became, in August, 1902, "forever debarred of his demand against said estate," unless an extension of time should be secured. Gen. St. 1902, § 326. The meaning of this statute is that, should he subsequently attempt to collect his claim from the estate, his omission to present it, if properly set up, is an effectual bar to the proceeding. But, as in the case of the ordinary statutes of limitation, the debt remains in existence. Berrigan v. Pearsall, 46 Conn. 274, 276. There is simply a shield against its enforcement as an actionable demand. In no other respect have the relations between the creditor and the estate been affected. Before August, 1902, the bank held two notes of the intestate which his administrator could be compelled to discharge, if there were general assets sufficient for that purpose. After August, 1902, it held the same notes, but without the power thus to compel their discharge. It still had as full a right as ever to foreclose the mortgages by which they were secured. The heirs, therefore, remained as before in peril of losing their lands, unless the incumbrances were removed. The inventory showed that the value of their inheritance was diminished by the amount of these particular mortgages in favor of this particular creditor.

No question is made as to the propriety of the payment made by the administrator of the semiannual interest which accrued upon them during the six months allowed for the exhibition of claims, although no claim for it had been presented to him. But he had no more right to pay it during that period than he would have had to pay it afterward. His authority proceeded from two things: The fact, which appeared upon the records of the court of probate, that the lands of the intestate were subject to this mortgage indebtedness; and the rule of law that any such indebtedness must be discharged from the general personal estate, if it be adequate for that purpose and can be used without prejudice to the rights of unsecured creditors. This fact and this rule made it his duty to pay both the interest and the principal due upon the notes in question, whether they should or should not be exhibited as claims against the estate. We have heretofore decided that an executor comes under such an obligation in favor of a devisee, since a devise implies, in the absence of any contrary provision, an intention that the land shall be disincumbered by payments from the general personal assets. Turner v. Laird, 68 Conn. 198, 200, 85 Atl. 1124. In cases of intestacy, the law secures the same result. The money borrowed became an addition to the personal estate of the borrower. That fund, therefore, having received the benefit of that for which the land was mortgaged, should be held to the burden of discharging the incumbrance. This was the established doctrine of the courts before a similar right of exoneration was conceded to devisees. Bacon's Abridgment, "Mortgagee," E, 638.

It is contended that a widow is entitled to greater favor than an heir. Dower is highly favored in law, but as to any additional share in her husband's property which she may receive by the statute of distributions she stands on no better footing than any other distributee. Sutherland v. Harrison, 86 Ill. 368.

The superior court is advised to disaffirm the decree of the court of probate. Costs will be taxed for the appellant in this court. The other judges concurred.

HULL v. HOLMES et al.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Dec. 15, 1905.)

1. WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—LIVING ISSUE.

The phrase "die leaving no living issue," when used in a will, is equivalent to the phrase "die leaving no surviving issue," and carries a plain implication in favor of any issue of the first taker who may survive him.

2. SAME — ESTATES DEVISED — VESTED REMAINDER.

A will gave an undivided one-half of testator's residuary estate absolutely to testator's daughter, and the use and income of the other half, subject to a small annuity, to testator's son for life, and directed that after the son's death the said one-half of the residuum of the estate should go to the son's son, but provided that, in case the latter should die leaving no living issue, the said one-half should go to testator's daughter as an absolute estate. Held, that the provision for the issue of the grandson took effect only in case the grandson should die before testator; and on testator's death before the grandson the latter acquired an absolute title to the undivided one-half of the fund, subject only to his father's life interest.

Case Reserved from Superior Court, New London County; Ralph Wheeler, Judge.

Action by Hadlai A. Hull, trustee under the will of William S. Noyes, deceased, against Jeremiah Holmes, executor of the will of William Standin Noyes, deceased, and others. In the superior court the case was reserved for the advice of the Supreme Court of Errors. Judgment advised.

The testator died in 1890, leaving a will in which he gave one undivided half of his residuary estate, real and personal, absolutely to his daughter, Mary, and "the use, rents, interest, and income" of the other half to his son, George W. Noyes, "for and during his natural life," adding, "and after his death I give, devise, and bequeath the said undivided one-half of the said residuum of my estate to his son, William S. Noyes, but, in case he shall die leaving no living issue, then and in that case I give, devise, and bequeath the said one-half of the said residuum of my estate to my daughter, Miss Mary Elizabeth Noyes, as an absolute estate, but not to pass to her until after my son's death." By a codicil reciting that his will gave his son the use for life of half his residuary estate, "with a remainder over to his son, William S. Noyes, to take effect after his father's death, followed by a contingent remainder," he revoked so much of said provision as gave the son "all the use, rents, interest, and income" for life. He then bequeathed an annuity of $50 to his son's wife for her life "from the avails of the said use, rents, interest, and income," adding, "and the remainder thereof I give and bequeath to my said son, George W. Noyes, for and during his natural life; the same to be paid to him annually, each and every year." The plaintiff was appointed trustee of the fund, thus left, by the court of probate. Mary died testate in 1895. William S. Noyes, the grandson of the testator, died testate in November, 1904, leaving surviving issue. George W. Noyes died in December, 1904.

Hadlai A. Hull, for plaintiff. Herbert W. Rathbun, for defendant Holmes. Abel P. Tanner, for defendant Davis. Frank L. McGuire, for defendant Noyes.

BALDWIN, J. (after stating the facts). The present ownership of the estate, of which the life use was left to George W. Noyes, depends upon the construction of the provision creating a remainder in favor of his sister. The estate was to be hers absolutely after the death of the testator's grandson, William S. Noyes, "in case he shall die leaving no living issue," provided that it was "not to pass to her until after" the death of George W. Noyes, and subject to an annuity charge during the life of the latter's wife. The phrase "die leaving no living issue," by the rules of interpretation adopted in this state, is equivalent to "die leaving no surviving issue." St. John v. Dann, 66 Conn. 401, 407, 34 Atl. 110. It carries a plain implication in favor of any issue of the first taker who may survive him. If employed in a devise of lands, with reference to his death, without regard to the time at which that event may occur, it may create an estate tail. If, on the other hand, employed with reference to his death, in case that event should occur before that of the testator, it may amount to a substitutionary provision.

In the will now before us a vested remainder is first given to William S. Noyes in terms sufficient to convey an absolute title. On the happening of a certain contingency an absolute estate is then limited over to Mary W. Noyes; but it is "not to pass to her" (that is, the enjoyment of it is not) until the death of the father of the first remainderman. It is not probable that the testator meant to create an estate tail in his residuary real estate, which, under our statute would become a fee simple in the issue of his grandson, while contemplating the possible vesting of an absolute title in remainder in his daughter before the death of his son. His general intent is better served by interpreting the provision for the issue of William S. Noyes as one to take effect only in case his grandson should die before him. Coe v. James, 54 Conn. 511, 9 Atl. 392; Phelps v. Phelps, 55 Conn. 359, 11 Atl. 596; Lawlor v. Holohan, 70 Conn. 87, 38 Atl. 903.

The superior court is advised that on the testator's death William S. Noyes acquired an absolute title to the fund in question, subject only to his father's life interest. No costs will be taxed in this court.

NEAL v. RENDALL

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 23, 1905.)

1. APPEAL—EXCEPTIONS—PREJUDICIAL ERROR.

Exceptions to a ruling cannot be sustained merely because the ruling, viewed as an academic proposition, was erroneous. It must further be made to appear in the bill of exceptions that the ruling was also prejudicial to the accepting party's case.

2. SAME.

A bill of exceptions to a refusal to give a requested instruction based on a factual hypothesis must show in itself, or by express reference, that there was evidence in support of the hypothesis; otherwise, the court cannot know that the excepting party was prejudiced by the refusal, even though the legal proposition contained in the request was correctly stated.

3. SAME.

Whether a statement in a bill of exceptions that "the evidence upon the motion for a new trial, if printed, may be referred to, to illustrate and explain the exceptions," sufficiently makes the report of the evidence a part of the bill of exceptions—quære.

4. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE TO SUSTAIN.

In this case, as to the requests based on factual hypotheses, it does not appear from the bill of exceptions that there was any evidence in support of the hypotheses, and hence these exceptions must be overruled.

5. HIGHWAYS—COLLISION—PLEADING AND PROOF.

Where the declaration alleges that the defendant's team ran into the plaintiff's team, and the proof is that both teams were in motion up to the instant of collision, the fact that the defendant's team was much slower in motion than the team of the plaintiff does not constitute a fatal variance between the allegation and the proof.

6. NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

To sustain a common-law action based on the negligence of the defendant, it is not necessary to prove that the defendant's negligence was the sole cause of the plaintiff's injury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Negligence, §§ 74, 75.]

(Official.)

Exceptions from Supreme Judicial Court, Androscoggin County.

Action by Charlotte A. Neal against Daniel H. Rendall. Verdict for plaintiff, and defendant excepta. Exceptions overruled.

Action on the case to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff and caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant, whose vehicle collided with that in which the plaintiff was riding on a public street in Auburn.

The testimony showed that the plaintiff, 68 years of age, was riding in a light carriage with her husband, and that the horse was his. The husband, who was 72 years of age, was driving. At the time of the collision which resulted in the injuries complained of, the plaintiff and her husband were traveling south, on Turner street, in Auburn, at about six miles an hour, and on the right of the middle of the traveled part of the street, as they traveled. The street at the point of collision was from 46 to 50 feet in width. The defendant, in a heavily loaded team, was traveling north, on the same street, at a walk, but he was on the left of the traveled part of the street, as he traveled. Both teams were thus west of the middle of the traveled part of the street, and the team of the defendant was nearer the middle.

The testimony tended to show that there was apparently sufficient room on the west of the middle of the traveled part of the street, so that the teams could have passed without interference, had they both continued as they were traveling just before the collision described in plaintiff's writ, but that the horse attached to the wagon in which the plaintiff was riding became suddenly frightened, and shied towards the center of the traveled part of the road, and towards defendant's team. The front left wheel of the plaintiff's carriage came into collision with the hind wheel of defendant's vehicle, whereby the plaintiff was thrown from her carriage,

The testimony also tended to show that the two teams would have passed each other safely and without collision, had it not been for the horse's fright and shying; also, that they would have passed each other safely, if the defendant had been driving on the right of the middle of the traveled part of the street.

The plaintiff recovered a verdict for $400. Before the case was submitted to the jury the defendant requested the presiding justice to give four certain instructions to the jury, the substance of each of which sufficiently appears in the opinion, and which said request was refused. Thereupon the defendant excepted.

Argued before EMERY, WHITEHOUSE, STROUT, POWERS, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

W. H. Judkins and B. L. Pettigrew, for plaintiff. Oakes, Pulsifer & Ludden, for defendant.

EMERY, J. The first request for instruction is based upon the factual hypothesis that there was not sufficient time for the defendant to turn and reach the right of the middle of the road after he first saw the plaintiff approaching. It does not appear, however, from the bill of exceptions that there was any evidence in support of the hypothesis. Hence the request does not appear to have been applicable to the case, and its refusal does not appear to have prejudiced the defendant.

The second request is based on the factual hypothesis that the defendant's team did not run into that of the plaintiff. From the bill of exceptions, it appears to be undisputed that both teams were in motion up to the moment of collision, though the defendant's team was proceeding at a walk. There is no suggestion of any evidence that the defendant's team was stationary. Each team, therefore, ran into the other, though there was a difference in the speed of the two teams. This sufficiently sustains the case stated in the declaration that the defendant's team ran into the plaintiff's team. It was practically so held in Neal v. Rendall, 98 Me. 69, 56 Atl. 209, 63 L. R. A. 668.

The third request was based upon the legal hypothesis that the defendant's negligence must have been the sole cause of the collision. This hypothesis is not well founded in law. It is enough if the defendant's negligence was a direct contributing cause, without which the collision would not have occurred. No evidence of the plaintiff's contributory negligence. While the request might have been applicable were the action a statutory one against a town, it is not applicable to this common-law action against an individual.

The fourth request is based on several factual hypotheses as to the character of the plaintiff's horse, the condition of her husband, the driver, his manner of driving, his want of control over the horse, etc. Here, again, the bill of exceptions is bare of any statement that there was evidence in support of these hypotheses. It is not made to appear that the request was applicable to the case, and hence that the defendant was prejudiced by the refusal to so instruct.

At the close of the bill of exceptions it is stated that the evidence upon a motion for a new trial, if printed, might be referred to to illustrate and explain the exceptions. It is at least questionable whether such a statement makes the whole evidence a part of the bill of exceptions to supply what was omitted in the bill itself, but we have no occasion to decide this question, inasmuch as the evidence was not printed or brought before the court in any way.

It follows that none of the exceptions can be sustained.

Exceptions overruled.

HIGGINS v. FRANKLIN COUNTY AGRICULTURAL SOC.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 19, 1905.)

1. AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY — FAIR — NEGLIGENCE—SAFETY OF PATRONS.

An agricultural society holding a fair, for admission to which a fee is charged, is bound to use reasonable care to keep all parts of its grounds to which patrons are admitted free from dangers to them.

2. SAME—RACE TRACK.

When such society invites patrons, even by implication only, to cross its racing track to reach the space inclosed by the track, it is bound to use reasonable care to keep the track clear of danger of collision during such crossing.

3. SAME—CARE REQUIRED OF PATRONS.

A patron of such fair, while crossing the racing track by invitation of the society, express or implied, is not bound to be as watchful for teams approaching along the track as he would be in crossing a public road. He may assume that the society is using reasonable care to keep the track clear of such teams. Hence the mere fact that he is not watching for such teams does not constitute contributory negligence on his part.

4. SAME—EVIDENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In this case the evidence, though conflicting, warranted findings by the jury that the plaintiff was invited by the defendant society to cross the track when he did, that he was not guilty of contributory negligence in not seeing the team approaching along the track, and that the defendant was negligent in not preventing the use of the track by the colliding team at that time.

(Official.)

On Motion from Supreme Judicial Court, Franklin County.

Action by Edwin M. Higgins against the Franklin County Agricultural Society. Verdict for plaintiff. On motion for new trial. Overruled.

Action on the case to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff, and also to recover for damages to his wagon, caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant. The defendant, on the 17th day of September, 1903, was holding a fair on its grounds at Farmington, and had under its care and control a half-mile race track or a race course for speeding and racing horses. At a time when a race was not in progress the plaintiff undertook to drive across the track with his horse and wagon, and, while so doing, his wagon was struck and himself injured by a rapidly driven vehicle, with which the driver was giving his horse "a warming up mile" preparatory to a race later in the afternoon.

Frank W. Butler, for plaintiff. Joseph C. Holman, for defendant.

EMERY, J. The defendant society was holding a fair on its grounds arranged for that purpose. On these grounds was the usual half mile track for the exercising, speeding, and racing of horses. Outside of this track was space used for various purposes. An admission fee was charged and paid at the outer entrance, and visitors having thus entered the grounds were permitted to cross the track, when not in use for horses, to the space within the track. The passageway to and across the track was barred by a rope while the track was in use, which rope was lowered to the ground by a servant of the company, employed for that purpose. When the track was clear, permitting visitors to cross the track to the interior space. The plaintiff had paid the admission fee, and had driven upon the grounds up to the track at the crossing, barred by the rope. He then started to cross the track, and, when part way across, his carriage was struck and himself injured by a rapidly driven vehicle, with which the driver was speeding his horse along the track. There was evidence that the attendant guarding the passageway across the track lowered the barring rope to the ground in such a manner as to be an invitation to the plaintiff to attempt the crossing when he did, or an assurance to him that the track was then clear for crossing. The defendant strongly denies this, and insists that the rope was lowered only for an instant to enable a team to leave the track, and that the plaintiff practically forced his way past the attendant and barrier. We are not satisfied, however, that the jury was clearly wrong in finding for the plaintiff on this point, and so far the verdict must stand.

The plaintiff might have avoided the collision, had he been on the constant watch for approaching horses from the time he entered upon the track, which, however, he was not. The defendant insists that hence the plaintiff did not exercise due watchfulness, and that his negligence in that respect was a contributing cause of the collision. The only question of law arising under this contention is whether the plaintiff was negligent, as matter of law, under the circumstances, in not being constantly on the watch for horses and vehicles rapidly passing along the track he was crossing. We think he was not. The case is very different from that of crossing a public highway. There the person crossing has no assurance, but from his own careful observation, that the way is clear. He is therefore bound to anticipate that teams, slow and fast, may be rightfully approaching at any time, and to be on his own guard against them. In this case the track was a purely private way, owned and operated by the defendant society as a part of the attractions to induce people to pay for admission to its grounds. It was the society's duty to exercise due and reasonable care to keep the track clear and free from danger to its patrons at all such times as they were invited or permitted to cross it, and while they were thus crossing. Assuming, as the jury has found, that the plaintiff was assured by the action of the defendant's servant that he could then cross the track, he was thereby assured that reasonable care had been, and was being, taken to keep the track clear for his crossing. With that assurance it cannot be held, as matter of law, that he was negligent in not looking about for the approach of rapidly driven horses and vehicles along the track. Whether under all the circumstances of this case such an omission to look about was negligence was a question for the jury. We see no reason why the finding on this question should be set aside.

Another point made in defense is that the defendant society is not responsible for the act of the offending driver, since he was not in any way its servant, and since it does not appear that he had permission to drive on the track at that time. The society's duty was not limited to refraining from giving permission to drive rapidly on its tracks at such times. It had an active duty to use due and reasonable care to prevent such driving, even by unauthorized persons. The jury has found that it did not perform this duty in this case, and we see no reason to disturb the verdict on this point. It follows that the motion must be overruled. Thornton v. Maine State Agricultural Society, 97 Me. 108, 53 Atl. 979, 94 Am. St. Rep. 488. Motion overruled.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 9, 1906.)

JUDGMENTS—RES JUDICATA—ORDERS OF ORPHANS' COURT.

Where issues are framed upon a caveat to a will, and sent to the court of common pleas for trial by a jury, and a verdict is rendered in favor of the caveatees, and certified to the orphans' court, the orphans' court must accept the conclusions of the jury as final, and its order ratifying the verdict and dismissing the caveat is conclusive on all issues submitted to the jury, and precludes the caveators from framing new issues embracing in a different form questions covered by the issues originally framed.

Appeal from Orphans' Court of Baltimore City; Myer J. Block, Wm. J. O'Brien, and Harry C. Gaither, Judges.

Caveat by Emma Struth, administratrix of Otto A. Struth, and others, to the will of Charles Struth, deceased; Adolph F. Decker and others, executors. From an order dismissing a petition for the submission of certain issues to the jury, caveators appeal. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Thomas Ireland Elliott and Charles F. Stein, for appellants. A. F. Decker and Charles C. Rhodes, for appellees.

BRISCOE, J. This is an appeal from an order of the orphans' court of Baltimore City passed on the 23d day of May, 1905, in the matter of a caveat to the will of Charles G. Struth, of Baltimore, deceased. It appears that on the 4th day of April, 1902, upon a caveat to this will, six issues were framed and sent to the court of common pleas of Baltimore to be tried by a jury. At the trial a verdict was rendered for the caveatees on all the issues, and upon an appeal to this court the rulings of the court below were affirmed. Struth v. Decker, 100 Md. 377, 59 Atl. 727. Subsequently the finding of the jury was by an order of the orphans' court, dated on the 7th of February, 1905, ratified and confirmed, and the caveat dismissed. Afterwards on the 16th of February, 1905, Emma A. Struth and others, the caveators on the former appeal and the appellants here, filed a petition in the orphans' court of Baltimore City against Adolph F. Decker and others, the caveatees and the appellees here, asking that two additional issues be framed and sent to a court of law for trial. The alleged new issues are in substance as follows: First, that the paper writing, dated the 25th day of February, 1902, and purporting to be the last will and testament of Charles Struth, deceased, was and is not his last will and testament, because its execution was procured by fraud exercised and practiced upon him; and, second, that the provisions of the will do not carry out all the material and important intentions of the testator as given by him to its draftsman, but these were omitted and not contained in the will. In their answer the appellees deny the allegations of the petition, and aver that the case was res adjudicata and the matters raised by the new issues were passed upon and determined by the issues of the original appeal. The case was heard on petition and answer, and from an order of the orphans' court denying the caveators' application for new issues and dismissing the petition, an appeal has been taken.

The case as thus stated, it will be seen, presents the question whether the two issues asked for by the appellants in their petition of the 16th of February, 1905, were not embraced in and determined by the issues on the former appeal; and to do this it becomes necessary to consider what was tried and decided in the former case. The verdict rendered in the original case decided and determined that the will was executed according to the requirements of the statute; that it was executed by the testator when he was of sound and disposing mind and capable of executing a valid contract; that the contents of the will were read to or by him, and known to him, at or before the time of its execution; that no part of the will was unknown to or misunderstood by the testator at the time of its alleged execution; and, lastly, the execution of the will was not procured by undue influence exercised and practiced upon him. We have carefully examined the several issues contained in the record on the former appeal, and also those presented here, and fail to find any substantial difference in the propositions submitted and proposed by the appellants in the two cases.

The new issue asked by the appellants, that the will was not the last will and testament of the testator because the execution was procured by fraud exercised and practiced upon him, is practically the same as the one passed upon by the sixth issue, relating to undue influence, in the former case. In Struth v. Decker, supra (the former appeal), it is said: "The fifth prayer of the caveator, defining undue influence and asking that, if the jury found this will was procured through such influence, their verdict must be for the caveators, was refused upon the ground there was no legally sufficient evidence of such influence, and following the numerous decisions of this court upon this question, we are constrained to hold that we can discover no such evidence in this record. To hold otherwise would be to indulge in mere suspicion and imagination. Upon the facts of this case as disclosed by the record, the only logical ground upon which this will could be attacked would be that of a conspiracy to make a will for a man incompetent to make one for himself, and that ground has been conclusively passed upon by the jury, in the exercise of the power given to them and withheld from the courts to determine all questions of fact." It appears that the new issue, that the execution of the will was procured by fraud, was fully covered by the sixth issue suggested and decided upon in the former trial. Mr. Schouler, in his work on Wills (section 222) says: "Closely connected with the subject of fraud and force is that of importunity or undue influence. The latter involves in some degree one or both the elements of fraud and force, though not so distinctly or easily made out." And in Frush v. Green, 86 Md. 501, 39 Atl. 866, this court said: "Undue influence often closely resembles and is near akin to actual fraud, and, like the latter, when most cunningly employed is exceedingly difficult to expose." Apart from this, it appears from the record in the former case that the question of fraud in procuring the will was fully considered and submitted in the trial of the sixth issue.

As to the second new issue suggested by the appellants, to the effect that "the provisions of the will do not carry out all the material and important testamentary intentions of the testator as given by him to the draftsman of the will," we need only say that this issue was submitted and covered by the findings in the third, fourth, and fifth issues on the former trial. In the opinion in Struth v. Decker, supra, Judge Pearce distinctly says: "The question of testamentary capacity and of the conformity of the will, as prepared and read to the testator, with the instructions said to have been given by him to Mr. Decker, and of the testator's knowledge and understanding of the provisions of the will as read to him, were all fully and fairly submitted to the jury by the caveators' first, second, third, and fourth prayers, which were granted, and the verdict of the jury upon all these questions were against the caveators. They exhausted their remedies in this regard when their motion for a new trial was made and overruled, and we have no power to review these findings of fact by the jury."

As we are of the opinion that the new issues proposed by the appellants in this case substantially embraced the same questions that had been pronounced upon in the former case, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the other questions raised on the record. The law is well settled that the orphans' courts of this state are bound to accept the conclusions of the jury, duly certified from a court of law, on trials of caveats to wills, as final, and to make them effective by proper orders. This was done here by the order of the orphans' court of Baltimore City passed on the 7th day of February, 1905, and this order is conclusive of all issues tried in that suit. Finding no error in the action of the orphans' court of Baltimore City, in the order of the 25th day of May, 1905, appealed against, it will be affirmed.

Order affirmed, with costs.

CARTER et al. v. APPLEGARTH.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 6, 1905.)

1. PROCESS — SERVICE — LEAVING AT RESIDENCE.

Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1904, art. 33, § 24, in relation to elections, provides that, on a petition to strike from the list of qualified voters the name of any person fictitious, deceased, or disqualified, summons shall be served at his place of residence. Held, that the statute means that the summons shall be left at his place of residence.

2. ELECTIONS—SUSPECTED LIST—METHOD OF MAKING.

Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 83, § 20, in relation to elections and providing for placing registered voters on the suspected list, provides that, if any voter make oath before the board of registry that he believes any person not a qualified voter, such facts shall be noted. Section 21 provides that the board of registry shall deliver to two of their number, of opposite politics, a list of registered voters whom one of the officers of registration suspects not to be qualified voters, and section 11 prescribes the oath to be taken by an officer of registration, in which he swears that he will faithfully and honestly discharge the duties of such an officer. Held, that a list of suspected voters was not such as contemplated by the statute, where it was merely handed to the board of registration by a party executive of the ward, and not verified by any affidavits, and not supported by the belief of one of the officers.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas; George M. Sharp, Judge.

Petition by William J. Applegarth against Valentine Braun and others to have the name of said Braun stricken from the list of qualified and registered voters in the Fifteenth precinct of the Fourth Ward of Baltimore City. From an order of the court of common pleas granting the petition, respondents appeal. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Charles H. Carter, for appellants. James E. Godwin and Lewis Putzel, for appellee.

PEARCE, J. In an opinion per curiam, filed November 8, 1905, it was ordered that the name of Valentine Braun, which had been stricken from the list of qualified and registered voters in the Fifteenth precinct of the Fourth Ward of Baltimore City, under an order of the court of common pleas of that city, be restored to said list of qualified and registered voters, and we will now state the reasons for that decision:

Valentine Braun was registered on October 11, 1904, as a qualified voter in the Fifteenth precinct of the Fourth Ward of Baltimore City; his residence being there given as 612 East Lombard street. The building so numbered was one of those destroyed in the great fire of February, 1904, which swept over a large section of the city, and practically destroyed all the houses in that ward, but in the summer of 1904 a new house was erected upon the same site, and was numbered 612, and from that house Braun was registered. On October 10, 1905, that being the last day of registration, about noon of that day Mr. Tapscott, the Republican executive of that ward, came to the tent in which the registers were holding their office, called out Mr. Watson, the Republican register, and handed him a list of 64 names, appearing as voters upon the registry of that precinct, as a list of suspected voters. This list was not verified by the affidavit of Mr. Tapscott, or of any other person, and was not offered to the board of registers for action thereon until 4 o'clock that afternoon, when Mr. Watson presented it; and he testified that he only did so then because he had orders to do so from political headquarters. He also testified that he had never examined the registry to ascertain who were disqualified voters in that precinct; that he was not acquainted with the voters of that precinct, and that no suspicions about those appearing on the list mentioned; and that, if he had been asked to swear that they were suspected voters, he could not conscientiously have done so. The name of Braun was one of those upon this list, and the cause of disqualification was "Don't live there." Before separating that evening, the board of registers went over this list with the books of registration, and mailed to the address of each person thereon as given in the books the required notice to appear and show cause why they should not be stricken off, and also went in person and served similar notices upon such persons on said list as they could find, and left said notices on the premises where the persons could not be found. Mr. Watson, together with the two Democratic registers, went to 612 East Lombard street, and, not finding Braun there, left the notice with some one on the premises for him. Braun did not appear, but he was not stricken off by the registers, because Mr. Charles H. Carter, one of the supervisors of election, advised the board they could not properly act upon the list in question. Thereupon Mr. Applegarth filed his petition in the court of common pleas to have Braun stricken off. The court directed summons to be issued for Braun, as required by section 24 of article 33 of the Code of Public General Laws of 1904, and this was returned, "Non est as to Valentine Braun, and summons left on premises 612 East Lombard street," and at the hearing his name was ordered stricken off; the court being of opinion that the list of suspected voters was such a list as the law contemplated, and that the summons was properly served by leaving it on the premises.

With this conclusion we fully agree. Section 24 of article 33 provides that, "when the object of the petition is to strike off the name of any person alleged to be fictitious, deceased, or disqualified, summons shall also be issued to such person, which shall be served by the sheriff within the time therein designated at the place of his residence given in the registry." Three classes of persons are here provided for by one method of service. If personal service were required, there could be no rational or satisfactory reason assigned for requiring such service at the party's place of residence, since it would be as effective if made at any other place. As to fictitious or deceased persons, the reason for requiring service at the residence given in the registry is obvious and rational, since no personal service could be made upon either, and, unless some constructive service were provided, the registry lists could not be purged from the frauds by which fictitious names are sometimes entered, and the frauds or errors through which the names of deceased persons are sometimes retained upon the lists. It would be physically possible in some cases to give personal service to one disqualified by removal, but in most cases it would be practically impossible to do so; and we think this class of persons was wisely included with fictitious and deceased persons, under the method of constructive notice. When the law says the summons "shall be served at his place of residence," it clearly means it "shall be left at his place of residence," and this works no injustice or hardship upon the voter. If he has actually changed his place of residence without losing his right to vote in the precinct where he is registered, he can preserve his right by appearing before the registers and giving his new place of residence; and, if he is temporarily absent without having changed his residence, prudence would require that he should leave his address at his residence, in order that communications of importance should reach him. In either contingency the situation is one under his own control, and for which he should provide. And if he has actually changed his residence, and has lost his right to vote where he is registered, he can have no cause of complaint that he is stricken off. It must be remembered that the right of suffrage, valuable and sacred as it is, is neither a property right nor an absolute, unqualified, personal right, of which no one may be deprived without due process of law, but that it is altogether conventional and dependent upon the regulations of the state within constitutional limitations. Anderson v. Baker, 23 Md. 620. It cannot, therefore, be contended that Braun was entitled to his day in court, as he would have been if an absolute right of person or property had been involved, and we cannot doubt that the constructive service provided by the law in this case was legal and sufficient.

But upon the other question decided by the court below we cannot agree with its conclusions. Braun had been duly registered as a qualified voter in that precinct, and was entitled to remain upon the list until removed by actual proof of disqualification, or in strict accord with the method provided for striking off those whose disqualification is merely suspected. There are but two legal methods of placing a duly registered voter upon the suspected list. Section 20 of article 33 provides that "if any voter of the ward or county shall go before the board of registry during its sessions and make oath that he believes any specified person upon such registry is not a qualified voter, such fact shall be noted. Section 21 provides "that before separating on the last day said board of registry shall make out and deliver to two of their number of opposite politics a list of the registered address of all those who have been registered as qualified voters, whom either one of the officers of registration suspects not to be qualified voters, or against whom any voter of the ward or county may have made complaint as above provided. If said board of registry shall, however, know that any person so complained of is a qualified voter, then such name need not be put upon the list of suspected persons, unless required by a member of the board." Section 32 requires the voter who makes complaint against another voter to make oath that he believes the person named is not a qualified voter in the precinct, and to state in the oath the grounds of such belief. Section 15 provides that each judge of election shall also be an officer of registration in the district or precinct for which he is appointed, and section 11 prescribes the oath to be taken by him, in which he swears that he will "faithfully and honestly discharge the duties of an officer of registration and judge of election." In the discharge of his duty as an officer of registration, he cannot honestly take action against a registered voter as a suspected person, except, first, under the sanction of an oath by some voter of the ward or county that he believes such person not to be a qualified voter; or, second, upon his own belief to the same effect, entertained and held under the sanction of his own official oath. There must be a genuine honest belief or well-grounded suspicion that the voter indicated is not a duly qualified voter, and this belief or suspicion must exist either in the mind of the register of election himself upon the responsibility of his own oath, or in the mind of the voter who makes the charge upon the responsibility of the oath required to support the charge. And this responsibility is not only the moral obligation that goes with every oath, but the legal liability for false swearing which attends the taking of oaths required by law, and which is provided for by section 97 of article 33. Any other construction of the suspected list in this case would put every voter upon the registry who might happen to be absent from his residence at the time of the last sitting of the registers at the mercy of corrupt officers or unscrupulous voters.

These are briefly the reasons which led to the conclusions we have heretofore announced in this case.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 6, 1905.)

PROCESS—SERVICE—LEAVING AT RESIDENCE.

Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1904, art. 33, § 24, in relation to elections, provides that, on a petition to strike from the list of qualified voters the name of any person fictitious, deceased, or disqualified, summons shall be served at his place of residence given in the register. Held, that where the house in which a voter resided according to the registry had been destroyed, and there was no building there, service by laying the summons on the lot and putting a brick on it was sufficient.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas; George M. Sharp, Judge.

Petition by William J. Applegarth against Charles O. Carter and others to strike the name of Charles R. Betts from the list of qualified voters in the Fifteenth precinct of the Fourth Ward of Baltimore City. From an order refusing to strike the name, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY C. J., and PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

James E. Godwin and Lewis Putzel, for appellant. Charles H. Carter, for appellees.

PEARCE, J. This case was argued with the preceding case of Carter et al. v. Applegarth, 62 Atl. 710, and a per curiam opinion was filed in this case, also, November 3, 1905, affirming the order of the court of common pleas refusing to strike the name of Charles R. Betts from the list of qualified voters in the Fifteenth precinct of the Fourth Ward of Baltimore City, though our reasons were different from those which controlled the lower court. Charles R. Betts was duly registered in that precinct as residing at 39 Market Space, which was within the burnt district, and the building from which he was registered was among those destroyed in the great fire, and no building has since been erected upon the site. His name was placed upon the same suspected list mentioned in the preceding case, and the ground of suspecting his disqualification, as stated on that list, was that there was no building at 39 Market Space. We have detailed in the preceding case all the circumstances attending the making and handing in of this list, and they need not be repeated here. The summons issued for Betts upon the filing of Applegarth's petition to strike him from the list was returned by the sheriff: "Non est. Summons left on premises"—and the notice mailed to Betts' address by the registers was returned to them through the mail, undelivered. The deputy sheriff, to whom the summons was delivered to be served, testified that he went to the street where 39 Market Space stood before the fire, and found it to be a vacant lot, as were also Nos. 37 and 41 on either side of No. 39; that he had a map and plat of that part of the city; that he measured the distances according to this map and plat, and it was agreed by counsel that in that way he properly located and ascertained Lot No. 39 Market Space; and that, having so located said lot, he took the summons and laid it on the lot, and put a half brick upon it. Judge Sharp held this insufficient service, and therefore refused to strike him off, though holding, as stated in the preceding case, that the suspected list was such a list as justified action by the registers. As we held in the former case this list was not a proper list, we necessarily affirmed the order of Judge Sharp in this case, though we held the service of the summons to be sufficient.

Upon first presentation it might seem that this was to push the idea of constructive notice beyond reason, and to render it, as expressed by the lower court, "a proceeding little short of grotesque"; but we think this view will readily yield to a careful consideration of the circumstances of the case and the purpose and object of the law. If the law had required that the summons should be served by leaving it at his residence, his actual residence, a different situation would have existed; but the requirement is that it be served "at his place of residence given in the registry." It is true it was no longer his actual residence, but it still continued to be "his place of residence given in the registry." If there had been no fire destroying the building, and he had removed to another location unknown to the registers, no one, we think, could doubt that service would have been good if left with the occupant of the building, or if tacked upon the door, if there were no occupant. If the house were destroyed, and a tree or a post were left standing, and the summons was tacked thereon, that would be service by leaving it on the premises, as is done in cases of notice of taxes in arrears. Voters are presumed to know the law regulating the exercise of the right of suffrage, and therefore to know that, in event of an attempt to strike one from the list, notice was required to be left at "the place of his residence given in the registry," and though the residence be destroyed, he may be properly required to resort to the place of the destroyed residence for the purpose of ascertaining if notice has been left there, if he desires to protect his right of suffrage. And it is no answer to say that there is no precedent for such service as was made in this case. Unusual situations require unusual procedure to meet them, and the action of the sheriff was in accord with the mandate of the law in this case. If Betts, when he removed after the fire to another place of residence, had communicated this to the registers, it is fair to presume that a notice would have been sent to him at that address, though not required by law.

For the reasons we have stated, we are of opinion that the service contemplated by the law has been made in this case.

JAQUES v. CHANDLER.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Rockingham. Nov. 7, 1905.)

1. WILLS—ELECTION—SURVIVING HUSBAND—EXTENSION OF TIME—STATUTES.

Pub. St. 1901, c. 186, § 13, and chapter 195, § 14, provides that a husband may waive the provisions of his wife's will in his favor by writing filed within one year after her decease, and not afterwards, unless the judge of probate on petition and for good cause shown shall extend the time, Held, that the term "for good cause shown," should be construed to mean whenever it would be reasonable and just to do so, or whenever justice required it.

2. SAME—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where a husband applied for an extension of time within which to waive the provisions of his wife's will, as authorized by Pub. St. 1901, c. 186, § 13, and chapter 195, § 14, the burden was on him to show that justice required such extension.

3. APPEAL—QUESTION OF FACT—REVIEW.

On an application by a husband for an extension of time within which to waive the provisions of his wife's will, whether justice requires such extension is a proper subject for investigation of the superior court, but presents no question of law for determination on appeal.

4. WILLS—WAIVER—ELECTION BY HUSBAND—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Where a husband applied for an extension of time within which to waive the provisions of his wife's will and alleged a change in the situation after the expiration of a year from his wife's death, but there was no finding that the husband was misled, or that, if he had anticipated an improvement in the value of certain stock, he would have waived the will, it could not be said, in the absence of such findings, that he should be permitted to waive the will as a matter of law because of such change which he may have anticipated.

Transferred from Superior Court; Stone, Judge.

Petition by William H. Jaques against Lucy H. Chandler, executrix of the will of Elizabeth H. Jaques, deceased, for an extension of time for the filing of a waiver by petitioner of the provisions of the will of decedent, who was his wife. The wife died April 2, 1895, but the petition was not filed in the probate court until December 28, 1897. An order was entered by the probate court denying the petition, from which petitioner prosecuted an appeal to the superior court. Case transferred to Supreme Court. Exceptions overruled.

Streeter & Hollis and Edwin G. Eastman, for plaintiff. Samuel C. Eastman and Frink & Marvin, for defendant.

PARSONS, C. J. The husband may waive the provisions of his wife's will in his favor by writing filed within one year after her decease, "and not afterwards, unless the judge of probate, upon petition and for good cause shown, shall extend the time." Pub. St. 1901, c. 186, § 13; Id. c. 195, § 14. The plaintiff's petition for leave to file a waiver of the will after the expiration of the year having been denied by the probate court, he duly appealed to and prosecuted his appeal in the superior court. That court, upon hearing, made a special finding of facts, and held that the facts found did "not constitute, either as matter of fact or of law, a good cause shown for extending the time in which to waive the provisions of the will," and dismissed the appeal. To the foregoing finding and order dismissing the appeal, and to the refusal of the court to enter an order sustaining the appeal and reversing the decree of the probate court, the plaintiff excepted.

It is conceded that the exception does not raise any question as to the accuracy of the special facts found and stated in the case. There are no exceptions to evidence or procedure, and the only question presented is whether the conclusion of the court that good cause had not been shown was legal error.

Prior to the Public Statutes, (1891) there was no statutory limitation of the time within which either husband or wife might waive the other's will and take instead the rights under the statute which depended upon such waiver (Gen. Laws 1878, c. 202, §§ 7-10, 15, 16), unless it appeared that the provisions of the will were intended to be in addition to those of the statute. Brown v. Brown, 55 N. H. 106; Gen. Laws 1878, c. 202, § 18. But conduct inconsistent with an intent to waive the will was regarded as an election to hold under the will. Hovey v. Hovey, 61 N. H. 599. The uncertainty whether the rights of the survivor were to be determined by the statute or the will, in the absence of any definite act establishing such election, tended to delay the settlement of estates and was without doubt the cause of the statutory addition. This prescribed a rule of evidence under which the absence of a written waiver on file at the end of the year conclusively established an election to take under the will. As the right was purely statutory, the Legislature had power to withdraw it altogether, or to impose such limitations upon its exercise as might seem to them just. It is apparent that there might be cases in which the right of election could not be intelligently exercised, and other cases where without fault the survivor might neglect or be unable to file the waiver within the year. In such circumstances a strict application of the rule might produce injustice, if no relief could be afforded. To provide for such cases is the object of the clauses which authorize the probate court to extend the time for filing such waiver "for good cause shown."

The expression "good cause shown" is not common in the statute law of the state. The only use of it that has been found which has been construed by the court is in the statute relating to costs. "In all actions or petitions in the Supreme Court, costs may, on motion and good cause shown, be limited," etc. Gen. St. 1867, c. 214, § 2. In Whitchev v. Benton, 50 N. H. 25, 27, it is said, in substance, that whatever would make it appear just and reasonable that costs should be limited would be good cause for so doing. In Forster v. Farquhar [1893] 1 Q. B. 564, 567, in construing a rule authorizing the court to limit costs "for good cause shown," it is said: "No nearer and closer definition can be given than that there will be good cause whenever it is fair and just between the parties that it should be so." See Jones v. Curling, 13 Q. B. Div. 262, 267. Considering the manifest reason of the provision, the probable legislative purpose, and the definition of the term already given by this court and others, it appears probable that it was intended that permission to file the waiver after the year should be given whenever it would be reasonable and just to do so; in other words, when justice required it.

What justice requires is a question of fact which is finally determined by the tribunal trying that fact (Cook v. Lee, 72 N. H. 569, 58 Atl. 511), whether the question be one of costs (Nutter v. Varney, 64 N. H. 334, 10 Atl. 615), the allowance of an amendment (Pub. St. 1901, c. 222, § 8; Morgan v. Joyce, 66 N. H. 470, 30 Atl. 1119), whether permission should be granted to prosecute a claim against the estate of a deceased person after the time limited by law (Pub. St. 1901, c. 191, § 27; Libby v. Hutchinson, 72 N. H. 190, 192, 55 Atl. 547), whether a new trial should be granted in any case (Pub. St. 1901, c. 230, § 1; Ela v. Ela, 72 N. H. 216, 55 Atl. 358), or whether one claiming damages under the traveler's statute should be permitted to file notice thereof (Pub. St. 1901, c. 76, § 8; Boyd v. Derry, 68 N. H. 272, 38 Atl. 1005). What justice requires, whenever the question arises, is "a proper subject for investigation in the superior court; but it presents no question of law for determination in this court." Fulton Pulley Co. v. Machine Co., 71 N. H. 384, 52 Atl. 457; First Nat. Bank v. Savings Bank, 71 N. H. 547, 551, 53 Atl. 1017; Priest v. Railroad, 71 N. H. 114, 116, 51 Atl. 667; Carr v. Adams, 70 N. H. 622, 45 Atl. 1084; Story v. Railroad, 70 N. H. 364, 367, 48 Atl. 288; Parsons v. Durham, 70 N. H. 44, 46, 47 Atl. 600; Jaquith v. Benoit, 70 N. H. 1, 45 Atl. 714; Hale v. Jaques, 69 N. H. 91; Eames v. Stevens, 26 N. H. 117, 121. It has been held that a statute which directs that a court may do a thing on good cause shown vests a discretion in the court. People v. Sessions, 62 How. Prac. 415; Kendall v. Briley, 86 N. C. 56; Kerchner v. Singletary, 15 S. C. 535. "Judicial discretion, in its technical legal sense, is the name of the decision of certain questions of fact by the court." Darling v. Westmoreland, 52 N. H. 401, 408, 18 Am. Rep. 55; Bundy v. Hyde, 50 N. H. 116, 120. It is in fact conceded in the plaintiff's brief that whether good cause exists in a given case is a question of fact. This conclusion, assented to by the plaintiff and supported by the authorities, is decisive of his exception. Whether good cause was shown—what justice required—has been found as a fact from the evidentiary facts reported, by the tribunal having jurisdiction to find the fact. Such a finding, if supported by any competent evidence, cannot be set aside except under such circumstances as would authorize the setting aside of the verdict of a jury as against the weight of the evidence, i. e., that the result was produced by passion, partiality, or corruption, or that the trier of fact unwittingly fell into a plain mistake. Colburn v. Groton, 66 N. H. 151, 154, 28 Atl. 95, 22 L. R. A. 763; Norris v. Clark, 72 N. H. 442, 444, 57 Atl. 334.

In this case the appellant was the moving party; the burden was on him to establish his contention. The question, therefore, is not whether some fact found authorizes or requires the dismissal of his appeal, because the absence of sufficient evidence to prove the affirmative of the issue to the satisfaction of the trier of fact is as fatal to his case as the most conclusive evidence against his claim could be. The question is not whether this court, sitting as triers of the fact, would have found the same or a different verdict upon the facts stated, but merely whether any fact or facts reported so conclusively establish that justice requires the granting of the plaintiff's petition that the refusal to do so upon all the facts found, with all the inferences that might with reason be drawn from them, is plainly unreasonable. In other words, is it apparent that the court unwittingly fell into a plain mistake, or is any fact found inconsistent as matter of law with the verdict (Concord Coal Co. v. Ferrin, 71 N. H. 833, 835, 51 Atl. 283, 93 Am. St. Rep. 496); for no other ground upon which the conclusion of the court can be reversed is suggested.

By the will and codicil the plaintiff was given the real estate in fee, subject to a life estate in one-half to Mrs. Hale, Mrs. Jaques' mother. After deducting pecuniary legacies, he was also given a life estate in one-half of the personal property, the other half being given to Mrs. Hale for life, remainder to Mrs. Chandler. The problem presented to the petitioner was whether he should take such estate, or one-half of the whole, both real and personal, in fee. He was informed as to his rights, and, it is found, must have understood it was for his pecuniary advantage to insist upon his distributive share under the statute, while it was for the ultimate advantage of Mrs. Chandler that the will should not be waived. It was alleged that the parties interested to have the appellant abide by the will entertained feelings of hostility toward him, which they concealed for the purpose of inducing him to forego his right to waive the will, and it is found that, if during the year Mr. Jaques had anticipated the legal controversies and bitter feelings which have since developed, he would have waived the will. But the charge of concealment for the purpose of inducing Mr. Jaques not to waive the will is not found to be proved. It is found it was not proved. Whatever resentment or ill feeling arose during the year, it is found Mr. Jaques, as a reasonable man, ought to have anticipated would result from the course pursued by him. Much of the trouble arose from the fact that the parties directly interested were coexecutors and were of such temperament that they could not work together without irritation, friction, and ill feeling. This, it is found, both parties must have known. A waiver of the will while both parties remained executors would probably not have lessened the difficulties encountered. Substantially the same, if not greater, trouble would probably have ensued in a division of the property which gave one-half in fee to Mr. Jaques, as in attempting to make one which gave him half for life. Most of the controversies appear to have arisen since the year expired.

It is further claimed that within the year Mr. Jaques did not know the value of the estate. Upon this point it is found that Mr. Jaques had full knowledge respecting his wife's property, and that there was no fact relating to its nature, location, situation, or amount of which he was ignorant during the year after her death. This finding would seem to be conclusive. The argument, however, is based upon another finding as to the securities of the estate. A considerable portion of the estate consisted of stock in the Manhattan Brass Company and of a claim against that company for money loaned. It is found that at the time of Mrs. Jaques' death Mr. Jaques could not accurately estimate the value of this portion of the estate. There has been no change in the value of this portion of the estate, except what has been brought about by improved management and business conditions. It appeared that Mr. Jaques was a stockholder and officer in the brass company for many years, and had full knowledge of, and was familiar with, all its financial and business interests. It is not found that Mr. Jaques was misled in any way, or that, if he had anticipated the improvement in the value of the stock and claim, which it appears to have been conceded took place, he would have waived the will. In the absence of such findings, it cannot be held as matter of law that he should be permitted to waive the will because of such change which, so far as appears, may have been anticipated by him. The substance of both claims is the same—a change in the situation after the year. If such a change is evidence which would authorize a decree for the plaintiff, a point not now decided, it does not require it as matter of law.

The question between the parties was one of fact. That fact has been tried and determined, without exception to any ruling of law by the trial court. An exception to the finding of fact upon evidence, even if the evidence is complex and conflicting, does not invoke the jurisdiction of this court. Searles v. Churchill, 69 N. H. 530, 43 Atl. 184.

PRIOR v. FULLER.

REARDON v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Hillsborough. Dec. 5, 1905.)

TRIAL—EVIDENCE—EXCEPTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF OBJECTION.

Where a witness testified that he saw defendant at a certain time and place and overheard a conversation between him and the plaintiff, an objection to an inquiry as to what the conversation was, on the ground that it was not sufficiently established that the person whom the witness heard in conversation with plaintiff was the defendant, presented a question of fact and not of law.

Exceptions from Superior Court; Pike, Judge.

Actions of assumpsit by James E. Prior and by Timothy F. Reardon against Herbert A. Fuller. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant excepts. Exception overruled.

Assumpsit, for services. The actions were tried together at the January term, 1905, of the superior court. The plaintiff Reardon testified that he saw the defendant at a certain time and place, and overheard a conversation between him and the plaintiff Prior. The defendant objected to an inquiry as to what the conversation was, upon the ground that it was not sufficiently established that the person whom the witness heard in conversation with Prior was the defendant. The objection was overruled, and the defendant filed a bill of exceptions, which was allowed.

William W. Risk and Edgar I. Kendall, for plaintiffs. Vere Goldthwaite and Wallace B. Clement, for defendant.

PARSONS, C. J. Whether the person whose conversation with the plaintiff was heard by the witness was the defendant or some other was a question of fact. There being evidence tending to show that such person was the defendant (Glauber Mfg. Co. v. Voter, 70 N. H. 332, 47 Atl. 612), the objection that it was insufficient to establish the fact goes merely to the weight of the evidence, and raises no question of law.

Exception overruled. All concurred.

EDGERLY v. EDGERLY et al.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Belknap. Dec. 5, 1905.)

1. WILLS—PROBATE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

On an application for probate of a will, the burden is on the proponent to show that the will was not the result of undue influence, so that a mere absence of evidence on such issue is fatal to the allowance of the will.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 389.]

2. SAME—PRESUMPTIONS.

A presumption in favor of the validity of a will executed with all the formalities required by law by a testator of age and of sound mind does not arise when the will is shown to have been executed under circumstances which might have amounted to undue influence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 889.]

8. SAME—EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

On an application for probate of a will, evidence held to require submission of the question of undue influence to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 769.]

Transferred from Superior Court; Peaslee, Judge.

Application by John W. Edgerly, as executor of the will of Mary F. Calef, deceased, for probate thereof, to which Frank G. Edgerly and others filed objections, on the ground of undue influence and insanity. On the first issue the probate court directed a verdict for plaintiff, subject to exception, and the jury disagreed on the second. Defendants appealed. Case transferred to Supreme Court. Exception sustained.

The parties are nephews and heirs at law of the testatrix. There was evidence that she was equally fond of them and had expressed an intention of dying intestate. The will gives substantially all her property to the plaintiff, who lived in the same town with the testatrix, managed all her business for a number of years, and was desirous that she should make a will in his favor. At the date of the will the testatrix was more than 80 years old and in feeble health. Her mind was impaired to such an extent that she was not likely to form new ideas, but could be easily influenced to accede to the wishes of others. There was evidence that she was afflicted with senile dementia, a disease which produces failure of perception, memory, reason, and judgment. While she was in this condition, the plaintiff carried her to a scrivener, and the will was executed. The plaintiff remained at the scrivener's office during all the time required for drawing and executing the will, except that he went out for the purpose of procuring witnesses.

Jewell, Owen & Veazey and Samuel C. Eastman, for plaintiff. William H. Sawyer, John H. Albin, and Shannon & Tilton, for defendants.

YOUNG, J. The question to be considered is not whether it is more probable than otherwise that Mrs. Calef's will was procured by undue influence, but whether the evidence has any tendency to prove that it was so procured. The burden was on the plaintiff to show that it was not. Patten v. Cilley, 67 N. H. 520, 42 Atl. 47; Whitman v. Morey, 63 N. H. 448, 2 Atl. 899; Hardy v. Merrill, 56 N. H. 227, 22 Am. Rep. 441; Boardman v. Woodman, 47 N. H. 120; Judge of Probate v. Stone, 44 N. H. 593; Perkins v. Perkins, 39 N. H. 163. Since this burden was on him, the mere absence of evidence would not authorize the court to order a verdict in his favor. Absence of all evidence tending to prove how the will was procured would be as fatal to his cause as the most conclusive proof that it was produced by undue influence. Jaques v. Chandler, 73 N. H. —, 62 Atl. 718. In other words, unless there was evidence tending to sustain the validity of the will, a verdict should have been directed for the defendants. If there is usually a presumption in favor of the validity of a will, when it appears that it was executed with all the formalities required by law, and that the testator was 21 years of age and of sound mind, it is a presumption of fact and not of law, and does not arise, as will hereinafter be shown, when the will is executed under circumstances which might have been found to exist in this case. If there was evidence tending to sustain the validity of the will, and also evidence tending to prove that it was procured by undue influence, that issue should have been submitted to the jury. If there was any evidence to sustain that issue, whether such an inference should be drawn from it was a question of fact. The fact that an inference unfavorable to the validity of a will, which may be drawn when it appears that a person who was dependent upon or subject to the control of another (Woodbury v. Woodbury, 141 Mass. 329, 5 N. H. 275, 55 Am. Rep. 479) makes a will in that other's favor, may be rebutted by showing that the transaction was fair and honest, does not change the question of whether or not it has been rebutted from one of fact to one of law. Whenever facts that would sustain the will are put in evidence, together with other facts from which an inference unfavorable to its validity may be drawn, the question of whether the unfavorable inference should be drawn, and if so whether it has been rebutted, are both questions of fact, for they are the same questions which arise on every motion to set a verdict aside as against the weight of the evidence; and in this state the questions arising on such a motion are questions of fact. Prior v. Fuller, 73 N. H. —, 62 Atl. 716; Perkins v. Roberge, 69 N. H. 171, 39 Atl. 583; Willard v. Sullivan, 69 N. H. 491, 45 Atl. 400. Therefore the sole legal question raised by the defendants' exception is whether there was any evidence from which an inference unfavorable to the validity of the will could be drawn.

Experience has shown that in the great majority of cases transactions are not fair and honest in which a person procures a gift from one who is dependent upon him or in some way under his control. Consequently, whenever it appears that the donor was dependent upon or under the control of the donee, and that the latter took an active part in procuring the gift, it may be inferred that the gift was procured by undue influence. In this case, it could be found that at the time the will was made the plaintiff was the confidential adviser of the testatrix in respect to all her business affairs, and that she was dependent upon him and subject to his control in respect to such matters; that her condition, physical and mental, was such that she was hardly capable of forming new ideas, but could be easily influenced to do as he wished; that she had formed an intention of dying intestate, but that he, anxious to have her make a will in his favor and knowing her condition, took her to a scrivener and remained with her while she executed a will giving him substantially all her property. Although there is a difference of opinion as to whether the inference which may be drawn from these facts is one of fact or of law, all courts agree that an inference unfavorable to the validity of the will may be drawn from them. In other words, all courts hold that they have a tendency to prove that the will was procured by undue influence. Burnham v. Heselton, 82 Me. 495, 20 Atl. 80, 9 L. R. A. 90; Patten v. Cilley, 67 N. H. 520, 528, 42 Atl. 47; In re Barney, 70 Vt. 352, 40 Atl. 1027; Woodbury v. Woodbury, 141 Mass. 320, 5 N. E. 275, 55 Am. Rep. 479; Drake's Appeal, 45 Conn. 9; Turner's Appeal, 72 Conn. 305, 44 Atl. 310; In re Smith's Will, 95 N. Y. 516; Gilham's Case, 64 N. J. Eq. 715, 52 Atl. 690; *Herster v. App. 629, 57 S. W. 584; McParland v. Larkin, 155 Ill. 84, 39 N. E. 609; Maynard v. Vinton, 59 Mich. 139, 26 N. W. 401, 60 Am. Rep. 276; Severance v. Severance, 90 Mich. 417, 52 N. H. 664, 38 Atl. 1099, on which the plaintiff relies. In that case there was no evidence that the beneficiaries were present when the codicil was made, so there was no direct evidence that they induced the testator to make it; but in this case it could be found that it was the plaintiff, and not the testatrix, who made the will. Tyler v. Gardiner, 35 N. Y. 559, 589; DeLafield v. Parish, 25 N. Y. 9, 35, 92.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Windham. Jan. 28, 1906.)

WILLS—LEGACIES—INTEREST ON LEGACY.

Pecuniary legacies draw interest after one year from the death of the testator, unless the will provides otherwise, regardless of the pendency of a contest delaying the settlement of the estate and the participation in that contest by the legatees claiming interest.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, §§ 1849-1853.]

Exceptions from Windham County Court; Tyler, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Julia F. Woodward, deceased. There was a final decree of distribution, from which the executor appealed to the county court which rendered a different judgment, and the legatees excepted. Judgment reversed.

Ann J. Stoddard deceased at Westminster September 29, 1899, leaving a will which was duly probated by the probate court within and for the district of Westminster in the state of Vermont, on the 3d day of February, 1900. Ira B. Holton, Abbie L. Buck, and Anna O. Phelps, who were heirs at law of the deceased and also legatees under said will, appealed from the probate and allowance of said will, which appeal is dated February 8, 1900. The cause was tried by jury at the September term, 1901, of Windham county court, and resulted in a verdict and judgment establishing said will. Exceptions were taken by said contestants to the Supreme Court. While the case was pending in Supreme Court, said exceptions were waived, and on December 12, 1901, said judgment of the county court establishing said will was affirmed and certified to said probate court. Such proceedings were then had in said probate court that said court made a final decree of distribution of said estate on the theory that the specific cash legacies should draw interest after one year from the death of the testatrix. From this decree the executor of said will appealed to the Windham county court. Said court, at its April term, 1903, rendered judgment on the theory that said legacies should draw interest after one year from the final establishment of said will by said judgment of the Supreme Court. To this judgment said legatees excepted.

Argued before MUNSON, START, WATSON, STAFFORD, and HASELTON, JJ.

Clarke C. Fettes, for plaintiff. E. L. Waterman, J. L. Martin, and E. W. Gibson, for defendants.

MUNSON, J. The case calls for a determination of the time from which interest should be allowed on legacies given without testamentary provision governing the allowance. The final allowance of the will which gave the legacies in suit was delayed by an appeal from the decree of the probate court and the taking of the exceptions to the Supreme Court. The county court allowed interest after the expiration of one year from the time when the will was finally established.

This court has undertaken to state the rule governing the allowance of interest on legacies in two cases of comparatively recent date, Bradford Academy v. Grover, 55 Vt. 462, and Baptist Convention v. Ladd, 58 Vt. 95, 4 Atl. 634. In neither of these cases was the court called upon to determine the rule. In Bradford Academy v. Grover it was said:

that legacies ordinarily draw interest after one year from the death of the testator; but there the will directed the payment of interest after the happening of a certain event, and the scope of the decision was merely that the general rule may be controlled by an express provision of the will. In Baptist Convention v. Ladd the court stated the rule as follows: "Legacies in this state, unless otherwise controlled by the will, draw interest after one year from the probate of the will." In this case the legacy had been paid, and the court held, that the payment was so made and accepted, that there was an accord and satisfaction. The payment was long after the expiration of one year from the probate of the will, and no interest whatever was included in the payment. It being considered that no interest was recoverable, it was not necessary to determine the amount, and no use was made of the rule as stated. There are some well-established exceptions to the general rule, one of which was considered in Smith v. Moore, 25 Vt. 127; but a review of these exceptions is not essential to our inquiry.

The rule adopted by the ecclesiastical courts, which has become the settled rule of the common law, requires the payment of interest after one year from the death of the testator. But in states where the statute allows one year from the granting of letters for the payment of debts and legacies it is generally, but not universally, held that legacies draw interest only after the expiration of a year from the issuance of the letters. Some of these statutes are specific as regards the time of payment, while others are similar to ours. Our statute does not itself fix a time for the payment, nor forbid the payment before a specified time, but authorizes the probate court to allow a time which shall not in the first instance exceed one year, and provides for an extension of the time when the circumstances of the estate require it. We think that statutes of this character were not intended to change the rule regarding the allowance of interest on legacies. This view was taken, and persisted in, by the more prominent surrogate courts of New York, until the contrary was unmistakably adjudged by the Court of Appeals. Matter of McGowan, 124 N. Y. 526, 26 N. E. 1098. The same view was afterwards taken by the New Jersey court, in an opinion based expressly upon the reasoning of the New York surrogates. Davison v. Rake, 45 N. J. Eq. 767, 18 Atl. 752.

It has always been considered that convenience requires the adoption of some definite general rule to govern cases of this class, and it has always been conceded that any rule that may be adopted will work some inequality, and perhaps hardship, in exceptional cases. Courts have therefore been content to adopt such rule as seemed to them most likely to prove reasonable and convenient in cases generally. It seems unnecessary to consider the various reasons that have been advanced in support of the rule which determines the time by the death of the testator. It may be that some of them have little force when the rule is applied in connection with the administration laws generally prevailing in this country. But the rule has certain advantages which we consider sufficient to overcome all objections. It bases the allowance of interest upon an initial point that cannot be moved by the various accidents of settlement, and thus enables a testator to give certainty to his bequests without the use of special provisions. It accords substantially with what may properly be considered the intention of a testator whose will is silent as to interest; for it is doubtless true that wills are ordinarily made in expectation of the usual course of settlement. But, if the probating of the will or the granting of letters is made the controlling factor, the value of a bequest may be lessened by a postponement of payment without interest, on the happening of a great variety of contingencies which the testator cannot be supposed to have in contemplation. When this takes place the scheme of the ordinary will is reversed, and the more favored bequests are lessened in value to increase the remainder.

Whatever the rule in this state may have been heretofore, we hold that pecuniary legacies draw interest after one year from the death of the testator, unless the will provides otherwise. This case cannot be made an exception on the ground that the contest which delayed the settlement of the estate was participated in by the legatees who are claiming the interest. Kent v. Dunham, 106 Mass. 590.

Judgment reversed, and judgment for the face of the legacies, with interest after one year from the death of the testator, to be certified.

BELHEUMER v. THOMAS.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Chittenden. Jan. 31, 1906.)

RELEASE—VALIDITY—FRAUD.

Where plaintiff's attorney fraudulently procured from plaintiff a release of the cause of action and delivered the same to defendant on the payment of a sum of money by defendant, who accepted the release in good faith, believing that it was properly obtained from plaintiff, and the attorney appropriated the money to his own use, the release was a bar, although plaintiff was guilty of no negligence in relying on the representations of her attorney and in signing the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 5, Cent. Dig. Attorney and Client, §§ 209-216; vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Estoppel, §§ 188-196.]

Exceptions from Chittenden County Court; Haselton, Judge.

Bastardy proceedings by Rose Belheumer against Harry R. Thomas. The case was heard on an agreed statement of facts, in which a release was set up. The court ruled that the release was no bar, to which ruling defendant excepted, and the case was passed to the Supreme Court before hearing on the merits. Judgment for defendant.

John J. Enright and Edmund O. Mower, for plaintiff. Brown & Hopkins and V. A. Bullard, for defendant.

TYLER, J. This is a complaint for bastardy. The defendant pleaded the general issue and the plaintiff's release of the cause of action. The case was heard below upon an agreed statement of facts, which is, in substance, that the plaintiff on March 16, 1904, brought a complaint before a justice of the peace, through one Grossman, who acted as her attorney; that on the same day she brought another suit of the same kind, upon a similar, but distinct, cause of action, against the defendant, which suit is pending in county court; that this suit was entered July 8, 1904.

The release, signed, sealed, and sworn to by the plaintiff, and witnessed, reads: "Received of H. R. Thomas satisfaction in full of all claims and demands of every kind and nature that I have or can have against him to this date, meaning hereby especially to discharge the two proceedings brought against him by me before F. G. Webster, justice of the peace, on the 16th day of March, 1904, and to discharge all claims that I have or can have against said Thomas in respect of the matters complained of in said proceedings." It was agreed that the plaintiff never gave her attorney authority to settle either of said cases, unless this release was authority, and that he obtained her signature by false representations and fraud, and that he pretended to read the contents of the paper to her before she signed it, and represented that it was drawn for the purpose of bringing another suit against the defendant. It was agreed that the plaintiff, who was 19 years of age, had no knowledge of legal matters, and that she relied entirely upon the representations of Grossman in executing the paper; that the defendant on March 26, 1904, paid Grossman $50 for the paper, which sum the latter retained, the plaintiff receiving no part of it; and that she did not learn until April 22, 1904, that a release had been given to the defendant, and that he had paid money to Grossman for it. Immediately upon learning these facts she notified defendant's attorney, through another attorney whom she had employed, that the release had been obtained from her by fraud, that she had given Grossman no authority to settle the cases, and that she repudiated the pretended settlement. The defendant and his attorneys had no knowledge that the plaintiff had been deceived by Grossman, and he paid the sum of $50 in good faith in settlement of the two suits.

It is a manifest hardship to the plaintiff that she has been defrauded of her right of action, if she had one; and it would be a hardship to the defendant, if he were compelled to make a defense to the suit, having paid $50 for a release of the cause of action. One of these parties must suffer loss in consequence of the fraudulent act of Grossman. Which shall it be? It appears that the defendant acted in good faith in paying for and taking the release. The paper was shown to him with the plaintiff's signature attached, and it was witnessed and sworn to. He accepted and paid for it, and was innocent of any wrong in that transaction. The plaintiff was innocent of any wrongdoing in signing the release and allowing Grossman to depart with it. It was not necessary that the case should show that she was negligent or careless in signing the paper and intrusting it to Grossman without knowing its contents. It was sufficient that by her act she made it possible for Grossman to accomplish what he did, to make herself amenable to the rule that, where through the fraudulent act of a third person, one of two innocent parties must suffer, he who has clothed such third person with the means of perpetrating the fraud must bear the loss. The case is in principle like Passumpsic Bank v. Goss and Page, 31 Vt. 315, where Page signed a note with Goss, as his surety, payable to the bank, under an agreement with Goss that the latter should not use the note unless he obtained another surety upon it; but in violation of the agreement Goss procured the note to be discounted. It was held that this agreement constituted no defense; the bank officers having no knowledge of it. In both cases the instruments were apparently perfected when they were presented, and there was nothing upon them to indicate that they were not ready for delivery. The case is different from Goodman v. Eastman, 4 N. H. 455, where two men signed a note for $20, payable to a third person, and the signer, who was intrusted with it, raised it to $120. There the court said that the alteration was in effect a forgery. In that case the alteration was made after the note passed from the hands of the defendant, and when he could not have prevented it. See National Bank v. Baltimore, etc., R. R. (Md.) 59 Atl. 134, 105 Am. St. Rep. at page 331.

Judgment reversed, and judgment for defendant.

ABBOTT et ux. v. FLINT'S ADM'R.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Orange. Jan. 31, 1906.)

1. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS — CHARACTER OF PROOF REQUIRED.

Equity will not correct a mistake in a written instrument, except on clear and undoubted testimony.

2. SAME—MISTAKES IN DESCRIPTION.

Where both the grantor and the grantees in a deed supposed, when the deed was executed and for several years thereafter, that it included all of a certain farm including a tract of so-called gore land, which had once had a distinct identity, but between which and the rest of the farm there was no definite boundary, and which had lost its separate identity, equity will reform the deed so as to include the gore land on its subsequently being discovered that it was not in fact included by the deed.

Exceptions from Orange County Court; Haselton, Judge.

Bill by Eugene S. Abbott and another against Russell A. Flint's administrator. A decree was rendered for the orators, and defendant brings exceptions. Affirmed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, WATSON, and POWERS, JJ.

N. L. Boyden, for orators. March M. Wilson and Frank Plumley, for defendant.

TYLER, J. The master finds that Russell A. Flint died seised of certain real estate situated in Braintree, and, among other parcels, a certain 10-acre lot of gore land, in the northwest corner of the town, between lot No. 52, in the Second division, and the west line of the town. The title to this gore land is the subject-matter in dispute. H. W. Flitts, as administrator of Flint's estate, in October, 1893, sold by auction to the orator Eugene S. Abbott, the "Biglow Farm," which comprised, as all the parties supposed, all the land that Flint had owned in the northwest corner of that town at the time of his decease. Adjacent to this farm and lying between it and the west corner of the town is the gore land, between which and the farm there are no definite bounds. The deed was made to the oratrix, Ella M., by the direction of her husband, the farm being described by reference to deeds from certain persons to Flint. The administrator intended to convey all the land that belonged to Flint's estate situated in that part of the town, though he had no knowledge of the gore land as a separate entity. The orator Eugene S., knew of its existence, and both orators supposed it was conveyed to them by the administrator's deed. The orators occupied this land with said farm several years after the purchase, and they and the administrator for many years supposed it was theirs, when the discovery was made that it was not included in the description in the deed. The facts that Flint, after his purchase of the land in controversy, maintained no boundary between it and the Biglow farm, that he made it a part of that farm, occupied and used it as such, and had it set in the grand list as part thereof, show clearly that its identity as a separate piece of land had been lost long before the administrator's deed was given to the oratrix. The only shortage in the deed was that it described the land conveyed as acquired from certain persons, when the 10-acre piece was in fact acquired from a different person. The administrator had no intention to except it from the conveyance. He did not know of its separate existence, but he meant to convey all the land in that corner of the town that Flint had owned at the time of his death. Eugene S. knew about the gore land, but supposed it had ceased to have a distinct existence from the "Biglow Farm," and that it then was a part of it. His wife supposed that she was purchasing all the land that Flint had owned in that locality. This piece was required to make up the 318 acres that the Biglow farm was said to contain.

A court of chancery will correct mistakes in conveyances, when clearly and unequivocally proved, and make the instrument such, both in form and effect, as will fulfill the intention of the parties. This rule is laid down in all elementary works and is recognized in Beardsley v. Knight, 10 Vt. 185, which is cited with approval in 33 Am. Dec. 193, where Kennard v. George, 44 N. H. 446, and many other cases are referred to in the notes. The rule is aptly stated in 24 Am. & Eng. Ency., in the notes upon page 650, that when through ignorance, inadvertence, negligence, or otherwise, the description in a deed does not in fact embrace the land which the parties intended it should, and which they supposed it did, it is considered a mistake of fact, and the description can be reformed, though it is exactly as the parties intended it should be. See Goode v. Riley, 153 Mass. 585, 28 N. E. 228, and other cases there cited. This rule is also fully explained and illustrated both in the opinion and in the notes in Coles v. Bowne, 10 Paige (N. Y.) 526, 4 Lawy. Ed. 1077; Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 852-855. It is the rule, as the defendant contends, that equity will not correct a mistake in a written instrument, except on clear and undoubted testimony. Lyman's Adm'r v. Little, 15 Vt. 576. It is generally said in the books that the court must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that a mistake has been committed, and in the present case the master's report makes it clear that both parties intended a conveyance of all the land in a certain locality, but by a mutual mistake, they omitted to describe it specifically in the deed, which brings the case within the rule.

The rule is different where there is a misunderstanding as to anything material contained in the deed, for there mutuality of consent is wanting. As was said by Mr. Justice Swayne, in First National Bank v. Hall, 101 U. S. 43, 25 L. Ed. 825, the requisite mutuality of assent as to such thing is wanting; consequently the supposed contract does not exist, and neither party is bound. In the view of the law, in such a case, there has been only a negotiation, resulting in a failure to agree. What has occurred is as if it were not, and the rights of the parties are to be determined accordingly. Further on he says: "It is essential to the validity of a contract that the parties should have consented to the same subject-matter in the same sense. They must have contracted ad idem." This rule applied to the case at bar entitles the orators to relief, for the parties did consent to the same subject-matter in the same sense. There was perfect mutuality of assent in respect to the land, the title to which was to pass to the orators by the administrator's deed, but by a mutual mistake a description of the gore land was omitted.

No exception was taken to the master's report, and no question is before us, but that the master made his findings with the requisite degree of certainty.

Decree affirmed, and cause remanded.

MAHONEY'S ADM'R v. RUTLAND R. CO.
(Supreme Court of Vermont. Rutland. Jan. 26, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF VICE PRINCIPAL—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for the death of a railroad engineer, caused by a collision of a regular train with a train running on special orders, evidence held insufficient to show negligence on the part of the train dispatcher.

2. SAME—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

An engineer on an extra train received orders to proceed to the next station south, and reported his departure in accordance with his orders at 5:06, timing it ahead, in accordance with custom, to 5:10. The telegraph operator failed to transmit the report of the departure to the dispatcher in accordance with the railroad's rules. A regular north-bound train left the station to which the extra was running at 5:18. The stations were only about seven miles apart, and the two trains collided, thereby causing the death of the engineer on the regular train. Held, that the telegraph operator's failure to report the departure of the extra train, so that the train dispatcher could have held the regular train at the south station, was the proximate cause of the accident.

Exceptions from Rutland County Court; Tyler, Judge.

Case for negligence by Dennis Mahoney's administrator against the Rutland Railroad Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant excepted. Reversed.

Plaintiff's intestate was the engineer on the engine drawing the "Flyer." On January 2, 1908, Cowee was the engineer running engine numbered 192, which was drawing a train from Rutland to Shelburne, and one Parris was the conductor of said train. This train left Rutland on said day about 7:30 o'clock a. m., under an order of the train dispatcher to run extra to Middlebury. On its arrival at Middlebury it received another order to run extra to Burlington. This train was distributing salt and coal to stations from Rutland to Shelburne. It reached Shelburne about 3:30 p. m., and on completing its work at that station would return to Rutland; but it was necessary for Cowee to turn his engine, take water, and clean his fire before starting back to Rutland, and, as there was no turntable at Shelburne, it was decided to run down to Burlington, which was the station next north from Shelburne. Before leaving Shelburne for Burlington Parris and Cowee consulted the time-table of regular trains, and found that trains numbered 21 and 27, which were scheduled on said time-table and were then moving north, were then overdue, and had not then arrived at Shelburne, and that train numbered 65 on said time-table, and known as the "Flyer," was moving north, and was due to leave Shelburne at 5:18 p. m. Cowee went to Burlington with his engine 192, having with him on his engine one Chase, as fireman, and one Cockran, as brakeman, and went to the freighthouse, which was situated in the freightyard, and which was the proper place to report his arrival and to ask for orders, if any were needed. He registered his arrival at Burlington at 4:50 p. m. in a book kept at said freighthouse for that purpose, and then asked the train dispatcher at Rutland, through Tynan, the telegraph operator at Burlington, for orders. Said train dispatcher thereupon sent to Cowee the order which is quoted in the opinion, and which was taken off the wires by Tynan, read by him to Cowee, repeated back by Tynan to the train dispatcher, who gave the O. K. signal and made the order complete at 5:06 p. m.; and Tynan then delivered a copy of the order to Cowee, who thereupon registered in the book aforesaid, under the column headed "Departure," the figures "5:10." This entry of departure was not reported to the train dispatcher at Rutland until after midnight, as the collision broke down the wires, so that they were not available till near midnight. Cowee, with his engine 192, left Burlington for Shelburne at 5:10 p. m., or as soon thereafter as he could get off. The Flyer left Shelburne at 5:18 p. m. The distance from Burlington to Shelburne is between 6½ and 7 miles. At a point about 1½ miles north of Shelburne the Flyer collided with Cowee's said engine, and thereby plaintiff's intestate and his fireman, on the engine drawing the Flyer, and said Cowee, were instantly killed, and said Chase and Cockran received injuries whereof they died within an hour or two after the collision. No claim was made that plaintiff's intestate was in fault in any respect. At the close of the evidence defendant moved for a verdict on the ground that the evidence did not show any negligence of defendant which caused the death of plaintiff's intestate, and if such death was caused by the negligence of Cowee, or by that of Tynan, or by that of both combined, that both Cowee and Tynan were fellow servants of Mahoney, and that the negligence of Cowee, in moving his engine onto the main line in violation of the rules and of the law of the state, was the proximate cause of Mahoney's death. The court overruled this motion, to which defendant excepted.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and MUNSON, START, WATSON, and HASELTON, JJ.

Butler & Maloney, for plaintiff. H. H. Powers, P. M. Meldon, and F. S. Platt, for defendant.

MUNSON, J. The court treated the train dispatcher as a vice principal of the defendant, and no question was or is made as to the correctness of this view. The court definitely instructed the jury that Cowee, the engineer of the extra train, was a fellow servant of plaintiff's decedent, and in connection therewith explained the rule applicable to that relation. The case was submitted upon grounds which assumed that Tynan, the telegraph operator at the Burlington freightyard, was also a fellow servant of the deceased. The only questions left to the jury regarding Tynan were whether he was a competent operator, and if not, whether his incompetency caused the collision, and, if it did, whether the defendant was negligent in employing him. If there was a failure in this connection to distinguish sufficiently between a mere act of neglect and the result of incompetency, no exception was taken to it.

The only other question submitted was whether the dispatcher was negligent in not taking further action after completing the order which allowed Cowee to run south from Burlington, and the only bearing given to the question of Tynan's competency was upon his failure to report Cowee's departure, and the effect of that failure on the action and responsibility of the dispatcher. The order was received by Tynan at 5 o'clock, and was thereupon made known to Cowee and repeated to the dispatcher, but was not made complete and effective by the dispatcher's reply until 5:06. The north-bound train known as the "Flyer" was due to leave Shelburne at 5:18. Cowee entered his time of leaving as 5:10 in a register that lay close by Tynan. The rules of the defendant required its operators to promptly record and report to the train dispatcher the time of departure of all trains. Tynan did not attempt to report Cowee's departure before 5:18.

The plaintiff contends that the defendant's delay of nearly six minutes in completing the order, in connection with the Flyer's time of leaving Shelburne, produced a situation which made it his duty to give further instructions; that it was at least his duty, when he failed to receive a speedy report of Cowee's departure, to inquire in regard to it; and that in any event, if Tynan had promptly reported Cowee's time of leaving as registered, the dispatcher could have held the Flyer at Shelburne and prevented the collision. The court gave no definite construction to this order, and no instruction as to what it gave Cowee the right to do, but left it for the jury to say whether the dispatcher ought to have anticipated that Cowee would leave when the order was made effective, and have held the Flyer at Shelburne. The defendant contends that Cowee's departure was in direct violation of the order when read in connection with the rules, and that there was nothing in the situation that called for further action on the part of the dispatcher. The order received by Cowee was as follows: "Engine 192 will run extra Burlington to Rutland; will meet train 21 at Vergennes, and 27 at New Haven Junction." This order is in the form which the rules prescribe for extra trains, and under the form, as embodied in the rules, is the following direction: "A train receiving this order * * * must keep clear of all regular trains, as required by rule." Rule 86 provides that an inferior train must keep out of the way of a superior train; and Cowee's train was inferior to the Flyer. So this was not an order for Cowee to leave Burlington at once, or at any particular time. It operated merely as a clearance, which permitted him to leave subject to the rule. It authorized him to run from Burlington to Rutland, going from station to station as he might be able to without getting upon the schedule time of regular trains. The dispatcher had a right to assume that the train would be run in this manner, unless there was something in the situation, as known to him, which ought to have led him to expect the contrary.

We find nothing in the circumstances disclosed by the evidence that tends to charge the dispatcher with a further duty. The fact that the order was sent six minutes before it was put in force could not have been expected to confuse a competent engineer. The dispatcher could properly assume that the engineer would determine his action with reference to the time left available by the completed order. The distance from the Burlington freightyard to Shelburne is not less than 6½ miles. An extra is not only required to keep off the time of regular trains, but is required to allow five minutes at the place of meeting for taking the siding and closing the switch. This required that Cowee be at Shelburne at 5:18, and, making the least possible allowance for getting started after the order was made complete, it would require a run of over a mile a minute; and, if a use of three of the five minutes allowed for side tracking had been contemplated, it would then have required a speed of over 40 miles an hour. But the dispatcher was not bound to anticipate such a gross violation of the five-minute rule, and without this it is clear that ordinary caution could not have anticipated a departure. Moreover, the question whether a train of this character can get off in season to reach another station within the time allowed by the rules will often depend upon local conditions which are known to the trainman in charge, but cannot be known to the dispatcher. These may include the location of the train in the yard, the number of switches to be passed in reaching the main track, and the condition of the yard as regards other movements. Inasmuch as an extra is required to protect itself against regular trains, it is evident that the starting of such a train must be left, within proper limits, to the judgment of the one in charge of it. In these circumstances, there was nothing in the failure to receive a report of Cowee's departure to excite the dispatcher's apprehension. So we find nothing in the evidence that tends to show negligence on the part of the dispatcher.

It remains to consider the bearing of Tynan's conduct upon the question of liability. There was evidence tending to show that Tynan was ignorant of what the rules required of him in regard to reporting the departure of trains, and that the defendant was negligent in failing to ascertain it. This required the submission of the case to the jury, if there was evidence tending to show that the accident was due to Tynan's omission operating concurrently with Cowee's negligence. So it is necessary to inquire as to the results that would probably have followed from a prompt report of Cowee's departure as registered. If Tynan had acted at 5:08, this would have given 10 minutes in which to stop the Flyer at Shelburne—an allowance which would probably have covered all chances of delay in the dispatcher's office and at Shelburne. There was evidence tending to show that one purpose of the rule requiring a prompt report of departures is to keep the dispatcher constantly advised of the actual condition of the main line, and that one benefit contemplated from the requirement of prompt transmission is the additional protection thus afforded. It is clear that, if the dispatcher had received information which indicated that Cowee was actually leaving for Shelburne on the Flyer's time, it would have been his duty to take measures to prevent the threatened collision. The rules governing the movement of the train would not justify his failure to act, if he had knowledge that the rules were being ignored. So the question will be, what would the dispatcher have understood from the report, if it had been made? It seems that it is customary for trainmen acting in these circumstances to enter their time of departure somewhat in advance of the time of registering, to give them time to get to their trains and work out to the main line, and that unexpected delays sometimes prevent their getting off within the time they allow. But, if Cowee was intending to wait for the Flyer, his time of departure depended upon a certainty, and not a contingency. The time he set for leaving was 5:10. The Flyer was due at Burlington Station, about one-fourth of a mile north of the freightyard, at 5:30. So the time given for leaving was at least 18 minutes before he could leave, if he was to wait for the Flyer. It is to be presumed that on receiving such a report the dispatcher would have acted prudently, and would have done his duty. Ought he to have understood that Cowee had entered this time for leaving, expecting to wait for the Flyer? Or ought he to have understood that he was leaving for Shelburne in disregard of the rules? This was a matter for the jury, and justified the submission of the case, unless it be held that the negligence of Cowee was the sole proximate cause of the accident, and that of Tynan only a remote cause.

We think that upon the case which the plaintiff's evidence tended to establish, Tynan's failure to report was one of two causes which concurred directly in producing the accident. It is true that the defendant had no part in creating the dangerous situation from which the accident resulted. That situation was developed by the negligent act of Cowee. But it was the defendant's duty to exercise, through some system of rules and service, a reasonably efficient supervision of its track and trains, with a view to lessening the perils incident to the operation of a complicated organization by fallible agencies. The first neglect consisted in Cowee's leaving, but the neglect of Cowee, and the neglect of the defendant afterwards, came into a concurrent operation, which continued until the injury was received; Cowee running on the Flyer's time, and the dispatcher improperly left in ignorance of it, when a knowledge of it would have enabled him to have prevented the accident. Into the situation which existed at the time of the collision there had come the further element of the dispatcher's failure to hold the Flyer at Shelburne, when he ought to have had information that an opposing train was on the track. So Tynan's failure was a proximate cause of the accident.

The motion to direct a verdict for the defendant was properly overruled, but the court erred in its submission of the questions touching the dispatcher's duty.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

In re HICKOK'S ESTATE.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Chittenden.
Jan. 26, 1906.)

1. TAXATION — COLLATERAL INHERITANCE — EXEMPTIONS — FOREIGN CORPORATIONS.

Foreign corporations are not within the exemption to Acts 1896, p. 38, No. 46, which taxes collateral inheritances, but exempts property passing "to or for charitable, educational, or religious societies or institutions, the property of which is exempt by law from taxation."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Taxation, § 1699.]

2. SAME — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — PROPORTIONATE CONTRIBUTIONS FOR SUPPORT OF GOVERNMENT.

Const. c. 1, art. 9, providing that every member of society is bound to contribute "his proportion" toward the expense of the protection which the state affords him, is not contravened by Acts 1896, p. 88, No. 46, taxing collateral inheritances; and this, though estates not exceeding $2,000 are exempted.

Exceptions from Chittenden County Court; Munson, Judge.

In the matter of Julia F. Hickok's estate. On appeal from the probate court the case was heard on an agreed statement, and there was judgment pro forma that the legacies were subject to a collateral inheritance tax. The legatees excepted. Affirmed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, WATSON, and POWERS, JJ.

J. E. Cushman, Tax Com'r, for the State. W. L. Burnap, for the estate.

MUNSON, J. Number 46, p. 38, Acts 1896, entitled "An act to tax collateral inheritances," exempts from its operation property passing "to or for charitable, educational, or religious societies or institutions, the property of which is exempt by law from taxation." This exemption is invoked by institutions incorporated by, and located in, the states of Massachusetts, New York, Virginia, and Illinois. The tax commissioner contends that foreign corporations are not within the exemption. It is a well-established general rule that exemptions from taxation are to be strictly construed, and that no claim of exemption can be sustained, unless within the express letter or necessary scope of the exempting clause. Ford v. Delta & Pine Land Co., 164 U. S. 663, 17 Sup. Ct. 230, 41 L. Ed. 590. The particular exemption in question is found in the statutes of other jurisdictions, and has often received the construction for which the commissioner contends. Matter of Prime, 136 N. Y. 347, 32 N. E. 1091, 18 L. R. A. 713; People ex rel. v. Western Seaman's Friend Society, 87 Ill. 246; Minot v. Winthrop, 162 Mass. 113, 38 N. E. 512, 26 L. R. A. 259. It is argued that the exemption is in recognition of the beneficent purpose of these institutions, and that, inasmuch as the purpose is common to them all, wherever located, the exemption should be held applicable to all. But we think, with the authorities above cited, that, in the absence of any language indicative of a different intent, the Legislature must be deemed to have made the exception for the benefit of its own institutions. It is suggested that the use of the word "law" instead of "statute" indicates an intention to include corporations outside our jurisdiction; but our statute is the same in this respect as those construed in the New York and Massachusetts cases above cited. It is true, as further suggested, that in the Matter of Prime, which was cited as an authority in Minot v. Winthrop, there were features peculiar to the New York statute which entered into the consideration of the subject and bore upon the conclusion reached; but we think that these cases may nevertheless be relied upon in support of the state's contention. It was said in Humphreys v. State, 70 Ohio St. 67, 70 N. E. 957, 65 L. R. A. 776, 101 Am. St. Rep. 888, upon a review of the New York and other cases, that the exemption clause of this statute would have related only to their own institutions, even if the words "in the state" had been omitted.

But the main contention of the estate is based upon the phraseology of our Constitution, which declares, in effect, that every member of society is bound to contribute "his proportion" towards the expense of the protection which the state affords him. It is said that this excludes all methods of taxation that are not uniform, equal, and proportional, and that the law in question lacks the required qualities. The case of Curry v. Spencer, 61 N. H. 624, 60 Am. Rep. 337, decided in 1882, supports this position. The New Hampshire Constitution provides for the laying of "proportional" taxes, and declares that an inhabitant is bound to contribute only his share. The court considered that these provisions precluded the imposition of an inheritance tax, whether it was regarded as a tax upon property, or upon a civil right or privilege. It is said in the note to State v. Hamlin, 86 Me. 495, 30 Atl. 76, 25 L. R. A. 632, 41 Am. St. Rep. 569, that Curry v. Spencer is the only case which holds that a tax on inheritance is unconstitutional because not equal and uniform in its operation. But it is claimed in argument that the cases holding the contrary were decided under Constitutions which provide specially for the imposition of excises, or which make the requirements of equality and uniformity applicable only to taxes imposed on real and personal property. It is certain, however, that in one of these cases this restriction to property was not found in any express statement, but was arrived at by inference and construction. Eyre v. Jacob, 14 Grat. 422, 73 Am. Dec. 367. It was said in the New Hampshire case above cited, in arguing the inapplicability of Eyre v. Jacob, that the Virginia Constitution required that taxes on property should be uniform, and that the decision of that case was put expressly upon the ground that the requirement of uniformity applied to property only. The provision referred to was that all property other than slaves should be taxed in proportion to its value. But this clause was preceded by the general declaration that taxation should be equal and uniform throughout the commonwealth, and the court considered the effect of this provision, and said that the inference was strong that property only was in the minds of the framers.

It is clear that the language of our Constitution will not permit this treatment of the question of equality. The provision requiring a proportional contribution cannot be restricted to any particular subject of taxation, for it relates to the entire burden cast upon the taxpayer. It provides that the expenses of government shall be apportioned equally, and not merely that exactions levied upon property shall be equal. The question is what constitutes equality of apportionment within the meaning of this provision; and, in determining this, the basis of the tax in question must be considered. It is now universally conceded that taxes of this character are not taxes upon property, but taxes upon the transmission of property. It is considered that the acquirement of property by descent or will is not a natural right, but a privilege accorded by the state. It is argued that the power to determine the devolution of estates includes the power to exact just and proportional contributions as they pass. And it has been said repeatedly in judicial discussions upon this subject that inheritance charges are not precluded by constitutional provisions requiring uniformity and equality of taxation. We think our constitutional requirement of proportional contributions for the support of the government was not intended to restrict the state to methods of taxation that operate equally upon all its inhabitants, regardless of the variety and measure of the advantages derived from its protection and regulation. A member of the body politic has from the state not only the protection of his property, but the privilege of taking property by descent and by will. It seems clear that privileges of this character, as well as property, are to be considered in determining the just proportion of the individual.

It is suggested, further, that the law is invalid because of the inequality arising from the exemption of estates not exceeding $2,000 in value. The constitutional provision under consideration does not prevent the making of exemptions. Colton v. Montpelier, 71 Vt. 413, 45 Atl. 1039.

Judgment affirmed, to be certified to the probate court.

ALBRIGHT v. UNITED CLAY PRODUCTION CO.

(Superior Court of Delaware. New Castle. Dec. 14, 1904.)

1. AFFIDAVITS—VENUE.

Where an affidavit in support of a foreign attachment did not show that it was taken without the jurisdiction of the notary, it would be presumed that it was taken within his jurisdiction, and was therefore not void for failure to recite the venue.

2. CORPORATIONS—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—ATTACHMENT.

That a corporation had filed a copy of its articles with the Secretary of State, and had appointed an authorized agent within the state, as required by Act March 23, 1903 (22 Del. Laws, p. 824, c. 395), did not make it a domestic corporation to such an extent as to relieve it from liability to be sued by process of foreign attachment.

"[Clifford V. Mannering, Notary Public. Appointed Feb. 21, 1901. State of Delaware. Term 4 Years.]

"Commission recorded in Deed Record O-18, 384. No restriction."

Special appearance by defendant's attorney to move to set aside the judgment and inquisition thereon, and to quash the writ of foreign attachment and the execution issued on said judgment for the following reasons: (1) That the alleged affidavit of the above-named plaintiff, which was filed in said action and upon which said writ of foreign attachment was issued, is insufficient, illegal, and void, because it wholly fails to state or aver at what place the said supposed affidavit was made, or sworn to, or to lay any venue for the same. (2) That when said writ of foreign attachment was issued, the said defendant was not subject to the process of foreign attachment, because, in compliance with an act of the General Assembly of the state of Delaware entitled "An Act in Relation to Foreign Corporations Doing Business in this State," approved March 23, A. D. 1903 (22 Del. Laws, p. 824, c. 395), the said defendant did on or about the 18th day of April, A. D. 1903, file in the office of the Secretary of State of the state of Delaware, a certified copy of its charter or certificate of incorporation, and the name of its authorized agent for this state, which said agent is the Delaware Trust Company, a corporation of the state of Delaware, and did also file in said secretary's office a sworn statement of its assets and liabilities, and did pay to said Secretary of State for the use of the state the sum of $50, and the said Secretary of State did deliver to said agent his certificate under the seal of his office of the filing of such charter.

Argued before LORE, C. J., and GRUBB, J.

J. Frank Ball, for plaintiff. C. W. Smith, for defendant.

LORE, C. J. In the case of Joseph S. Albright v. United Clay Production Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of New Jersey, being a rule to show cause why the judgment should not be opened and vacated, two grounds were presented and argued before the court. The first was that the affidavit on which the writ of foreign attachment was issued contained no venue and was therefore void. We have examined the affidavit, and, while it does not show venue, it does not show in any way that it was taken without the jurisdiction of the notary, and the presumption of law would be therefore that it was taken within his jurisdiction, and it would not be void from the mere absence of venue.

As to the second ground, that when said writ of foreign attachment was issued the said defendant was not subject to process of foreign attachment because he had complied with the act of the General Assembly of the state of Delaware entitled "An Act in Relation to Foreign Corporations Doing Business in this State" (22 Del. Laws, p. 824, c. 395), authorizing and requiring them to designate some agent upon whom process could be served, we do not think that the statute referred to deprives the creditor of the right to attach any property that he may find within the jurisdiction of this state.

For these reasons we discharge the rule.

Rule discharged.

CLAREMONT RY. & LIGHTING CO. v. PUTNEY et al.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Sullivan. Dec. 5, 1905.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN—PRODUCTION OF POWER—CONDEMNATION BY STREET RAILROAD—CHARTER PROVISIONS.

The charter of a street railroad company, authorizing it to acquire such real and personal estate as may be necessary and convenient in the prosecution of its business, does not confer the power of eminent domain; the charter not conferring the power expressly, pointing out any steps to be taken in its exercise, or making any provision for compensation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Eminent Domain, §§ 48-45.]

2. SAME—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION—EXTENT OF AUTHORITY.

General Street Railway Law, § 4 (Laws 1895, p. 868, c. 27, as amended by Laws 1901, p. 586, c. 93), providing that such corporations may take and hold such lands as may be necessary to install and maintain power plants, does not authorize a street railway corporation to condemn land and water privileges to divert streams and procure power with which to operate power plants erected on its own land; but the authority is limited to taking such land as may be necessary for locating or placing power plants in position for use, and maintaining the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Eminent Domain, §§ 43-45.]

Exceptions from Superior Court; Wallace, Judge.

Petition for mandamus by the Claremont Railway & Lighting Company against Henry M. Putney and others, as railroad commissioners, to require them to assess damages occasioned by an alleged taking by plaintiffs of land, etc., belonging to Alexander Roberts. The petition was dismissed, and plaintiffs bring exceptions. Exceptions overruled.

Roberts owns a dam across Sugar river in Claremont, by which he operates a woolen mill. The dam flows back the water of the stream easterly for a distance of 300 feet or more. He also owns a tract of land situated on the south side of the river, the north line of which is the middle of the stream, extending easterly from the easterly limit of the back-flow of the dam about 203 feet. In the last 203 feet there is a natural fall in the river of about 15 feet, which creates a water power that has never been utilized. The plaintiffs own land on the north side of the river, extending the entire length of the unutilized water power, and a distance of about 100 feet further east. They also own a tract of land on the south side of the river, above the Roberts land and adjoining it at its easterly boundary. At the point where the plaintiffs own both sides of the river they have erected a dam, from the northerly end of which they have constructed a canal along the north side of the stream to a power house located on that side of the river at the lower or easterly end of the unutilized water power. By means of the dam and canal the plaintiffs divert substantially all the water of the stream, and do not return it to the channel of the river until it reaches the power house, thereby depriving Roberts of the privilege of having the water flow by his land. In August, 1902, the plaintiffs filed a petition with the Secretary of State for the purpose of condemning the unutilized water privilege and land of Roberts adjoining the same, in accordance with the requirements of chapter 158, Pub. St. 1891, and requested the board of railroad commissioners to assess the damages occasioned thereby. The commissioners, being in doubt as to their authority to assess damages for land and water power taken for the purpose of producing electric power for the operation of an electric railway and an electric lighting plant, declined to proceed, and this petition was thereupon brought.

Frank H. Brown and Mitchell & Foster, for plaintiffs. Hermon Holt and Streeter & Hollis, for defendants.

BINGHAM, J. The plaintiffs are authorized by their charter "to acquire by contract all the property, assets, and franchises" of the Claremont Street Railway Company and the Claremont Electric Light Company; to "construct, maintain, and operate a railroad," using any power, except steam, for the "transportation of passengers, freight, express, and mail" over and upon such highways and lands within the limits of the town of Claremont "as may be necessary for the public accommodation"; to carry on in the town the business of "generating, manufacturing, producing, and supplying electricity for purposes of light, heat, and mechanical power"; to make use of the streets of the town in distributing the same; to "construct and maintain suitable buildings, dams, boilers, water and other motors, engines, electrical machinery and works as may be needed and convenient for conducting the business of said corporation"; and to "lease, hold, purchase, and acquire such real and personal estate as may be necessary and convenient in the prosecution of its business." Laws 1901, p. 787, c. 276.

The first contention of the plaintiffs is that it is to be implied from the use of the word "acquire" in their charter that the Legislature intended to confer upon them the power to take by eminent domain such property, real and personal, as might be necessary to the prosecution of their business. But the answer to this is that as the exercise of this power is against common right, and the plaintiffs' charter does not expressly confer the power, or point out the steps to be pursued in its exercise, or make provision for compensation, the presumption is that the Legislature did not intend to confer it. Private property cannot be invaded by this power without statutory authority, and statutes which are claimed to authorize its exercise are to be strictly construed. 1 Lew. Em. Dom. § 240.

The plaintiffs also contend that the right of eminent domain is conferred upon them by section 4, c. 27, p. 368, Laws 1895, as amended by chapter 93, p. 586, Laws 1901, and that under the provisions of this statute they are authorized to condemn the land of the defendant Roberts and the water privilege thereto appertaining, so that by means of their dam and canal they may divert the water of the stream from its natural channel and conduct it to their power house, to be there used in developing electrical power. Section 4, as amended, reads as follows: "All parts of street railways, not located in a public highway, shall be laid out, located, and the location changed, under the provisions of chapter 158 of the Public Statutes; said railway corporations may take and hold in the manner provided by said statute such land as may be necessary for the purposes of installing and maintaining power plants, carhouses and depots, repair shops, pole lines, wires, side tracks, and gravel pits; and said railway corporation and all persons whose property shall be taken for the use of such railway corporation shall have respectively all the rights and privileges, and be subject to all the duties, restrictions, and liabilities contained in said chapter." This section is a part of the general street railway law, and such power as is there conferred the plaintiffs, as a street railway corporation, are entitled to exercise. Laws 1895, p. 367, c. 27, § 1. The portion of the section upon which they base their claim to condemn the land and water privilege in question is: "Said railway corporations may take and hold * * * such land as may be necessary for the purposes of installing and maintaining power plants." But this provision does not authorize street railway corporations to condemn land and water privileges for the purpose of diverting streams and procuring power with which to operate power plants erected or to be erected on their own land. On the contrary, the authority there conferred is limited to taking such land as may be necessary for locating or placing power plants in position for use, and maintaining the same. This construction gives to the words used their natural and usual meaning, and such as is recognized by leading lexicographers. The plaintiffs' contentions cannot be sustained.

Exception overruled. All concurred.

DAVIS v. UNITED STATES HEALTH & ACCIDENT CO.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Hillsboro. Dec. 5, 1905.)

1. INSURANCE—POLICY—TIME BEFORE WHICH ACTION CANNOT BE MAINTAINED.

Where a policy contained a provision that no action at law should be maintainable before three months from the date on which the policy requires proof of loss to be filed, the insured was bound thereby.

2. SAME—WAIVER OF LIMITATION.

Where a policy provided that no action should be maintainable before three months from the day on which the policy required proof of loss to be filed, a waiver of the provision requiring formal proof of loss did not constitute a waiver of the provision as to time of bringing the action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 28, Cent. Dig. Insurance, §§ 1542, 1543.]

Young, J., dissenting.

Transferred from Superior Court; Peaslee, Judge.

Action by James A. Davis against the United States Health & Accident Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff excepted. Exception overruled.

No proof of loss was given to the defendant as required in the policy, but the plaintiff claimed the defendant waived the right to insist upon a formal proof. It was provided in the policy that "no action at law shall be maintainable before three months or after six months from the date on which this policy requires proof of loss to be filed." The action was begun within three months of that time. The defendant's motion for a nonsuit was granted, and the plaintiff excepted.

David W. Perkins, for plaintiff. John O'Neill, for defendant.

WALKER, J. In Tasker v. Insurance Co., 58 N. H. 469, it was held that a condition in a policy of fire insurance that no recovery shall be had unless suit is brought within a given time is valid at common law. Id., 59 N. H. 438, 445. Although the Legislature has to some extent modified or changed this common-law rule with reference to suits upon policies of fire insurance (Laws 1879, p. 336, c. 13; Pub. St. 1901, c. 170, § 18; Franklin v. Insurance Co., 70 N. H. 251, 257, 47 Atl. 91), it is not claimed that the parties to a contract of indemnity against sickness could not bind themselves by a stipulation limiting the time before which or after which an action might be begun for the recovery of the benefit (Dwyer v. Insurance Co., 72 N. H. 572, 573, 58 Atl. 502). As it was competent for the parties to so agree, and as there is no suggestion of fraud practiced by the defendant to induce the plaintiff to enter into the contract, he became bound thereby. Nor, if it is assumed that the defendant waived the provision requiring formal proof of loss, can it be inferred that it also waived the provision protecting itself from an action at law for three months from the time when the proof should be filed under the terms of the contract. The policy provided a definite time when the proof should be filed, and the fact that it was not filed at that time had no necessary effect upon the limitation of time for the bringing of a suit. The waiver of one condition does not involve the waiver of the other. As the plaintiff had voluntarily agreed not to sue the defendant at the time this action was begun, and as the restriction of his right in this respect does not appear to be frivolous, but may be a matter of some importance to the defendant, no error appears in the order for a nonsuit.

Exception overruled.

YOUNG, J., dissented. The others concurred.

McKEAN v. COOK.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Carroll. Dec. 5, 1905.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES—PAYMENT—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where, in a suit on the last of a series of three notes secured by mortgage, defendant pleaded payment after the note became due, when plaintiff appropriated the mortgaged land by foreclosure of his mortgage under a judgment on the first two notes of the series, the burden was on defendant to show by a preponderance of the evidence that the value of the land equaled or exceeded the amount due on the notes.

2. SAME—MORTGAGE—FORECLOSURE.

The foreclosure of a mortgage given to secure a series of notes operated as a payment of the notes only to the extent of the value of the land acquired by the holder of the notes under the foreclosure proceedings.

Transferred from Superior Court; Stone, Judge.

Action on a note by Eliphalet McKean against Addison G. Cook. Defendant's motion for a nonsuit and plaintiff's motion for an order of judgment in his favor for the amount of the note were both denied, subject to exception, and the case was transferred from the superior court. Defendant's exception overruled. Plaintiff's exception sustained.

The defendant gave the plaintiff, for an adequate consideration, three promissory notes, for $833.33 each, dated May 15, 1901, payable to the plaintiff, or order, in one, two, and three years from date, respectively, with interest, and a mortgage of a certain tract of land to secure their payment. The notes due in one and two years not being paid, the plaintiff recovered, June 26, 1903, a conditional judgment for their amount in an action at law, and was put in possession of the land mortgaged September 23, 1903, by virtue of a writ of possession that was issued upon the judgment. He held the possession for more than a year. The note in suit is the one that became due in May, 1904. The plaintiff took no steps to determine the value of the land acquired by the foreclosure. The defendant's motion for an order of nonsuit and the plaintiff's motion for an order of judgment in his favor for the amount of the note were both denied, subject to exception.

Jewell, Owen & Veazey, for plaintiff. Jewett & Plummer, for defendant.

CHASE, J. The defense is payment, not at or before the time the note became due, but subsequently (September 23, 1904), when the plaintiff appropriated the mortgaged land by the foreclosure of his mortgage. In other words, the defendant confesses the making of the promise, its validity, and a breach of it, but attempts to avoid the breach by showing a state of facts which he says atoned for it, or paid all damages to which the plaintiff is entitled by reason of it. In such case the burden is upon the defendant to support his defense by a preponderance of the probabilities. Buzzell v. Snell, 25 N. H. 474; Kendall v. Brownson, 47 N. H. 186 (both the opinion of the court and the dissenting opinion of Judge Doe); Benton v. Burbank, 54 N. H. 583; Smith v. Steam Mill, 66 N. H. 613, 84 Atl. 153. The plaintiff was under no obligation to prove in the first instance the value of the land acquired by the foreclosure.

The foreclosure paid the plaintiff's notes only to the extent of the value of the land acquired by it. Hunt v. Stiles, 10 N. H. 466; Smith v. Packard, 19 N. H. 575; Green v. Cross, 45 N. H. 574; Dearborn v. Nelson, 61 N. H. 249; Fletcher v. Chamberlin, 61 N. H. 438, 494; Clark v. Jackson, 64 N. H. 388, 11 Atl. 59; Colby v. McClintock, 68 N. H. 176, 40 Atl. 397, 73 Am. St. Rep. 557. There is no presumption of law that the value of the land was sufficient to pay any part of the note in suit, in addition to the payment of the two notes included in the conditional judgment. The question of value and of the amount of the payment effected by it is purely one of fact. Lane v. Barron, 64 N. H. 277, 9 Atl. 544; Stevens v. Fellows, 70 N. H. 148, 47 Atl. 185. As the value was not agreed to, and the defendant offered no evidence regarding it, he failed to support his defense in whole or in part; and the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the amount of his note.

Defendant's exception overruled. Plaintiff's exception sustained. All concurred.

STOORS v. BURGESS et al.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 28, 1905.)

1. WILLS — CONSTRUCTION — INTENT OF TESTATOR—VESTED ESTATE.

The law favors the early vesting of an estate, when such construction will not defeat the intent of the testator as expressed in the will.

2. SAME—GIFT TO A CLASS.

It is a general rule in the construction of wills that where there are in a will no words importing a gift to a class as grandchildren, except in the direction to make division among them at a period subsequent to the testator's death, the members of that class are to be ascertained as of the time fixed for the division.

3. SAME.

Held that, upon a consideration of the provisions of the will in the case at bar, the foregoing rule appears to exactly express the intention of the testator.

(Official.)

Report from Supreme Judicial Court, Cumberland County.

Bill by Leonard K. Stoops, trustee, against Mary M. Burgess and others. Case reported, and decree rendered.

Bill in equity to obtain the construction of the last will and testament of the Right Reverend George Burgess, D. D., late of Gardiner, deceased, who was the first (Episcopal) Bishop of the diocese of Maine. This cause came on for a hearing on bill and answer at the April term, 1905, of the Supreme Judicial Court, Cumberland county, and the presiding justice, with the consent of the parties, ordered the same to be reported to the law court for determination.

Will of George Burgess.

"In the name of God. Amen. I, George Burgess, of Gardiner, in the county of Kennebec, in the state of Maine, being in health and in the possession, through God's mercy, of all my powers, but deeply conscious of my own frailty, and mindful of my liability to sudden removal, do make this my last will and testament, revoking, and intending to destroy, all previous instruments of the same kind, though substantially identical herewith.

"I commend my soul to the precious mercies of Almighty God, my Heavenly Father, through our Lord Jesus Christ; beseeching him that, all my sins being washed away by the blood of the Lamb, and my whole spirit sanctified by the Holy Ghost, I may, unworthy as I am, be admitted by grace to the society of just men made perfect.

"Of my worldly estate, I give and bequeath the sum of seven thousand dollars, being nearly that part of it which was not inherited from my father, to the trustees of the fund for the support of the episcopate of the diocese of Maine, to be duly invested, and the income thereof to be applied to the support of future bishops of the said diocese; and in the event of its division, to the support of that bishop within whose diocese the city of Gardiner may fall.

"The remainder of my property, real and personal, I give and bequeath as follows:

"I desire my dear brothers, Frederick Burgess and Alexander Burgess, to act as trustees under my will; and it is my wish that no bonds should be required of them for the faithful execution of their trust.

"I appoint my dear brother, Alexander Burgess, executor of this, my will, and desire that no bonds may be required of him; and I give and bequeath unto him all my theological books, except any which my dear wife may desire to retain.

"I give and bequeath to my dear wife, Sophia Kip Burgess, all other things in my house.

"I give the residue of my estate, real and personal, in trust, to my said brothers, Frederick Burgess and Alexander Burgess, with authority to sell, change and reinvest the same at their discretion; and I hereby appoint that they shall hold the same in trust for my dear wife, and for my beloved daughter, Mary Georgiana Burgess, as follows:

"The whole income to be paid to my dear wife, if she should survive and remain unmarried, till my daughter shall attain the age of twenty-five; and should my daughter be removed by death before that age and without being married, then the whole income to be paid to my dear wife throughout her own lifetime.

"When my daughter shall attain the age of twenty-five, the half of the income to be paid to her; and also to be held in trust for her and used for her benefit, should my dear wife at any time previous to her attainment of that age, be herself married a second time.

"Should my dear wife die before my daughter attains the age of twenty-five, the whole income to be held in trust for my daughter, and used in her behalf, till she attains that age, and then to be transferred to her with the whole estate, and the trust to cease.

"Should my dear daughter be married and depart this life before the age of twenty-five, leaving issue, then at her death the half of the estate hereby bequeathed to the said trustees to become vested in such issue, if my dear wife should still be living; and if not, the whole to pass to such issue and the trust to cease.

"Should my dear daughter, married or unmarried, attain the age of twenty-five, half the income to be paid to her, and half to her mother, till the death of the one or the other; and then, and thereupon—

"Should my daughter survive her mother, the whole estate to vest in her, and the trust to cease; and

"Should my dear wife survive our daughter, she dying without issue, the whole income to be paid to my dear wife during her lifetime, and at her death, the estate to be divided into two equal parts; one of which shall be transferred to such charitable or religious purposes as she may direct, or, if she make no direction, then to the trustees aforesaid of the fund for the support of the episcopate of the diocese of Maine, to constitute a fund for the assistance of missionaries and other clergymen of the said diocese, and to be applied under the direction of the bishop and standing committee, especially for the relief of sick, infirm, or aged clergymen in the said state, without regard to any division of the diocese; and the other half to be divided equally amongst the grandchildren of my deceased father.

"Should my dear wife survive our daughter, she leaving issue, then at the death of my wife, the remaining half of the estate to pass to such issue, and the trust to cease.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this eighth day of January in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one; and also to another sheet, prefixed hereto, and forming a part of the same will and testament. Signed, sealed and published and declared as his last will and testament, by George Burgess, in our presence, who, in his presence, and in the presence of one another, have subscribed our names.

"George Burgess. [L. S.]

"Robert Williamson.

"W. E. S. Whitman.

"Chas. Danforth.

"I hereby append the following provision as a codicil to my last will and testament:

"It is my will that the house and land which I occupy at Gardiner should be a part of the legacy of seven thousand dollars which I have bequeathed for the benefit of the diocese, and should be estimated at not less than four thousand dollars in making up the same; but that it should not be transferred, but should be the property of my wife, and, in the event of her decease, of my daughter, so long as either of them shall continue to occupy it as a residence. It is also my will that the mortgage to me from Emma J. Lord, if unpaid at the time of my decease, should be included in the said legacy, as a part of the payment of the same.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this twelfth day of March, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

"George Burgess [L. S.]

"Signed and sealed, and declared to be a codicil to his last will and testament, by George Burgess, in presence of us, who at his request, in his presence and in the presence of each other, have subscribed our names as witnesses thereto.

"Daniel Nutting.

"William Cooper.

"Nathan B. Norton."

Argued before STROUT, SAVAGE, POWERS, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

Aaron H. Latham and Bird & Bradley, for plaintiff. H. Charles Royce, for defendants Burgess and others. Anthoine & Talbot, for defendants Stoops and others.

POWERS, J. Bill to obtain the construction of the last will and testament of George Burgess, late of Gardiner. The will was executed January 8, 1861, and the testator died April 23, 1866. After providing for the payment of certain legacies the will contained the following paragraph in relation to the residue of his estate:

"I give the residue of my estate, real, and personal, in trust to my said brothers, Frederick Burgess and Alexander Burgess, with authority to sell, change, and reinvest the same at their discretion; and I hereby appoint that they shall hold the same in trust for my dear wife and for my beloved daughter, Mary Georgiana Burgess, as follows: The whole income to be paid to my dear wife, if she should survive and remain unmarried, till my daughter shall attain the age of 25; and should my daughter be removed by death before that age and without being married, then the whole income to be paid to my dear wife throughout her own lifetime.

"When my daughter shall attain the age of twenty-five, the half of the income to be paid to her; and also to be held in trust for her and used in her benefit, should my dear wife any time previous to her attainment of that age, be herself married a second time.

"Should my dear wife die before my daughter attains the age of twenty-five, the whole income to be paid in trust for my daughter, and used in her behalf, till she attains that age, and then, to be transferred to her with her whole estate, and the trust to cease.

"Should my dear daughter be married and depart this life before the age of twenty-five, leaving issue, then at her death the half of the estate hereby bequeathed to the said trustees to become vested in such issue, if my dear wife should still be living; and if not, the whole to pass to such issue and the trust to cease.

"Should my dear daughter, married or unmarried, attain the age of twenty-five, half the income to be paid to her, and half to her mother, till the death of the one or the other; and then and thereupon—

"Should my daughter survive her mother, the whole estate to vest in her, and the trust to cease; and

"Should my dear wife survive our daughter, she dying without issue, the whole income to be paid to my dear wife during her lifetime, and at her death, the estate to be divided into two equal parts; one of which shall be transferred to such charitable or religious purposes as she may direct, or, if she make no direction, then to the trustees aforesaid of the fund for the support of the episcopate of the diocese of Maine, to constitute a fund for the assistance of missionaries and other clergymen of the said diocese, and to be applied under the direction of the bishop and standing committee, especially for the relief of the sick, infirm, or aged clergymen in the said state, without regard to any division of the diocese; and the other half to be divided equally amongst the grandchildren of my deceased father.

"Should my dear wife survive our daughter, she leaving issue, then at the death of my wife, the remaining half of the estate to pass to such issue, and the trust to cease."

Mary Georgiana Burgess died May 1, 1873, before reaching the age of 25 years and without issue. Sophia K. Burgess died July 7, 1904 never having remarried, leaving a will which has been duly probated containing the following paragraph:

"Whereas by the last will of my husband I am authorized, in the event which has happened of the death without issue and before me of my daughter, to dispose for such charitable or religious purposes as I may direct of one-half of the trust fund by his said will established: Now, therefore, I hereby direct that said one-half of said trust fund shall be transferred and paid over to the trustees of diocesan funds in the diocese of Maine, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Maine, to be held by it for the purposes of the Burgess-Neely Endowment or Memorial Fund."

At the time of the testator's death there were 15 living grandchildren of his deceased father. At the time of the daughter's death 13 of these were living and one additional grandchild, Christina Burgess Royce, had been born. Upon the death of the wife, there were 8 living grandchildren of the deceased father of the testator of whom said Christina Burgess Royce was one.

The following questions are asked of the court:

"First. Shall the trustee pay over one-half of the trust fund to the trustees of the diocesan funds in the diocese of Maine?

"Second. Shall the trustee pay over one-half of the trust fund to the grandchildren of Thomas Burgess, the deceased father of the testator, who were living at the time of the death of the testator April 23, 1866, and to the legal representatives of such of said grandchildren as have since deceased, and if so, in what proportions, per stirpes or per capita?

"Third. Shall the trustee pay over one-half of the trust fund to the grandchildren of Thomas Burgess, the deceased father of the testator, who were living at the time of the death of Mary Georgiana Burgess, May 1, 1873, and to the legal representatives of such said grandchildren as have since deceased, and if so, in what proportions, per stirpes or per capita?

"Fourth. Shall the trustee pay over one-half of the trust fund to the grandchildren of Thomas Burgess, the deceased father of the testator, who were living at the time of the death of Sophia K. Burgess, July 7, 1904, and if so, in what proportions per stirpes or per capita?"

It will be seen from the facts above stated that of the many contingencies provided for in the will only one happened, viz.: The death of the testator's daughter without issue before the death of his wife. It is therefore with the construction of only the next to the last paragraph above quoted from his will that we have to do; the other parts of the will being of importance simply as they may help to reveal the intention of the testator, and thus throw light upon that part a construction of which is sought.

If Sophia K. Burgess survived her daughter, she dying without issue, then at the death of said Sophia, the estate was to be divided in two equal parts, one of which was to be transferred to such charitable or religious purposes as she might direct. This gave her a power of testamentary disposition over one-half of the estate, subject only to the limitation that it must be exercised for charitable or religious purposes. The disposition of this part of the estate in her will was in strict conformity to the power conferred, and the first question is answered in the affirmative.

The gift of the other half of the estate is to a class, and the answer to the remaining questions depends upon the time at which the class is to be ascertained. Many general rules of construction are invoked, that the law favors the early vesting of estates, that the will speaks from the death of the testator, and that in case of contingent remainders the estate vests upon the happening of the contingency. The estate bequeathed to the grandchildren was a contingent remainder, and its vesting was suspended until the happening of the contingency. The law favors the early vesting of the estate when such construction will not defeat the intent of the testator as expressed in the will. In this case a contrary intention is shown. By the terms of the will if the testator's wife died before his daughter attained the age of 25, then, upon his daughter arriving at that age, the whole estate was to be transferred to her, and the trust to cease. Again, if the daughter died before the age of 25, leaving issue, then at her death one-half, and if the wife was not living, the whole of the estate was to vest in such issue and the trust to cease. Still, again, if the daughter survived the mother, the whole estate was to vest in her, and the trust to cease. In any of these contingencies the grandchildren of the testator's deceased father received nothing. A remainder is contingent when so limited as to take effect upon an event which may never happen. Woodman v. Woodman, 89 Me. 128, 35 Atl. 1037; Hunt v. Hall, 87 Me. 363. The only event in which the grandchildren were to share in the fund was in case the testator's daughter died before attaining the age of 25, without issue, and his wife survived her. This even might never happen and the remainder was contingent. The estate did not vest, therefore, in the grandchildren at the testator's decease. It was the death of the testator's daughter, under the conditions just named, which first made it certain that any part of the estate would come to the grandchildren.

These rules invoked must be considered with reference to this particular will. What does the will say, and what is the testator's intention expressed in the will? It is at the death of the testator's wife that the estate is to be divided and one-half of it to be distributed among the grandchildren of his deceased father. The testator must have had in mind those who answered to that description at the time of the distribution. He was speaking of the grandchildren of his deceased father not at the time of his own death, not at the time of the death of his daughter, but at the time of his wife's death. "At her death," he says the division is to be made. There are in the will no words importing a gift to his father's grandchildren, except in the direction to make the division among them at the time of his wife's death. His language must refer to that time, the time when the division is to be made. Nowhere in the will is any mention made of the heirs or legal representatives of such grandchildren, nor are they themselves named even as a class, except in the direction to divide one-half the estate among them after the death of both his daughter and his wife. If the estate vested at the death of the daughter before arriving at the age of 25, without issue, her mother surviving her, then the estate so vesting was, not only heritable, but transmissible and devisable. It might happen thus that a large portion of the estate would at the time of the division go, not to the grandchildren of the testator's father, but to their husbands or wives or devisees, strangers in blood to both the testator and his father. We find nothing in the will to lead us to infer that such a result was within the contemplation of the testator or ever intended by him. The conclusion is strengthened by the fact that while the will contains careful provision for the testamentary disposition of one-half of the estate by the testator's wife before the division of the estate, no such power is given to the grandchildren.

"When a legacy is made to a class as 'grandchildren,' and there is by the will a postponement of the division of the legacy until a period subsequent to the testator's death, everyone who answers the description, so as to come within that class at the time fixed for the division, is entitled to share, but no others. By this rule the heirs of a grandchild, who was living at the death of the testator, but who died before the time fixed for distribution, will take nothing; but an after-born grandchild, if living at the time of the distribution, will share." Webber v. Jones, 94 Me. 429, 47 Atl. 903. There is nothing in the will under consideration to show a contrary intention. In fact, the rule laid down in Webber v. Jones, seems to exactly express the testator's intention in this case.

In Hale v. Hobson, 167 Mass. 399, 45 N. E. 914, it is said: "The testator provides for his widow and children and grandchildren, and gives various legacies and life annuities, and then, contemplating that a portion of his estate remains undisposed of, and looking forward to the time when the last life annuity shall have ceased and the residue be free for distribution, he directs his trustees then to divide the residue and the remainder with its accumulated interest equally among his grandchildren. What grandchildren? It seems to us more reasonable to suppose that the grandchildren at the time of distribution are intended than the grandchildren living at his death. It is true that there are no words of survivorship, but it is as if the testator took his stand at the time of the death of the last life annuitant, and said: 'I direct the remainder and its accumulations to be divided amongst my grandchildren,' in which case no words of surviorship would be necessary, and those living then would take." This language is used in Eager v. Whitney, 163 Mass. 463, 40 N. E. 1046: "There is no gift to the legal representatives, independently of the direction of the trustees to pay over to them in the year 1901. The time is thus annexed to the gift. It is a legacy given as of that year. An arbitrary date is fixed, at which the trust is to end, and the property to be paid over. The form of the expression used may not be necessarily conclusive, but it has a tendency to show that the gift was to those who should then be his legal representatives." See, also, In re Brown's Estate, 86 Me. 572; Clark v. Cammann, 160 N. Y. 315, 54 N. E. 709; Matter of Baer, 147 N. Y. 348, 41 N. E. 702; Matter of Crane, 164 N. Y. 71, 58 N. E. 47; McLain v. Howald, 120 Mich. 274, 79 N. W. 182, 77 Am. St. Rep. 597; Jones v. Colbeck, 8 Ves. Jr. 38; Mitchell v. Mitchell, 73 Conn. 303, 47 Atl. 325; Clark v. Shawen, 190 Ill. 47, 60 N. E. 116. We therefore answer the second and third questions in the negative.

The will provides that the division shall be among the grandchildren equally. In answer to the fourth question the trustee is directed to pay over one-half of the trust fund to the grandchildren of Thomas Burgess the deceased father of the testator, who were living at the time of the death of Sophia K. Burgess, July 7, 1904, and such division among them is to be made per capita.

Costs, including reasonable counsel fees, to be paid all parties by the trustee and charged in his account.

Decree accordingly.

COTE v. LETERNEAU.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 20, 1905.)

1. REAL ACTION—LACHES.

The owner of land is not obliged to begin an action for its recovery as soon as he is aware of the defendant's occupation.

2. SAME—RECOVERY OF RENTS AND PROFITS.

That the plaintiff in a real action was aware of the defendant's occupation of his land, and made no objection until beginning his suit, does not bar his claim for rents and profits; they having been duly demanded in the action.

(Official.)

On Motion from Supreme Judicial Court, Androscoggin County.

Action by Agnes Cote against Arsene, A. Leterneau. On motion by defendant. Overruled.

Real action, wherein the plaintiff demanded against the defendant the possession of certain real estate situate in Auburn, Me. The plaintiff also claimed rents and profits for the use of the demanded premises while in the possession of the defendant. Plea, the general issue, nul disseisin, and also a brief statement of special matter of defense as follows: "And the defendant says he has done nothing to in any way interfere with the rights of the plaintiff in and to the land, but may have trespassed technically upon her land, but that he has committed no damage thereby." No disclaimer was filed by the defendant.

Verdict for plaintiff, and damages assessed at $77.25. Defendant then filed a general motion for a new trial.

Argued before EMERY, STROUT, SAVAGE, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

Oakes, Pulsifer & Ludden, for plaintiff. McGilliduddy & Morey, for defendant.

EMERY, J. The only question of law presented by this motion is whether, upon the evidence, the defendant was liable for rents and profits; they having been demanded in the declaration and assessed by the jury. The demanded land was a strip five feet wide, which the plaintiff had annexed to a lot previously mortgaged. Her title to the lot mortgaged came through the mortgage to the defendant, who supposed the five-foot strip was included in the mortgage, and entered into occupation of it. He built a barn partially over it, but was allowed to remove it, and did so. He pleaded the general issue, nul disseisin, to this real action but made no actual contest on the question of title, and does not object to the verdict on that question, but only on the question of rents and profits. There was uncontradicted evidence that the plaintiff was aware of his occupation, but did not demand any rent, nor make any objection, until she brought this action.

Upon this evidence we see no reason why the defendant is not liable for the rents and profits of this strip for the time he occupied it within six years before the date of the writ, assuming that the strip would have yielded rents and profits. He was in occupation claiming title, and had thereby disseised the plaintiff. She was not bound to regain seisin at once by suit or by entry. When she did assert her title by this suit, he did not disclaim, but pleaded nul disseisin. It turns out that she was entitled to the strip, and hence to such rents and profits as it should have yielded during his occupation. It is only just that he should hand them over. The injury caused her by his disseisin is not fully compensated until that is done.

Of course, there may be cases where a plaintiff in a real action may be estopped in equity, and even in law, from recovering rents and profits, such as the case of Jewell v. Harding, 72 Me. 124, cited by defendant. In that case the defendant had a title good in equity, derived directly from the plaintiff, a title which the plaintiff was bound and could be compelled to make good in law. He practically put the defendant in possession under this title. It was properly held that he could not recover rents and profits. In this case the plaintiff is not claiming any improvements made by the defendant with her knowledge. He was allowed to remove them. The estop-pel upon her, if any, does not extend to rents and profits.

The defendant, besides the general issue, pleaded, by way of brief statement, that he had "done nothing in any way to interfere with the rights of the plaintiff in and to the land, but may have trespassed technically upon her land, but that he has committed no damage thereby." This was not a disclaimer of the demanded land, nor any part of it. His plea of the general issue still stood as an admission of his possession and a denial of the plaintiff's title. The action was tried upon that issue. Recovery of rents and profits follow.

The defendant urges that the amount assessed by the jury for rents and profits was far too large. We must assume they were instructed to make the proper deductions, and to award only "the clear annual value of the premises, while he was in possession," after such deductions. Though the amount awarded seems large to us, it is not so large as to convince us that the jury clearly erred. We think the motion must be overruled upon both questions.

Motion overruled.

Judgment on the verdict.

COPP v. MAINE CENT. R. CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 19, 1905.)

1. RAILROADS—NEGLIGENCE—TRESPASSERS ON RAILROAD TRACK.

That a railroad company does not prosecute persons walking upon its railroad track between crossings and stations, in violation of Rev. St. c. 52, § 77, does not authorize persons to so use its tracks.

2. SAME.

Persons walking upon railroad tracks are bound to apprehend that locomotives may be swiftly approaching at any time, and are bound to be continually on the watch for them, and to leave the track in season to avoid collision with them.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Railroads, §§ 1285, 1305.]

3. SAME—NEGLIGENCE OF ENGINEER.

Engineers running locomotives are not bound to stop, or even decrease the speed of the locomotive, merely because they see persons walking upon the track. They may ordinarily assume that such persons have made themselves aware of the approach of the locomotive and will seasonably leave the track for its free passage.

4. SAME.

If such engineer makes all possible effort to stop the locomotive as soon as he has reason to believe that a person walking upon the track is in fact not aware of the approach of the locomotive, he is not guilty of negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Railroads, §§ 1276, 1279.]

5. SAME—EVIDENCE.

In this case the engineer, besides the customary whistles at crossings, blew sharp warning whistles as he approached the plaintiff, who was walking on the outside of the left rail. He also shut off steam, but let the locomotive drift, expecting the plaintiff would, at the last, step off out of the way of the locomotive. As soon as it became evident to him that the plaintiff might not do so, he did all he could to avoid running upon her, but without avail. He was not guilty of negligence in not sooner apprehending she would not leave the track.

Report from Supreme Judicial Court, Somerset County.

Action on the case by Lillian G. Copp against the Maine Central Railroad Company to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff, and caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant by one of its servants, a locomotive engineer. Tried at the March term, 1905, of the Supreme Judicial Court, Somerset county. Plea, the general issue. At the conclusion of the evidence the case was reported to the law court for decision upon so much of the evidence as was competent and legally admissible. Judgment for defendant.

Argued before EMERY, STROUT, SAVAGE, POWERS, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

S. W. Gould and Fred F. Lawrence, for plaintiff. Nathan & Henry B. Cleaves, Stephen C. Perry, White & Carter, and Walton & Walton, for defendant.

EMERY, J. While the plaintiff, a woman 28 years old, was walking along on the defendant company's railroad track on her way to visit a friend, she was overtaken and injured by a locomotive operated by the defendant in the regular course of its business at that place. She did not look behind her, nor take any other measures to become apprised of the approach of trains or locomotives, though she was aware that the track where she was walking was used, not only for the passage of regular trains, but also for shifting cars, making up trains, etc.

To extricate herself from the position of a trespasser upon the track, she showed that other persons frequently, and even habitually, walked upon the track at that place without being forbidden by the defendant company. This however did not give her any right to walk on the track. Not only was the railroad company entitled to the exclusive use of its track between crossings and stations, as this place was, but she was forbidden by statute to walk upon it. Rev. St. c. 52, § 77. That the defendant company did not prosecute violators of this statute did not legalize her act, nor protect her from its consequences.

To relieve herself from the inference of gross carelessness on her part, she says she was walking on the outside of the left-hand rail, and thought she was walking far enough from it to be out of danger. Her opinion that she was in no danger does not alter the patent fact that she had voluntarily placed herself, and was voluntarily remaining, in a position conspicuously fraught with imminent danger. She says she was hard of hearing, but that very fact made it all the more reckless for her to walk on the track.

Finally she claims that, however great her own negligence, it was past and over before the locomotive struck her, and hence was no part of the proximate cause of the collision and her injury; that the engineer was negligent in not stopping the locomotive, as he might have done after he saw her and before he reached her; that her negligence was anterior to his, and hence his was the sole proximate cause of the injury.

Of course, even if she were a trespasser, the defendant company's servants could not lawfully disregard her presence on the track, and recklessly run over her, but even if she were a licensee, as she claims, they owed her no special duty of care such as they owed to those whose right or duty it was to be on the track.

It is common knowledge that people frequently walk on railroad tracks, and, if locomotive engineers were bound to stop or decrease speed every time they saw a person on the track, the operation of the railroad would be greatly hindered, to the detriment of the public. It is also common knowledge that persons thus walking on railroad tracks, and aware of the approach of a locomotive, will often remain on the track until the locomotive is within a few feet of them before they step aside.

In this case the engineer could rightfully assume that the plaintiff was of ordinary intelligence, that she was aware of the danger of her position, that she would exercise the care due in such a position, that she would reasonably look or listen for trains and locomotives, and seasonably step out of their way. He had given the usual warning signals, loud enough for the neighborhood to hear distinctly. He even shut off steam, and let the locomotive drift, when he saw she did not step off at once. As she was on the left of the track and he on the right, he supposed she had stepped off, and, when it was seen by the fireman on the left that she had not, it was too late to prevent the collision, though every reasonable effort was made to do so. In all this there is no evidence that the engineer was negligent.

The plaintiff, however, claims that a high bank of snow at her left, formed by railroad snowplows, prevented her stepping aside, and that the engineer should have known it. The evidence does not support that theory. She did not try to step aside, and it is not established that she could not, much less that the engineer should have known that she could not.

The case is similar in principle to the case Garland v. Maine Central R. R. Co., 85 Me. 519, 27 Atl. 615. There the plaintiff, in driving a loaded team across the railroad track at a highway crossing, became stuck on the crossing. The engineer saw the team, and even saw it was not moving, but did not then proceed to stop his train. As soon as he saw that the team could not be moved, he did all he could to stop his train, but it was too late to avoid the collision. It was held that there was no evidence of his negligence; that he was not in fault in not sooner comprehending that the plaintiff would haul a load on the crossing he could not haul off. So, in the case now at bar, we hold that the engineer was not in fault in not sooner comprehending that for any reason the plaintiff would not at last step aside.

We base our decision on the absence of sufficient evidence of negligence on the part of the engineer, and hence have no occasion to determine whether the plaintiff's negligence was contributory.

Judgment for the defendant.

HORNER et al. v. BELL et al.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 10, 1906.)

1. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS — FRAUD AND UNDUE INFLUENCE — PLEADINGS — REQUIREMENTS OF ANSWER.

Where, in a suit to set aside deeds executed by a deceased grantor, the bill alleged that the grantor, at the time of the execution of the deeds, was old, infirm in body and mind, and unfit to transact any business; that defendants took advantage of her incapacity, and induced her by fraud and undue influence to execute the deeds, and the exhibits, consisting of copies of the deeds, showed that the grantor conveyed away all of her property, without reservation, for a nominal consideration; that in making the disposition of all her property none was granted to her son, and a comparatively insignificant part was given to her grandchildren and a daughter; that the bulk of the property was granted to a son-in-law; and that the property disposed of had been conveyed to the grantor by her husband, whose children and grandchildren received such small consideration, and without suggesting a reason for the disposition made—defendants were required by their answers to meet the charges with a full and direct statement of all the facts within their knowledge connected with the execution of the deeds.

2. DEEDS—VALIDITY—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In a suit to set aside deeds executed by a deceased grantor, the evidence showed that the grantor had lived with defendants, her daughter and son-in-law, for 30 years; that the bulk of the property was conveyed to the son-in-law; that defendants were present with the grantor at the time of the execution of the deeds; that for several years before the execution of the deeds the grantor was an invalid, dependent on her daughter; that the grantor, at the time of the execution of the deeds, was very ill. Held to show the existence of confidential relations between the grantor and defendants, so as to place on the latter the burden of proving that the deeds were the voluntary act of the grantor, executed with full knowledge as to their effect.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, §§ 587-591.]

3. DEPOSITIONS—BILL IN EQUITY—APPENDED INTERROGATORIES — EVASIVE ANSWERS—EFFECT.

In a suit to set aside deeds alleged to have been procured by fraud and undue influence, a special interrogatory appended to the bill asked a defendant to state when and under what circumstances the deeds came into his possession or his codefendant's. The answer was that the deeds were delivered to and accepted by him on the date of their delivery, that the whole transaction emanated from the grantor without any suggestion on defendant's part, and that the deeds were her voluntary act. The co-defendant replied to the same interrogatory by stating that the deeds were delivered to defendant by the grantor, and that it was the free act of the grantor after deliberate consideration. Held, that the answers were evasive and not entitled to consideration, under Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 16, § 160, unless sustained by proof on the final hearing.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Depositions, § 272.]

4. DEEDS — VALIDITY — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence in a suit to set aside deeds on the ground that they were not the voluntary act of the grantor examined, and held to justify a decree setting them aside.

Appeal from Circuit Court No. 2 of Baltimore City; George M. Sharp, Judge.

Suit by Elizabeth H. Bell and others against Albert N. Horner and another. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles F. Harley, for appellants. Joseph B. Seth, for appellees.

JONES, J. This is an appeal from a decree of circuit court No. 2 of Baltimore City, which set aside and annulled certain deeds to which specific reference is made in the decree, and the nature and purport of which will appear in the following statement of the facts which gave rise to the controversy involved in the case: Elizabeth B. Hammersley, a widow, and a resident of the city of Baltimore, died in that city on or about the 4th day of June, 1902. In her lifetime she had been possessed of considerable property, real, leasehold, and personal. About a week after her death, on the 13th day of June, 1902, the deeds dealt with by the decree in the case were left for record in the clerk's office of the superior court of Baltimore City, which was the proper place for such instruments to be recorded, by Albert N. Horner, one of the appellants in this case. She left as her heirs and next of kin a daughter, Mary D. Horner, one of the appellants, and wife of her coappellant, Albert N. Horner; a son, William H. Hammersley; and two grandchildren, Elizabeth H. Bell, and George D. Hammersley, the appellees, who are the children of a son who predeceased her. The deeds, which are the subject of controversy, four in number, all purport to have been executed and acknowledged by the deceased, Elizabeth B. Hammersley, on the 20th day of July, 1899, and were all left for record by Horner on the 13th day of June, 1902, and were noted consecutively as having been received at 2:15, 2:16, 2:17, and 2:18 o'clock p. m. One of them conveyed to Elizabeth H. Bell, one of the appellees, "in consideration of five dollars and other good and valuable consideration," a certain leasehold property on Pearl street in the city of Baltimore for life, on condition "that she promptly pays all necessary expenses on said property within sixty days after their maturity," and if this condition "be fulfilled then after the death of the said Elizabeth Hammersley Bell — to go to and become the property of each of the children of the said Elizabeth Hammersley Bell as may be living at the time of her death and to the descendants of any deceased child." But if there shall be a failure "to pay said necessary expenses within sixty days after their maturity then the property [assigned by the deed] is to immediately vest in and become the property of Mary D. Horner wife of Albert N. Horner free of all trusts and uses," etc. Another conveyed for a like consideration a certain other leasehold property on Pearl street, said city, to George D. Hammersley, the other appellee, for life, upon the same condition, that he pay all necessary expenses within 60 days after their maturity, and, if this condition be fulfilled, at his death, the property "to go to and become the property of Mary D. Horner wife of Albert N. Horner"; but, upon a failure to comply with the said condition upon the part of the said George D. Hammersley, the property was to vest immediately in the said Mary D. Horner, "free of all trusts and uses," etc. Another of these deeds conveyed, for a like consideration, to the appellant Mary D. Horner "all of the personal property goods and chattels and personalty contained in the two dwelling houses 108 North Green street and 2045 North Fulton avenue this [Baltimore] city therein belonging to the said Elizabeth B. Hammersley, to have and to hold," etc., "absolutely." The fourth one of the deeds in question is a conveyance to the appellant Albert N. Horner in the terms following: "In consideration of five dollars and other good and valuable consideration the said Elizabeth B. Hammersley doth hereby grant, assign and convey unto the said Albert N. Horner his heirs personal representatives and assigns all of the real estate fee simple leasehold, ground rents and all other property and evidences of debt due of all kinds and description not mentioned in a personal property goods and chattel deed priorly executed by me—this shall include all notes book accounts and insurance policies, and all persons and corporations are hereby authorized to accept a certified copy of this paper as full authority and acquittance to them, and this paper shall be a full release to them as against all other claimants at law or in equity the purposes and intent of the deed being to make an absolute grant of all the estate (not before deeded) of myself Elizabeth B. Hammersley and to include all the property deeded to me by my late husband David L. Hammersley, deceased, to Albert N. Horner. To have and to hold all of said property to the said Albert N. Horner, his heirs executors personal representatives and assigns with all the right and appurtenances thereto belonging," etc.

The appellees, as soon as they became aware of the deeds in question having been left for record, filed the bill in this case in the court below to have them set aside and annulled, alleging that they knew nothing of the said deeds "until they saw the notice of their having been recorded in the daily newspapers"; that the deeds purporting to have been executed to them were never delivered to nor accepted by them; that the property pretended to be conveyed to them was subject to heavy ground rents, was in a dilapidated condition, was located in a part of the city "which is steadily deteriorating in value," and that it was comparatively of "little or no value, while the estate and property so pretended to be conveyed to the said defendants, Albert N. Horner and Mary D. Horner, is of very large quantity and value"; that the deeds to the appellants were never legally delivered to them in the lifetime of the grantor; and that, if the said deeds were executed at all by the said deceased, they "were never intended to take effect in her lifetime, and are therefore null and void." They further charged that "Elizabeth B. Hammersley was advanced in age, being 77 years old, and was not only infirm in body, but was also, for a long time before her death, and at the time when said paper writings are alleged to have been executed, enfeebled and impaired in mind to such an extent as to render her unfit for the transaction of any business, and wholly incapable of making a valid deed or contract; that she was particularly susceptible to influences surrounding her, and, residing with the said Albert N. Horner and Mary D. Horner, her feebleness and incapacity were taken advantage of by them, and she was induced, influenced, and persuaded by said defendants —, through fraud, misrepresentation, and undue influence practiced by them, to sign said paper writings," etc.

The question is whether, upon the record before us, these allegations of the appellees' bill are so far sustained as to justify the decree which is here under review. And this question is largely one of fact, as to which we are not aided by any direct proof going to the charges made in the bill as grounds of relief; but the irresistible inferences from the disclosures of the record leave no doubt as to the propriety of the decree. In reaching our conclusions the testimony which has been made the subject of exceptions has been laid out of the case. It will not be necessary, therefore, to notice these exceptions further. With the bill, making the allegations that have been set out, there were filed as exhibits certified copies of the deeds assailed; and from these, in connection with admitted facts already recited, it appears that the grantor in the deeds, Mrs. Hammersley, conveyed away, and divested herself of, all of her property of every description, reserving to herself no part thereof, nor any interest therein; that the only specified consideration for this was a nominal one; that in making this disposition of all of her property none was granted to her only living son; that but a comparatively insignificant part was granted to her grandchildren, who, next to her son and daughters, had naturally the strongest claim upon her bounty; that what was conveyed to the grandchildren was hampered with an embarrassing and drastic condition; that the conveyance to her daughter embraced only the personal and household effects in the two dwelling houses named in the conveyance to her; that all the rest of her property of every description was in terms admitting of no exception granted to her son-in-law; and that, to emphasize the unnatural character of the disposition made of her property by the deeds in question, it appeared that the property thus disposed of had been conveyed to her by her husband, whose children and grandchildren received such small consideration at her hands. The deeds in themselves give no explanation of, and suggest no reason for, the remarkable dispositions of the property which they make. Confronted with charges thus made, and with disclosures thus appearing, it became the duty of the defendants by their answers to meet them with a full, frank, and direct statement to the court of all the facts and circumstances within their knowledge connected with and attending upon the transaction called in question, that it might be seen in its true and real character; and there is no reason to doubt that they would have met this duty, if they had seen in such facts and circumstances what would have gone to refute the charges made, and to explain conditions calculated to excite suspicion and to give rise to unfavorable inferences. The answers of the defendants (appellants) do not measure up to this standard of duty and just expectation. They content themselves with answers of a very perfunctory character. These answers are evasive, and make only general, categorical, and formal denial of the charges in the bill, and are framed, if not with the purpose, at least with the effect, to make the burden of the plaintiffs (appellees) with respect to proof as difficult as possible. The plaintiffs (appellees) accompanied their bill with special interrogatories appended thereto, and what has been said of the appellants' answers to the bill is equally true of their responses to these interrogatories. The attitude of the appellants before the court, upon the pleadings, to which reference has been made, is the more significant because an inspection of the proceedings in the cause makes it entirely manifest that they possessed information in reference to the transaction that these call in question which they have not chosen to disclose.

We proceed to examine the transaction in controversy in the light of the proof. There is open no question as to its nature.

The appellant Albert N. Horner, in answer to one of the special interrogatories, said: "The deeds were in the nature of a gift, although I paid considerable sums for her [Mrs. Hammersley's] account. I lived with her 30 years. Our relations were very friendly, and my purse was always open to her." The exorbitant character of the gifts is made manifest by what appears on the face of the deeds which show that the donor stripped herself of all of her property of every kind, and placed herself in a position of absolute dependence, if the purporting intention of the deeds was to be given effect. Of this property the great bulk of it passed under the deed to Albert N. Horner. The appellees were to take what has already been mentioned. The property embraced in the deed to Mary D. Horner was admitted by the appellants to be of the value of $400. Besides the property embraced in the deeds to Mrs. Horner and the appellees, the grantor is shown, by the admission of the appellants, to have been possessed, at the time of the execution of the deeds, of five houses and two ground rents in good localities in the city of Baltimore; and there was evidence going to show she also had valuable securities to the amount of $4,000 or $5,000. A pertinent inquiry, now, is what was the relation between the grantor and the other parties to the deeds in question at the time they purport to have been executed, and what connection such other parties had with their execution. It is not shown that the appellees had any connection with, or knowledge of, the making of the deeds until they were filed for record. The appellants both admit that they were present with the grantor at the signing and acknowledging of the deeds, and that the only other person present, or who is named as being present, was the justice of the peace, who took the acknowledgments. Mrs. Mary D. Horner was the daughter of the grantor, and she and her husband and coappellant had, before the time in question, resided with her in the home of the grantor for about 30 years. This appears by the admission of Albert N. Horner. It further appears from testimony upon the part of the appellants from the physician who attended her that Mrs. Hammersley, the grantor in the deeds, was, for several years prior to her death, an invalid suffering from organic heart trouble. This same witness, testifying for the appellants, said: "Mrs. Horner lived in the house with her mother, nursed her day and night, and in all manners discharged the duties of a loving and affectionate daughter. Mrs. Hammersley impressed me as being measurably dependent on Mrs. Horner. She preferred the attentions of Mrs. Horner to that of her nurse, whoever the nurse might be." This witness further testified that the feelings of Mrs. Hammersley towards Mrs. Horner (appellant here) were those "of a mother to her child, affectionate and sincere," and that "Mr. Horner [appellant] was a resident of the same home. His attentions to Mrs. Hammersley were those of a son to a mother, and on the part of Mrs. Hammersley she invariably spoke of him, or to him, in the most respectful and affectionate manner." Such were the general relations between the grantor, Mrs. Hammersley, and the appellants at the time the deeds in question were executed; and these are shown to have been close and intimate from family ties and long association, and as involving a peculiar dependence of the grantor upon the good offices of the appellants by reason of her feeble and failing health. This same witness testified in chief for the appellants that in July, 1899, the month in which the deeds in question bear date, Mrs. Hammersley was very ill; that he then visited her "probably twice a day"—thus showing a condition calling especially for nursing and care, and emphasizing her dependence upon the appellants at the particular juncture of time when it becomes of most importance as a circumstance in this case.

This evidence goes to show that, when the deeds were executed, the grantor was not in a condition physically to transact business of that character without aid and co-operation from some source. It is not shown that she had advice or assistance from others than the appellants, and they were with her and in a position to make suggestions, give advice, and aid her in carrying the business through. It is not shown who wrote the deeds, nor who notified the justice of the peace and procured his attendance. It is shown that the appellants were with her at the time in question, one of them acting as a witness; that with the justice of the peace who took the acknowledgments of the deeds the grantor was not known to have ever had business transaction before; that this official was one who had been frequently employed by Albert N. Horner to act in his official capacity for him; that immediately upon the execution of the deeds they were given or passed into the possession and custody of Albert N. Horner; that he advised that the deeds be not placed on record at the time, but that they be withheld for the purpose of preventing some of the beneficiaries from becoming aware of their execution, and this advice, as affirmed by the appellants, was followed; that he also advised that, notwithstanding the deeds, the grantor should continue to collect rents from the property, and this advice was followed; that he retained the custody of the deeds from the time of their execution till the death of the grantor, a period of about three years; that at her death he, without notice to, or consultation with, any one, delivered the deeds for record; and that in leaving them for record he felt himself authorized to instruct as to the order in which they should be placed upon record. Now, all this appears from the admissions of the appellants, or from evidence which they do not dispute; and if it be true that the deceased grantor, in the deeds in question, placed these instruments, which she adopted and used as a means of disposing of the whole of her property, in the custody and control of Albert N. Horner, with authority to him to see that they were given effect, and in the meantime was acting under advice from him in regard thereto, there was undoubtedly between the deceased grantor in the deeds and Horner, in respect to this transaction, a relation of trust and confidence of a grave and responsible character. The appellants are scarcely in a position to deny or repudiate such relation. And the inference seems inevitable, from the circumstances surrounding the parties at the time, that prior and assisting to the execution of the deeds in question there must have been, in respect thereto, as between the parties, a relation of agency on the part of the appellants, and of confidence on the part of Mrs. Hammersley. Mrs. Horner testified: "I knew my mother's every thought"—and, when asked whether she knew that the deed from her mother to herself "was to be prepared beforehand," answered: "I heard mother speak of it." It would seem from this review of the evidence in the cause as to the character of the transaction here in question and the relations of the parties thereto, and to each other in connection with it, that it is clearly brought within the principle recognized and applied in a number of cases in this court, and notably in the recent case of Zimmerman v. Bitner, 79 Md. 115, 28 Atl. 820, that when "a gift or conveyance," such as here is the subject of controversy, "is in question, the onus is upon the donee to prove to the satisfaction of the court that the conveyance was the free, deliberate, and voluntary act of the donor, and made by him with the full knowledge as to its effect and operation; in other words, that he knew that the conveyance itself operated to divest him of all title to the property, and to vest it in the donee." After laying down this principle the case just cited goes on to say: "A good deal has been said as to what constitutes a confidential relation within the operation of the principle, but courts have always been careful not to fetter the operation of the principle by undertaking to define its precise limits. The cases of parent and child, guardian and ward, trustees and cestui que trust, principal and agent are familiar instances in which the principle applies in its strictest sense. But its operation is not confined to the dealings and transactions between parties standing in these relations, but extends to all relations in which confidence is reposed, and in which dominion and influence resulting from such confidence may be exercised by one person over another. No part of the jurisdiction of the court, it has been said, is more useful than that which it exercises in watching and controlling transactions between parties standing in a relation of confidence to each other. And, being founded on the principle of correcting abuses of confidence, it ought to be applied to every case in which a confidential relation exists as a fact, where confidence is reposed on the one side, and the resulting superiority and influence on the other." For a statement of the same general doctrine as is outlined in the foregoing citation, we may refer to 1 Story's Eq. Jur., § 823.

The defendants seem to have sought to meet the burden of proof cast upon them, by the rule of law just adverted to, in their responses to certain of the special interrogatories appended to the bill of complaint. Of these No. 3 to Albert N. Horner asked him to "state when and under what circumstances said alleged deeds came into your possession or the possession of your wife," to which he answered: "The deeds were delivered to me and accepted by me upon the date of their execution by the grantor. The whole transaction emanated from her without any suggestion on my part, and it was her free and voluntary act." And interrogatory No. 3 to Mary D. Horner asked her to "state when and under what circumstances said alleged deeds came into your possession or the possession of your husband," to which she answered: "The deeds were delivered to my husband, Albert N. Horner, by my mother on 29th July, 1899, and it was the free and voluntary act of my mother after careful and deliberate consideration." These answers were evasive, and were not "directly responsive" to the interrogatories. The inquiries called for the facts and circumstances attending the transaction indicated. The answers did not give any facts and circumstances, but a conclusion that might or might not be drawn from these. They gave what the respondents claimed to be the effect and result of a knowledge of the facts and circumstances to which the inquiries related. These answers, therefore, "not being responsive to the bill" unless "sustained by the proof, at the final hearing of the cause * * * are entitled to no consideration." Gardiner et al. v. Hardey et al., 12 Gill & J. 365; Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1904, art. 16, § 160. Now, what evidence did the appellants produce at the final hearing to support the averments made in these answers? The only evidence from them which appears as being intended to meet the particular inquiry now under consideration consists of certain papers filed with the examiner as exhibits under agreement of counsel that the appellant Mrs. Mary D. Horner, who was absent by reason of illness, would, if present, "testify that she was present and saw Mrs. Elizabeth B. Hammersley sign and execute each and all of them" at her home, No. 108 N. Greene street, upon the dates mentioned in said papers; that at the signing of the papers dated July 29, 1899, Mrs. Elizabeth B. Hammersley, Albert N. Horner, Andrew J. Collars, and Mary D. Horner were present; and that at the signing of the papers dated February 14, 1900, Mrs. Hammersley, Mr. Collars, and Mrs. Horner only were present." These papers are offered without any explanatory or accompanying evidence whatever beyond that just alluded to, that they were signed by Mrs. Hammersley, and are left, for the effect they are to have in the cause, to rest on the presumption arising from the bare fact that they were signed, and such evidence as they intrinsically afford. There were the apparent means and opportunity for the appellants to have furnished this explanatory evidence, the importance of which will be presently seen, for, although it is shown that Andrew J. Collars is dead, Mrs. Horner, the other witness who was present on both occasions mentioned in the agreement, and saw all of the papers signed, according to her testimony, was twice on the stand in the course of the proceedings below as a witness—once when called by the plaintiffs, and again on the call of the defendants (appellants). These papers are worthless as proof in the cause in discharging the burden of proof the appellants are called upon to gratify, as has heretofore, been pointed out, and only serve to arouse suspicion and to give suggestion of fraudulent contrivance. One of them was executed, or purports to have been, on the 29th of July, 1899, and is as follows: "This memoranda or paper is to certify that whereas I have made certain provision for George D. Hammersley and Elizabeth Bell (wife of John Bell) my only grandchildren, and by way of explanation why these bequests are not more, I have to say that George W. Hammersley, my son (now deceased), received during his lifetime house rent free for about 20 or 25 years, amounting to five or six thousand dollars, in addition one or two insurance policies on his life. The premiums or assessments were nearly always paid for by myself, from my individual purse, or that of my husband. And these policies were paid to the above-named grandchildren. All this was in addition to his weekly salary for his services. This statement is made in order that I show that I have not been illiberal with them. And what Mary D. Horner may do for them in future is left with her to use her own free will, discretion and judgment. Witness my hand and seal this 29th day of July, 1899. [Signed] E. B. Hammersley. [Seal.]" Sworn to, etc.

It may be said of this paper in passing that in itself it gives no evidence that Mrs. Hammersley had knowledge of the character and effect of the instruments she is alleged to have executed on the day it bears date. On the contrary, it would indicate that she did not have such knowledge. The paper speaks of "bequests," and not of deeds, to take immediate effect. It also indicates that there was in her mind some idea of Mrs. Horner doing something for the grandchilddren in the future, which is inconsistent with the knowledge that the transaction in question here had given to Mrs. Horner a mere pittance, and left her powerless to help anybody. Again, while it mentions considerations that might reasonably have had effect in distributing the property as between her children and her grandchildren, it is far from the suggestion of a reason why practically all of her property, acknowledged to be considerable, should go "in the nature of a gift" to Albert N. Horner, to the entire exclusion of one of her children, and to the putting of herself in a state of absolute dependence. Others of the papers or exhibits, to which reference is now being had, are four deeds and a paper referring to the deeds as confirmatory of those of the 29th of July, 1899. These confirmatory deeds all purport to have been executed and acknowledged on the 14th of February, 1900, and are identical in every respect, excepting only dates of execution and acknowledgment, and being witnessed alone by Andrew J. Collars, instead of by both Mrs. Horner and Collars, with the deed of the 29th of July, 1899.

The paper just mentioned as referring to the deed as confirmatory bears the same date as the deeds, and is as follows: "Whereas on the 29th day of July, 1899, I executed sundry papers qualified to them before Justice Andrew J. Collars, J. P., and now I again execute confirmatory deeds of them and sundry other papers confirming those first signed in July, 1899, and hereby confirm and affirm each and all of them as being my own opinion in writing—my suggestions in writing, my hope and expectations. I have made no will. These affidavits and suggestions are specifically not intended to be a will, and are not to be so construed under any circumstances to be a will in any sense whatever. And while I am aware the way I have disposed of my property which suits me, if it is contested by any person or persons this writing and suggestions and requests, will to the legal mind, in order to thwart the end I wish to accomplish, look suspicious of future trouble and by employing fine points of law, citing of authorities on insanity, old age, collusion, and my yielding to persuasion of others, and by oratorical effect seek to have my deeds and papers annulled; my only reason for such forestallment of what might occur, is the already and before this date, attempted connivance with my own offspring to frustrate what may be arranged by me for the welfare of them that will in all human probability live after I am no more. This feature of intention to try to annul anything I may do has already come to my knowledge, and for me to prepare for such a contingency is only common sense. I have deeded my property to others for a consideration, as deemed best by me, that no one understands as well as myself and to avoid any of my family matters being aired in court is surely a privilege that is, to say the least, proper and reasonable and all courts of law and equity, and all judges and juries that may in the course of events be called upon to hear contests of the deeds executed, or pass judgment upon these papers or deeds executed, and qualified to by me at this date while I am sound in mind are hereby requested to uphold the same to the letter, no matter by whom assailed. This paper has been, as well as all other papers before signed and now signed, in my possession for many hours, yes days, and with assistance have expressed my own ideas fully I believe I have read them over and over and I am fully cognizant of their import and effect and I hereby suggest, request and implore, that no court of justice, law or equity will annul or change them. Witness my hand and seal and affidavit to the same this 14th day of February A. D. 1900. [Signed] Elizabeth B. Hammersley. [Seal.] Sworn to, etc.

The two accessory papers, which have been fully set out, appear to have been sworn to. Why they should have been executed, and with this solemnity, is not attempted to be explained, except by the vague suggestions in the papers themselves, and it does not appear that there was the slightest foundation for the intimations contained in the papers of the purpose of their existence beyond the imagination and the fears of their author. If the transaction to which they related was the free, uninfluenced, voluntary, and deliberate act that the appellants claim it to have been, much less secretive and suspicious, and more effective, means could have been employed to make this appear. A circumstance having significance in connection with these papers appears in the evidence. Mrs. Horner, as a witness, was asked if her mother (Mrs. Hammersley) had, at the time of the making of the deeds in controversy, made any provision for her (Mrs. Hammersley's) son, William H. Hammersley, and answered, "No." Asked, further, if he (the son) was not at the time "almost wholly dependent upon his mother for his support," she answered, "He was." Being then asked: "How has he been supported since her death?" she answered: "By what I give him." This shows William H. Hammersley, the son, to be dependent upon Mrs. Horner and her husband (appellants). It is to be observed that in the papers now being considered as the principal evidence of the appellants no explanation is thought necessary to be made why, in making disposition of her property, Mrs. Hammersley should altogether have ignored her son, William, while care is taken to explain why she was not more liberal with her grandchildren. The radical defect, however, in the papers in question as proof to the point upon which they were offered, is that it nowhere appears in evidence that the deeds involved in the controversy here were ever, as a matter of fact, read by, or read to, the grantor; and these papers do not upon their face indicate that Mrs. Hammersley had knowledge of the contests of such deeds by any reference to such contents. General and vague reference is made in them to instruments executed and provisions made, but they give no information of what the instruments contain or what provisions had been made. Upon the assumption, therefore, that she read over the papers now being discussed, she might have had in mind, as far as here appears, very different provisions in reference to her property from those which the deeds made. The futility of this evidence is enforced by the fact that it is not shown as a fact, but merely as a presumption, that she knew what was expressed in the papers we are now considering. With the exception of the evidence which has been adverted to, there is none in the record even designed to show that prior to the execution of the deeds in controversy Mrs. Hammersley ever expressed an intention to dispose of her property as the deeds disposed of it, or that after the deeds had been executed she ever expressed or indicated a knowledge of how she had disposed of it. It is not perceived just what office the so-called confirmatory deeds were intended to perform. The execution of these deeds to confirm the deeds previously made would seem to be an admission, or would indicate a fear, upon the part of somebody, of infirmity in the prior deeds. The execution of the confirmatory deeds, and of the paper in connection with them, indicated a good deal of anxiety and pains on the part of somebody to cure such infirmity. The inquiry naturally arises why this anxiety and pains on the part of Mrs. Hammersley to confirm and render secure a transaction which left a dependent son penniless, and gave comparative pittance to her daughter and grandchildren, and nearly all of a considerable property to a son-in-law.

We search the record in vain for any explanation of this; or for any reason impelling or inducing Mrs. Hammersley to such an act. It is pregnant, however, with motive and inducement for the appellants to have been at this pains. If there was infirmity in the deeds of the 29th of July, 1899, and the confirmatory deeds of the 14th of February, 1900, were necessary to confirm and complete the transaction of the former date, then the "gift" which was intended to be made by Mrs. Hammersley was really made by the deeds of the later date. At that time there could be no doubt of the confidential relations existing between her and the appellants, nor of the agency of Albert N. Horner in respect to the transaction which was thus perfected. He had had, at the time, for months, in his keeping the instrumentalities for disposing of the whole of her property, and was guiding her by his advice in relation thereto. The same burden of proof that the appellants would have to gratify to establish the deeds, which were set up as the effective deeds, would devolve upon them with respect to the so-called confirmatory deeds in the attempt to give these latter instruments effect. All that has been said with respect to the proof in the case applies as well to the so-called confirmatory deeds as to those originally executed. We do not think it necessary to extend this already lengthy opinion to present other considerations suggested by the record and going to show the propriety of the decree here appealed from.

We approve of the decree, and the same will be affirmed, for reasons we have given.

Decree affirmed, with costs to the appellees.

DULANEY et al. v. DEVRIES et al.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 7, 1905.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

A bill for specific performance of a contract whereby complainants advanced moneys to the trustees of a lunatic, the moneys to be repaid from the proceeds of a sale of his real estate, could only be sustained on a clear showing that the contract was actually made, that it was one which the court would have authorized or approved at the time, had it been in possession of all the facts, and that the money sought to be recovered was advanced on the faith of the contract.

2. SAME—MAKING OF CONTRACT.

In a suit for the specific performance of an alleged contract, whereby complainants advanced moneys to the trustees of a lunatic, the moneys to be repaid from the proceeds of a sale of his real estate, evidence considered, and held insufficient to show the contract.

3. INSANE PERSONS—ADVANCEMENTS TO COMMITTEE—LEGALITY OF CONTRACT.

The court would not approve a contract whereby the trustees of a lunatic borrowed moneys which were to be repaid from the proceeds of a sale of the lunatic's real estate, the contract being made on the ground that a sale of such real estate at that time would be unadvisable, where at that time one of the trustees was indebted to the trust estate to the extent of $4,000 and there was $1,000 belonging to the lunatic in a bank.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Baltimore County, in Equity; David Fowler, Judge.

Suit by Henry S. Dulaney and others as trustees of the Charles A. Vogeler Company, against Henry A. Devries and others. From an order dismissing the bill, complainants appeal. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

R. E. Lee Marshall, Joseph C. France, Francis T. Holmer, and James McEvoy, for appellants. Randolph Barton, for appellees.

BURKE, J. This is an appeal from an order of the circuit court for Baltimore county dismissing the bill of the appellants which sought to have the contract alleged in the bill recognized as a valid and subsisting obligation, and to have the personal estate of Samuel K. George Devries, deceased, applied to the payment of a debt which it is alleged was due under said contract by the deceased to the plaintiffs, and that the interest of said deceased in certain real estate mentioned in the bill might be sold, and the proceeds thereof applied to the payment of so much of said debt as might remain unsatisfied after the application of said personal estate to the payment of said debt. The debt alleged to be due by the deceased to the plaintiffs, as of the 6th day of February, 1904, is $17,290.83. The position of the plaintiffs is that the contract set forth in the bill should be treated as an equitable lien upon the real and personal property of the deceased therein mentioned, and that the court should recognize and enforce said contract by granting the specific relief sought by the bill.

A brief statement of some of the more prominent facts and circumstances in the history of events which gave rise to this litigation would make more easy the decision of the issues raised by the pleadings. William Devries, of Baltimore, died in November, 1877. At the time of his death he was the head of the firm of William Devries & Co., a large and successful dry goods firm, whose place of business was located on Baltimore street. The members of this firm consisted of himself, William R. Devries, a son, and Christian Devries. William Devries left surviving him six children, three sons and three daughters, who were his only heirs at law and next of kin. His sons were William R. Devries, Samuel K. George Devries, and Henry A. Devries. His daughters (using their married names) were Grace G. Tuck, Belle D. Goodwin, and Eliza Boynton. Samuel K. George Devries and William R. Devries died before the institution of this suit. William R. Devries left surviving him three children, who were made defendants to the bill of complaint, and whose names are Lydia Whitridge, Mary Frick, and William Devries. Henry A. Devries, the only surviving son of William Devries, is made a party defendant as the administrator of Samuel K. George Devries. William Devries died intestate, seised and possessed of a large real and personal estate situated in Baltimore City and Baltimore county. Letters of administration upon his estate were granted to Christian Devries, who accounted for and distributed the personal estate in the orphans' court for Baltimore county, and who also, as trustee appointed under appropriate equity proceedings, sold all the real estate of said deceased, except the property known as the "Pill Box Farm" located in Baltimore county. Shortly after the death of William Devries, Samuel K. George Devries was, by an inquisition had in the circuit court for Baltimore county, found to be a non compos mentis, and by an order of that court passed on the 17th day of December, 1877, Christian Devries and Henry A. Devries were appointed committee of the person and trustees of the estate of said lunatic. They each qualified under their appointment, and assumed the discharge of the trust. Samuel K. George Devries was a member of the firm of Devries, Young & Co. Upon their qualification as committee and trustees of said lunatic, it was agreed between them that Henry A. Devries should look after the personal wants and comfort of said lunatic, and that Christian Devries should have entire charge of his property and estate, and attend to the investment of all funds of the lunatic coming into their hands as trustees.

A large estate, to which Samuel K. George Devries was entitled from the estate of his father and as a member of the firm of Devries, Young & Co. passed into the hands of his trustees. It appears from the plaintiffs' Exhibit X that on June 1, 1884, the net balance which should have been in the hands of the trustees of the lunatic on that date was $60,504.82. Subsequently, to wit, in 1886, the warehouse property belonging to the estate of William Devries was sold, and the share of the lunatic in the net proceeds of sale was $14,004.20. In 1895 the property of William Devries located on Charles street was sold, and the share of the lunatic was ascertained by the auditor's account to be $2,274.78. In addition thereto, there was to the credit of the lunatic in the Eutaw Savings Bank the sum of $949. Allowing $6,000, a most liberal allowance, for the maintenance of the lunatic from June 1, 1884, to April 1, 1887, the date when the first charge on the account sought to be recovered in this case was made, there ought to have been in the hands of the trustees, as principal belonging to the estate of Samuel K. George Devries at the time the alleged contract was entered into, the sum of $68,509.02. But the bill alleges "that in or about the year 1887 practically the only property or estate then belonging to or owned by said lunatic consisted of the right and interest of the said lunatic, as one of the heirs at law and distributees of his said deceased father, to certain real and personal property, being a part of the estate of his said father; said property consisting of 28 shares of the capital stock of the Peabody Heights Company, a corporation incorporated under the laws of the state of Maryland, and a certain tract or parcel of land, containing 198 acres more or less—the interest of said lunatic in said real and personal property being a one undivided one-sixth interest therein."

What had become of the large amount of money which the testimony shows to have passed into the hands of the trustees? How had it been dissipated and lost? An examination of the evidence will disclose a most lamentable case of mismanagement of the trust funds, and an utter disregard of duty on the part of Christian Devries, and at the same time will aid us in fixing the value of his testimony in support of the contract alleged in the bill. Upon the dissolution of the old firm of William Devries & Co. in 1877, by the death of William Devries, a new partnership was formed, trading under the old firm name of William Devries & Co., to carry on the business in which the former firm had been engaged. This partnership was subsequently renewed. It was composed of Christian Devries and the five children of William Devries, deceased, viz., William R. Devries, Henry A. Devries, Mrs. Tuck, Mrs. Goodwin, and Mrs. Boynton. In 1882 Christian Devries formed a partnership with Mrs. Minnie Vogeler to carry on the business of manufacturing and selling proprietary medicines, among which was St. Jacob's Oil. In this partnership the members of the firm of William Devries & Co. acquired a three-fifths interest in the profits; the other two-fifths being the property of Mrs. Vogeler. The interest of the members of the firm of William Devries & Co. in the profits of the Charles A. Vogeler Company is in the same proportion as their shares in the firm of William Devries & Co.; that is to say, 30 per cent. to William R. Devries, 30 per cent. to Christian Devries, and 10 per cent. each to Henry A. Devries, Mrs. Tuck, Mrs. Goodwin, and Mrs. Boynton. Christian Devries was the general managing partner in the Vogeler Company, which did a large and profitable business for a number of years, but finally became embarrassed and made a deed of trust for the benefit of creditors on the 18th day of December, 1899. The firm of William Devries & Co. ceased to do business in 1884, at which time the testimony shows it to have been insolvent. The record shows that the children of William Devries had the most implicit confidence in the integrity and business capacity of Christian Devries. He was a man of large and varied business experience, and they looked to him for guidance and advice in business matters. Mrs. Goodwin in her testimony said: "We looked to Mr. Christian Devries for everything, and consulted him about the most minute details of our living." And to the same effect is the testimony of Mrs. Tuck. Upon the failure of the Vogeler Company there was found upon its books the account, which is the subject of this suit, of loans and advances made for the support and maintenance of Samuel K. George Devries, and it was also discovered that practically the whole estate of the lunatic, except the small portion thereof mentioned in the bill, had been loaned by Christian Devries, as trustee, without authority, to the firm of William Devries & Co., and had been lost, or had been applied by him to the payment of the debts of the firm. This suit was not brought until more than three years after the failure of the Vogeler Company, and not until after the death of William R. Devries, who would have been a most important witness as to all the transactions in connection with the contract sought to be enforced in this case.

We will now state such material allegations of the bill as may be necessary to a proper disposition of the case. It alleges the appointment and qualification of the plaintiffs as the trustees of the Vogeler Company; that it became the duty of the plaintiffs under their appointment to collect and reduce to money all debts due to the Vogeler Company. It alleges the proceedings by which Samuel K. George Devries was adjudged to be a lunatic, and the appointment and qualification of Christian Devries and Henry A. Devries as committee and trustees; that said committee and trustees maintained and supported said lunatic at an asylum for the insane from 1877 until 1887, during which period they paid the necessary and reasonable expenses of his maintenance and clothing; that the estate of the lunatic consisted in a large part of his interest in the estate of his deceased father. It then alleges "that the expenses so incurred and paid by said committee and trustees, during the period aforesaid, exhausted the estate of said lunatic in the hands of said trustees," and that about the year 1887 the only estate belonging to said lunatic was his undivided one-sixth interest in the "Pill Box Farm" and in the 28 shares of the capital stock of the Peabody Heights Company, both of which properties were unproductive, but that neither of said properties could be sold without great loss and injury to the best interest of the lunatic; "that under these circumstances it was impossible for said trustees to maintain and provide for said lunatic out of his own estate, or by a sale thereof in the usual course to provide sufficient means to maintain him, except by the application of the principal of the proceeds of any such sale, or pledge, in consequence whereof it was apparent that the entire estate of said lunatic would soon be exhausted, and that said lunatic would be left without any means of support, and dependent upon public or private charity"; that as the best and most available means of preserving and protecting the estate and property of said lunatic, and at the same time of furnishing the present means of providing for his reasonable and necessary wants and comforts, and of keeping and maintaining said lunatic in the manner best adapted to his welfare and interest, the contract which forms the basis of this suit was entered into. That contract is stated in the bill in the following words: "Said trustees in the discharge of the duties of their office, entered into an arrangement with the said Charles A. Vogeler Company, in which company the defendants were all largely interested, whereby the said Vogeler Company undertook and agreed to advance and loan to the said lunatic, and to pay to the said trustees for his use and benefit, from time to time, as and when the same might be required for the needs of said lunatic such sum or sums of money, as might be required for the maintenance of said lunatic and for providing him with reasonable necessities and comforts, and to this end to pay over such sum or sums to said trustees to be so expended as aforesaid, and at such times and places as the said trustees should require. And in consideration thereof, said trustees promised and agreed on behalf of said lunatic to repay any and all sums so advanced by said Charles A. Vogeler Company for the purpose aforesaid, with interest on said several sums from the date of the loan thereof, whenever and as soon as said trustees should determine that the principal of said lunatic's estate as aforesaid could be sold and disposed of without loss or injury to the best interest of said lunatic. It being understood that the money so loaned and advanced as aforesaid should be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of said estate, and that the sale thereof should be made only when, in the judgment of said trustees, a sale would be to the best interest of said lunatic. And it being further understood and agreed that at the proper time, the said trustees would report the facts and circumstances hereinbefore set out to the court, having jurisdiction, and that an order should be passed ratifying and confirming said contract and agreement and authorizing and empowering said trustees to give full force and effect thereto." The bill then alleges that the Vogeler Company, in pursuance of said contract and agreement, advanced to said trustees, for the use of said lunatic, the sum of money sought to be recovered in this suit; that said contract was greatly to the advantage of said lunatic, and "that unless the said Charles A. Vogeler Company had consented to enter into said agreement, and to supply, in pursuance thereof, the money necessary for the maintenance of said lunatic, said trustees would have been compelled to sell and dispose of the only estate and property possessed by said lunatic, at a ruinous sacrifice, and said lunatic would have long since been left without resources or estate of any kind, thereby of necessity becoming a charge upon the public or private charity; that by virtue of said agreement, said trustees were enabled not only to continue to provide for the needs of said lunatic, but to preserve his said estate and property until the same should increase in value, to the great benefit and advantage of said lunatic."

It is to be observed that the allegations of the bill are so framed as to induce the court to believe that there was an urgent necessity for making the contract, and that the trustees of the lunatic were governed by what they considered to be his best interests. But from what we have said it will appear that the bill omits important and controlling facts and circumstances which should have been brought to the attention of the court, and which were within the knowledge of Christian Devries, from whom it is fair to presume the plaintiffs derived the information upon which the bill was filed. It omits to state the extent of the lunatic's estate which came into the hands of his trustees, and which, as we have shown, was quite large. It fails to state that the greater portion of this estate was lost by the unwarranted act of Christian Devries. It makes no mention of the fact that at the time the alleged contract was made there were funds on deposit in the savings bank belonging to the lunatic approximating $1,000, and that Christian Devries was indebted to the trust estate, at the time the alleged contract was made, to the extent of $3,975, money loaned, and which the evidence shows he was amply able to pay. We need not multiply authorities to show that in cases for specific performance of contracts the plaintiff must establish the very contract set up in his bill, and where he seeks to charge real or personal estate with the payment of money expended under the contract he must show that the contract was entered into with reference to said property, and that the money was advanced upon the faith of the pledge of the property for its repayment. The agreement to be enforced must be certain, and defined and proved by clear and satisfactory evidence; otherwise, the court will refuse its specific execution. It was said in Semmes v. Worthington, 88 Md. 299, that "in all cases for specific performance the contract must be accurately stated in the bill, and the proof must in every essential particular correspond with the contract thus set out." The general principles by which the court is guided upon applications of this kind were stated with clearness and accuracy by Schmucker, J., in Horner v. Woodland, 88 Md. 512, 41 Atl. 1080, as follows: "Specific performance is not a matter of right in the litigant, but is one of sound judicial discretion controlled by established principles of equity, and it will be granted, or withheld by the court upon a consideration of all the circumstances of each particular case. The contract sought to be enforced must be certain and definite in its terms, and must be so clearly proven as to satisfy the court that it constitutes the actual agreement between the parties, if any of these ingredients are wanting the specific performance will not be decreed."

In order to sustain the bill, the court must be satisfied (1) that the contract alleged was actually made; (2) that, if made, it was one which the court would have authorized or approved at the time had it been in possession of all the facts and circumstances; (3) that the money sought to be recovered was advanced upon the faith of the contract. The proof of the contract rests upon the testimony of Christian Devries. He was the only witness called by the plaintiffs. It is a singular circumstance that, of all the persons now living who had been connected with the firm of William Devries & Co. and with the Vogeler Company, he alone appears to be the only person who had knowledge of the making of the contract. None of the other witnesses knew, or ever heard of, any such contract until the institution of this suit. In his testimony he states that William R. Devries, who is now deceased, represented the interests of his brothers and sisters in the firm of William Devries & Co., and he seeks to convey the impression that he believed they had knowledge, not only of the contract, but of the investment of the lunatic's funds in the firm of Devries & Co. It is difficult to credit this testimony in view of the great weight of evidence that he, and not William R. Devries, was their representative in all business matters. Mrs. Goodwin testified that she looked to Christian Devries for everything; and Mrs. Tuck said: "I never went to Mr. William R. Devries in my life for anything of that kind, and Christian Devries knows that he, Christian Devries, made every arrangement for us. He was our representative." And Mrs. Boynton testified that William R. Devries "never represented us in anything whatever." As to his statement that he believed that the family of William Devries had knowledge of the investment and loss of the moneys of the lunatic, the evidence is convincing that he studiously concealed the loss from them, and misled them to the very last. Mrs. Goodwin says that they "believed that everything was all right, and that he made everything as clear as possible for us, and that we were made to think that we were people in the most comfortable circumstances." In the testimony of Mrs. Tuck it appears she had an interview with Christian Devries as late as June, 1899, in which she asked him about the lunatic's estate, at which time he told her that his estate was intact. In January, 1900, after the failure of the Vogeler Company, she had another interview with him, in the course of which he told her "that George's money was all gone." "I reproached him," she says, "with having deceived us, and his reply was: 'If I had told you the real condition of affairs, you would have changed your way of living, and that would have affected the credit, and the crash would have come sooner than it did.'"

We will now examine the testimony of Christian Devries upon which the plaintiffs rely to support the contract. He has given three distinct versions of this contract. After referring to the dissolution of the last firm of William Devries & Co., and the application of the entire assets of the firm, including the lunatic's money, to the payment of its debts, he stated that "there was then nothing to pay the debt due and owing to the estate of the lunatic," and that the attention of William R. Devries was called to that fact "as soon as we had arrived at that point when we had ascertained the condition of the firm's affairs about the interest of the lunatic, as he [William R. Devries] was largely overdrawn in the firm of William Devries & Co., as well as his sister, Mrs. Goodwin, and, as they both had an interest in the firm of Charles A. Vogeler Company, which at that time was a very profitable business, that the interest of the two mentioned would reimburse the trustees of the estate of Samuel K. George Devries." It was apparent that this statement did not prove the contract, and therefore the counsel for the plaintiffs propounded this question: "Now, Mr. Devries, in this situation, being without, as you testify, any income to support the lunatic, just recount what measures were taken and what led up to those measures to continue to support him?" To which the witness replied that he had already stated that arrangement in the testimony we have quoted. Counsel then said: "Well, I want you to get that thoroughly straightened out." Whereupon the witness answered as follows: "William R. Devries, who had charge of the finances of William Devries & Co., was a member of that firm, stated to me that he thought the simplest way to provide funds for the lunatic was to borrow the money from the Charles A. Vogeler Company, and, if there were funds sufficient coming from that firm collected hereafter, the Charles A. Vogeler Company could be reimbursed, and, if not, his interest in the two pieces of property, the farm in Baltimore county and the Peabody Heights Company would be sufficient, and, as he and his sister had largely overdrawn their accounts in the firm of William Devries & Co., what they paid into that firm would reimburse the trustees for any money advanced by the Charles A. Vogeler Company." Under these arrangements it appears that the primary source from which the money advanced by the Vogeler Company was to be returned by payments made by William R. Devries and Mrs. Goodwin out of their interest in future collections, made on account of the firm of William Devries & Co. That Christian Devries believed that these collections would be ample to repay the amounts advanced is quite clear from his testimony. There was no attempt made to prove that there was any understanding to report the contract or arrangement, whatever it might have been, to the court for its ratification, as alleged in the bill. The two accounts already given being insufficient to establish a lien against the real and personal estate of the lunatic, the witness was afterwards, at a subsequent sitting, asked this leading question: "Do I understand you to mean that any promise or undertaking on the part of William R. Devries, or on the part of his sister, Mrs. Goodwin, constituted any part of the arrangement or consideration of the loan made to you as trustees?" To this question he replied that he looked entirely to the interest of the lunatic in his father's estate for the payment of the advances, and that was the sole consideration which induced the loan. This evidence is utterly inconsistent with his previous testimony.

It is not pretended that his co-trustee had any knowledge of the making of the alleged contract, and we are satisfied that he was never aware of the fact that any such contract was claimed to have been made until after the institution of this suit. Henry A. Devries, his co-trustee, testified that after the failure of the Vogeler Company Christian Devries told him that "he had lost George's money, and that there was an account on the Vogeler Company's books against him, and when the time came he would go on the stand and testify that he had no right whatever to advance that money." The attention of Christian Devries was called to this testimony, and he did not deny it. We are of opinion, upon a careful examination of the record, that the contract alleged in the bill is not proved. But, if it be conceded that it was made, it would not have received the sanction of the court had the trustees made a full and candid disclosure of all the facts and circumstances connected with their management of the trust, and of its exact condition at the time.

The order appealed from will therefore be affirmed. Order affirmed, with costs to the appellees.

SHARP v. BATES.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 6, 1905.)

1. CONTRACTS — ACKNOWLEDGMENT UNDER SEAL OF DEBT—OBLIGATION TO PAY.

A memorandum in writing under seal, executed by a debtor, whereby a debt is acknowledged to be owing, obligates the debtor to pay it.

2. SAME—ACCEPTANCE—PERFORMANCE OF ACT REQUIRED.

Indorsers on a note, by a writing under seal executed by them, requested plaintiff, an indorser, to pay the note at maturity, and agreed to refund the amount in accordance with an agreement, and to severally pay plaintiff the amounts set opposite their respective names within 30 days after the maturity of the note. Held, that the obligation created by the instrument became operative, without acceptance under seal, on plaintiff paying the note at maturity.

3. SAME.

The right of plaintiff to recover on his paying the note at maturity was founded on the instrument, and the question whether the facts set forth in the declaration in a suit on the instrument formed by operation of law a valid contract by offer and acceptance was immaterial.

4. SAME—TIME TO SUE.

Indorsers on a note, by writing under seal executed by them, requested plaintiff, an indorser, to pay it at maturity, and agreed to refund to him the amount paid within 30 days after maturity, and stipulated that, if any indorser failed to pay his share within 30 days, his share should be prorated among the solvent indorsers, such increase to be paid within 10 days after the expiration of the 30 days. Held, that a suit by plaintiff, who paid the note at maturity, against one of the indorsers, for his share, was not prematurely brought, when brought after the expiration of 30 days after the payment of the note, though before the expiration of 10 days thereafter.

5. JUDGMENT — FINAL JUDGMENT — WHAT CONSTITUTES.

A default judgment merely establishes plaintiff's right to recover, the amount of which must be ascertained, and is not a final judgment until the amount is ascertained.

6. APPEAL — DEFAULT JUDGMENT — APPEAL-ABILITY.

No appeal lies from such default judgment.

Appeal from Baltimore City Court; Henry Stockbridge, Judge.

Action by James W. Bates against Ernest Sharp. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Dismissed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Arthur L. Jackson, for appellant. John Hinkley, for appellee.

McSHERRY, C. J. The appeal in this case must be dismissed because no final judgment has been entered; but, inasmuch as the record can again be brought here after the rendition of such a judgment if the merits of the controversy are not now disposed of, we will consider and determine the merits before passing an order of dismissal.

On December 9, 1904, an action of debt was brought by the appellee against the appellant in the Baltimore city court on a certain writing obligatory which was filed with the declaration. It appears, from the declaration and the papers forming part of it, that the Maryland Stamping Company was indebted to the Second National Bank of Baltimore on a promissory note for $1,100 falling due November 2, 1904, and that the appellant, the appellee, and three other persons were indorsers on that note. It further appears that on October 29th of the same year the appellant and three other indorsers of the note just mentioned wrote to the appellee, and signed and sealed the following instrument, which is the cause of action in the pending controversy, viz.:

"October 29th, 1904.

"Mr. James W. Bates: The note of the Maryland Stamping Company for $1,100 held by the Second National Bank will fall due on November 2, 1904. We request you as one of the indorsers to pay the said note at maturity, hereby waiving protest, and agree to refund the said amount to you in accordance with agreement of January 2, 1904, in the proportion of our holdings of stock as shown by the following table:

| | Stock. | Per Ct. | 2nd Natl. Bank. |
|-------------------------|--------------------|---------------|-------------------|
| James W. Bates | $ 5,000 00 | 12 00 | $ 133 10 |
| Abraham Sharp | 1,500 00 | 3 62 | 39 93 |
| Ernest Sharp | 7,925 00 | 19 18 | 210 98 |
| John R. Korb..... | 21,900 00 | 52 99 | 582 89 |
| John B. Stansbury | 5,000 00 | 12 00 | 133 10 |
| | $41,325 00 | 100 00 | $1,100 00 |

"We severally agree to pay you the amounts of our respective shares, as above within 30 days from November 2, 1904, with interest from that date. Should any indorser fail to pay his share within said period of 30 days, the share of the one so failing to pay is to be prorated among the solvent indorsers, each contributing with you a proportionately increased share, and such increase to be paid within 10 days after the expiration of said 30 days.

"John Korb. [Seal.]

"John B. Stansbury. [Seal.]

"Abraham Sharp. [Seal.]

"Ernest Sharp. [Seal.]"

It further appears that the appellee, to whom the above paper was addressed, paid to the Second National Bank the $1,100 note upon its maturity, as he had been requested by the other indorsers to do. He now demands from the appellant the sum of $210.98, being the amount which the latter agreed by the above-quoted instrument to repay to the appellee.

To the declaration the appellant demurred. The demurrer was overruled, and, upon his declining to plead over, a judgment by default was entered against him, and thereupon he took this appeal, though the judgment by default had not been extended in dollars and cents. The grounds of demurrer are, first, that the writing obligatory, referred to in the narr. and above transcribed, does not constitute a valid completed contract; secondly, that the facts alleged in the declaration do not form, by operation of law, a valid contract by offer and acceptance; and, thirdly, that the suit was prematurely brought. We do not think any of these grounds can be maintained.

No precise form of words is necessary to create a bond or obligation, and therefore any memorandum in writing under seal, whereby a debt is acknowledged to be owing, will obligate the party to pay; for it is said that any words which prove a man to be a debtor, if they be under seal, will charge him with the payment of the money. Cover v. Stem, 67 Md. 451, 10 Atl. 231, 1 Am. St. Rep. 406, and cases there cited. The argument of the appellant, however, is that the paper writing, though under seal, is merely an offer to pay, and therefore not an obligation to pay, and that it did not and could not become binding as a writing obligatory until accepted by the appellee by an instrument under seal. We do not so interpret it. The paper embodied the several and distinct obligation of each of the signatories to pay a definite and ascertained sum at a specified time upon the happening of a named condition. It therefore constituted a perfectly valid writing obligatory, and required no formal acceptance under seal on the part of the appellee to give it legal efficacy. By the proper construction of the paper it was to become binding on the parties to it when the appellee actually paid the $1,100 note to the bank. It was to be operative as soon as the contingency happened. By its express terms it was designed to be binding, and in reality was binding, when that event did occur, and therefore nothing but the happening of the contingency was required to definitely fix the liability of the parties who signed it. An acceptance under the seal of the appellee would not have fastened any obligation on the appellant to pay the sum sued for in this action, because the promise to pay was not founded or made dependent on such an acceptance, but was based solely upon the condition that the appellee would satisfy the note at its maturity, and the writing obligatory "would become operative as soon as that contingency happened, and not before." King v. Warfield, 67 Md. 249, 9 Atl. 539, 1 Am. St. Rep. 384. In the case of Boyd v. Klenzie et al., 46 Md. 294, a bond signed by 12 persons bound them to pay the sum of $2,500 each, "making in all the sum of $30,000," for the purchase of hops and malt, which one Peter Schnider might buy for the use of the Baltimore County Brewing, Malting & Distilling Company. No payee was named in the bond. The appellant furnished to the brewing company hops and malt, and then sued all the makers of the bond jointly. It was not pretended that the bond was not valid, and the only question considered by the court was whether the obligation was the joint or the several undertaking of the obligors whose seals were affixed thereto. The liability of the makers was contingent until some one actually sold to Schnider hops and malt for the brewery, and after such a sale had been made the liability of the obligors became fixed to the vendors to the extent of the several undertakings assumed by each one of the 12 persons who signed and sealed the paper. It is wholly immaterial whether the facts set forth in the declaration now before us form by operation of law a valid contract by offer and acceptance, because the right of the appellee to recover in this action does not depend upon any contract evidenced in that way. His right of action is founded on the written paper, which is complete in itself, and which, as we have already observed, fixed by its own terms the liability of each signer as soon as the extrinsic event—the payment of the note—occurred. The money due on the $1,100 note was paid to the Second National Bank by the appellee, and, 30 days having expired after the date of that payment and before the suit was brought, the right of the appellee to recover cannot be questioned or disputed.

The second clause of the writing sued on covered the contingency of some of the indorsers failing to pay to the appellee their ratable proportions within 30 days after the 2d of November, 1904. If that event had happened, 10 days' additional time was given to the solvent indorsers to repay to the appellee their proportions of such delinquent's share. This suit, however, was not brought to recover any portion of such a share, but only to compel the appellant to pay the specific sum he undertook primarily to pay. Thirty days elapsed between the 2d of November, the date upon which the appellee paid the $1,100 note to the Second National Bank, and the 9th of December, when this suit was instituted; and hence the suit was not prematurely brought.

No final judgment has been entered in this case. The judgment by default does no more than establish the right of the appellee, the plaintiff below, to recover something. The amount which he is entitled to recover remains yet to be ascertained. Green v. Hamilton, 16 Md. 317, 77 Am. Dec. 295. The judgment by default is merely interlocutory, and is not a lien until the amount is ascertained. Davidson v. Myers, 24 Md. 538. No execution can be issued upon the judgment by default. It cannot be superseded, and it possesses none of the attributes or qualities of a final judgment. From such a judgment no appeal will lie. The motion to dismiss must therefore prevail, and it is so ordered. Appeal dismissed, with costs.

WHITCOMB v. MASON.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 6, 1905.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT—DUTIES OF LANDLORD—CARE OF HALLWAYS.

Where a landlord leases separate portions of the same building to different tenants, and reserves under his control the halls, stairways, and other portions of the building used in common by the tenants, he is bound to use reasonable diligence to keep the portions of the building so retained under his control in a safe condition, and free from improper obstructions; but his duty in that respect is measured and limited by the uses and purposes to which it is reasonable, from the situation and nature of the building, to infer that the halls, stairways, etc., were intended to be subjected in making the leases.

2. SAME.

An owner of an office building, the apartments in which are rented principally to lawyers, is under no obligation to keep an outer door of the building, situated on the second floor, open or unlocked on Sundays, and is not liable for the destruction of a tenant's furniture caused by the tenant's inability to remove the same from the building through the second story doorway during an unusual and unprecedented fire occurring on Sunday.

3. SAME — ACTIONS AGAINST LANDLORD — PRAYERS.

In an action against the owner of an office building for the destruction of a tenant's furniture, caused by his being unable to remove the same from the building during a fire, where there was evidence that the only door by which plaintiff's furniture could be removed was securely locked during the fire, a request to take the case from the jury for want of evidence that defendant prevented plaintiff from removing his furniture was properly denied.

4. APPEAL—ORDERS APPEALABLE—DENIAL OF NEW TRIAL.

A motion for a new trial is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and no appeal will lie from the order granting or refusing the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 2, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 533.]

5. SAME — PRESERVATION OF ERROR — MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—OFFICE OF MOTION.

A motion for a new trial cannot be made to serve the purpose of bringing before the Court of Appeals for review a matter occurring during the trial to which no objection was made at the time.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas; George M. Sharp, Judge.

Action by Thomas J. Mason against James A. Whitcomb. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

John Hinkley, for appellant. M. Albert Levinson and Thomas Ireland Elliott, for appellee.

SCHMUCKER, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the court of common pleas of Baltimore City. The suit was instituted to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the fault and negligence of the appellant in preventing the appellee from removing his furniture from an office, rented by him from the appellant, in time to prevent its destruction by fire. No questions of pleading or admissibility of evidence are raised by the appeal. The only exceptions taken at the trial of the case were to the court's rulings on the prayers, which will be referred to later on in this opinion.

It appears from the record that at the time of the great fire which occurred in Baltimore City on February 7, 1904, the appellee, Mason, occupied, as tenant of the appellant, Whitcomb, a room on the second floor of the office building No. 110 St. Paul street. Whitcomb, who owned the building, was a non-resident, and it was in charge of his resident agent, J. A. Miller. The suit was originally brought against both Whitcomb and Miller, but it was dismissed as to the latter at the trial. The building was about 123 feet deep. A hallway running through it from front to rear on each floor afforded ingress and egress from the rooms rented as offices, and was used in common by their tenants. On one side of this hallway, and about 30 feet back from the front of the building, there was an elevator, and also a stairway, affording access to the different floors. There were two entrances to the building from the street—one at the front end of the hallway on the first floor; and the other at a similar position on the second floor. The entrance on the first floor was on the level of the street, and the one on the second floor was reached from the street by a flight of stone steps ascending sidewise on the outside of the building. The office rented by the appellee was on the second floor, adjoining the elevator and stairway. There is evidence in the record tending to prove that at about 3 o'clock p. m. on the day of the fire Mason, having been informed of its threatening character, went from his home at Hampden in the suburbs of the city to his office in Whitcomb's building, and took from it his insurance policies, and then went out to see the fire. At that time he found the door to the second-story entrance locked, and he went to his office through the door on the first floor, which was open. Becoming alarmed at the increasing speed and fury of the fire, he returned in about an hour and a half, with a wagon, to his office for the purpose of removing its contents to a place of safety. With the aid of several other persons he removed his valuable papers and some of his books by way of the passage and door on the ground floor, but, when he attempted to take his desk and other large articles of furniture out by that way, he found the stairway too cramped to permit them to be carried down to the first floor. He then, with a view of taking those articles out of the building by way of the front door on the second story, again tried that door, but found it still locked, and was unable to open it. It being Sunday, the elevator was not running. About that time he heard that a house in the rear of the building was about to be dynamited in the effort to check the progress of the fire. He thereupon abandoned the attempt to save the residue of his office furniture, and it was soon overtaken and destroyed by the fire. He did not see Mr. Miller, the landlord's agent, on the premises at either visit to his office, nor did he know who had locked the second-story front door. There was evidence, on the contrary, tending to prove that on the afternoon of the fire the second-story front door of the building was not tightly locked, but was held only by a night latch or other fastening that could be easily opened from the inside without a key. In fact, the tenant of one of the other rooms in the building testified without contradiction that at about 2 o'clock on the same afternoon he had opened that door from the inside without difficulty, and gone out through it to the platform of the outside steps leading up to it, and stood there 10 or 15 minutes looking at the passers-by, and then re-entered the building by the same door, which he closed after him without locking it. The amended narr. on which the case was tried, in setting forth the conduct of the defendant complained of by the plaintiff, alleges that the removal of the furniture "was prevented by the fault and negligence of said defendant, who, notwithstanding and in spite of repeated demands by this plaintiff, made by him of the agent of defendant then in possession, the said agent barred and maintained barred the necessary means of exit from said building and office," and by that means alone the plaintiff was unable to remove his furniture, and it was destroyed by the fire. There is, however, no evidence in the record tending to show the making of the alleged demand by the plaintiff upon the defendant's agent.

The theory of the plaintiff's case, as stated on his brief, is that it was the duty of his landlord to secure to him at all times free ingress and egress to and from his office, and the unobstructed use of such passageways and means of exit as to enable him to remove his goods and save them from an impending destruction. The precise question thus arising is one of first presentation, but its solution, in a case like the present one, where there is a mere verbal renting with a total absence of any express covenant on the part of the landlord, must be found in a consideration of the implied obligation resting upon a landlord as such in reference to the physical condition of the demised property. The general doctrine applicable to this subject has recently received careful consideration by us in the case of Smith v. State, 92 Md. 529, 530, 48 Atl. 93, 51 L. R. A. 772. We then said: "There is no implied covenant requiring the landlord to make repairs. Gluck v. Mayor, etc., of Baltimore, 81 Md. 326, 32 Atl. 515, 48 Am. St. Rep. 515. 'There is no implied warranty on a lease of a house or land that it shall be reasonably fit for habitation or cultivation. The implied contract relates only to the estate, not to the condition of the property. When a lease contains no express contract of warranty that the property is or shall be fit for the purpose for which it may be rented, there is no implied warranty to that effect, and in case the property falls down in consequence of some inherent defect the lessor is not bound to repair, and yet the lessee will be compelled to pay the rent.' Hess v. Newcomer, 7 Md. 337. After fully recognizing the landlord's liability to third persons not claiming under the tenant, it is said in Taylor on Landlord and Tenant, § 175 A, that the lessor's liability to the lessee is, however, much more restricted, as the former does not warrant the condition of the premises, and the tenant, because he can inspect them, assumes the risk of their state. For any injury suffered by him during his occupancy by their defective condition, or even faulty construction, he cannot make the lessor answerable, unless there was misrepresentation, active concealment, or perhaps a total inability on the tenant's part to discover the defect before entering." After citing many cases in support of the doctrine there stated we further say in that case: "The reason of the rule is perfectly apparent. If the lessee knows the condition of the premises, and rents it without requiring the owner to repair it, he takes it as he finds it, and has no right to complain of injuries sustained on account of its condition."

Although the liability of the landlord as to the physical condition of the premises covered by the lease is as above stated, the weight of modern authority supports the rule that, where he leases separate portions of the same building to different tenants, and reserves under his control the halls, stairways, and other portions of the building used in common by all of the tenants as means of access to their respective rooms or apartments, he is under an obligation to use reasonable diligence to keep the portions so retained under his control of the building in a safe condition and free from improper obstructions. 18 A. & E. Encyc. of Law (2d Ed.) pp. 220, 221; Gillvon v. Rellily, 50 N. J. Law, 26, 11 Atl. 481; Looney v. McLean, 129 Mass. 33, 37 Am. Rep. 295; Vanderbeck v. Hendry, 34 N. J. Law, 471, 472; Brunker v. Cummins, 133 Ind. 443, 32 N. E. 732; McGinley v. Alliance Trust Co. (Mo. Sup.) 66 S. W. 153, 56 L. R. A. 334; Dollard v. Roberts, 14 L. R. A. 238, and notes thereto. This obligation of the landlord to the tenants of different parts of the same building in reference to the halls, stairways, doors, etc., of which he has kept possession for their common use, has been held not to result from the implied covenant for quiet enjoyment incident to the leases of the several portions of the building, but to be of the same character as that of any other owner of real estate, who permits or invites others to use it for a particular purpose, to keep it safe for those using it within the scope of the invitation. Gillvon v. Rellily, supra; Looney v. McLean, supra; Vanderbeck v. Hendry, supra; Camp v. Wood, 76 N. Y. 92, 32 Am. Rep. 282. Whatever may be the true origin and character of this obligation of the landlord, it ought not to be extended beyond the uses and purposes to which it is reasonable, from the situation and nature of the building containing the demised apartments, to infer that the halls, stairways, etc., were intended to be subjected in making the leases to the respective tenants.

Now, what were the reasonable uses for which the appellant, as landlord, was under obligation to keep in proper condition the halls, stairways, and outer doors of the building containing the office leased by him to the appellee? It appears from the evidence that it was an office building located in the business portion of the city opposite the courthouse. With the exception of a lunch-room and restaurant on the ground floor, the entire building was rented out as offices, mainly to lawyers. The reasonable use of the outer doors, halls, and stairways of such a building so located, so far at least as related to the lawyers' offices, required that they should be kept open and free from improper obstruction during such hours of the day and evening as their tenants and persons having business with them might reasonably be expected to desire access to the offices. But such use did not require that the doors, halls, etc., should be kept in that condition throughout the entire night, nor on Sunday, which is a dies non when secular avocations are presumed to be suspended. It certainly did not require the outer doors of the building to be kept open on Sunday to such an extent as to admit of the removal by the tenants of large pieces of furniture. The access afforded to the building on Sunday, as shown by the evidence, through the open door and hallway on the ground floor, which connected with the stairway, was, in our opinion, reasonable and adequate for all ordinary occasions. The occurrence of the great fire of February 7, 1904, which destroyed the entire center of the city, was a sudden and unexpected calamity. Even then at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, when the appellee first went to his office, he did not regard the danger of its destruction as serious, for he merely took from it his insurance policies, and made no effort to remove its other contents until an hour and a half later. There is no evidence that the landlord or his agent were on the premises at the time when the appellee alleges that the second-story front door was locked, or were aware that the destruction of the building was so seriously threatened by the fire that any of the tenants desired to remove their furniture. Under these circumstances we are of opinion that the appellant, as owner and landlord of the building, discharged his obligation in reference to access to it on Sunday by having the door and hallway on the ground floor open and unobstructed.

At the close of the case the plaintiff offered one prayer, and the defendant offered six. The plaintiff's prayer which related to the measure of damages in the event of a verdict in his favor was unobjectionable in form, and was properly granted by the court.

The defendant's first prayer asked the court to take the case from the jury for want of legally sufficient evidence that the defendant or any of his agents denied the plaintiff access to his office, or prevented him from removing his goods therefrom on the day of the fire. This prayer was properly rejected, because, although there was no such evidence that the plaintiff was denied access to his office by any one, there was evidence tending to prove that the only door by which the furniture could be removed was securely locked at both visits of the plaintiff to the building. If the jury had believed this evidence, they might have concluded that the defendant did prevent the removal of the furniture, for, the doors being under the control of his agents, he was primarily responsible for their open or closed condition. The court should, therefore, not have taken the case from the jury on that prayer.

There was, however, fatal error in the rejection of the defendant's fourth and fifth prayers. The fourth prayer asserted the proposition that as the fire occurred on Sunday, and was an emergency which could not have been foreseen by ordinary care, the defendant was, as a matter of law, under no obligation to provide at that time means of egress from the building suitable for the removal of furniture therefrom. The fifth prayer in effect instructed the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the plaintiff, at the time he attempted to remove his furniture from the building, could by reasonable efforts have opened the upper front door, he was not entitled to recover. From what we have said concerning the legal obligation as to the condition of the hallways and doors of the building resting upon the defendant as landlord, it is apparent that both of these prayers should have been granted. We find no reversible error in the action of the lower court upon the other three prayers of the defendant.

There is an exception in the record, taken after the trial of the case, at the hearing of a motion for a new trial, to the court's refusal to grant the motion. The main ground of the motion was the fact that the plaintiff's counsel, in his argument before the jury at the trial of the case, had made certain statements which the defendant's counsel claimed were improper, but to which he neither made objection or took any exception at the time they were made, or at any time prior to filing the motion for a new trial. It is well settled that no appeal will lie from an order granting or refusing a new trial, the motion for which is always addressed to the sound discretion of the court. Nor will a litigant be permitted to employ a motion for a new trial as a means of bringing to this court for its review any matter occurring during the trial of the case to which objection was not made at the time of its occurrence.

For the error committed in rejecting the fourth and fifth prayers of the defendant, the judgment must be reversed, and, as the case made out by the record does not show the plaintiff entitled to recover, no new trial will be granted.

Judgment reversed, with costs, without a new trial.

PHILADELPHIA, B. & W. R. CO. v. McGUGAN.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 6, 1905.)
CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

In an action for injuries to a passenger, owing to his having fallen into a drain box while crossing defendant's yards for the purpose of changing cars, the question of defendant's negligence and plaintiff's contributory negligence held for the jury.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kent County;
Edwin H. Brown, Judge.

Action by Barnard J. McGugan against the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and FOWLER, BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, SCHMUCKER, and JONES, JJ.

Marion De K. Smith, for appellant. Wm. W. Beck and Richard D. Hynson, for appellee.

BRISCOE, J. The plaintiff brought a suit in the circuit court for Kent county, and recovered a judgment against the defendant for personal injuries received whilst a passenger on the defendant's railroad from Elkton, Cecil county, to Massey, Kent county, Md. The declaration states that the plaintiff, at the time of the injuries, was a tenant farmer and earning his living by that occupation; that the defendant was a corporation and common carrier of passengers and freight by railroad from Newark, in the state of Delaware, to Massey, in Kent county, Md. through Townsend, in the state of Delaware; that on the 15th day of December, in the year 1904, the plaintiff bought a ticket of the defendant entitling him with his baggage to a safe passage on the railroad from Newark, Del., to Massey, Md.; that on the 17th day of December, 1904, while he was traveling on said ticket, using due care and caution in crossing the property of the defendant, in order to make the necessary changes as required by his ticket, at or near the village of Townsend, was injured and made permanently lame by reason of the defendant negligently suffering its property to be put of repair over which the plaintiff had the right to pass. At the trial the verdict and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

There is but one bill of exceptions set out in the record, and that presents the correctness of the action of the court in granting the plaintiff's prayers and in the rejection of the defendant's first and second prayers. To the action of the court in rejecting the plaintiff's fifth prayer and to the granting of the defendant's third to the eighth prayers, inclusive, no exception appears to have been taken, and it will not be considered by us. The single question in the case is whether the trial court erred in its rulings on the prayers; that is, in granting the plaintiff's prayers and in rejecting the defendant's first and second prayers.

The plaintiff's prayers were properly granted. They are copies of prayers approved by this court in P., W. & B. Railroad Company v. Anderson, 72 Md. 519, 20 Atl. 2, 8 L. R. A. 673, 20 Am. St. Rep. 483. In P., B. & W. R. Co. v. Hand, 101 Md. —, 61 Atl. 285, it is said that similar prayers "were free from objection, and it was unnecessary to discuss them again."

The defendant's first and second prayers are the usual ones submitted on behalf of the defendant in damage suits, and were to the effect that there was no evidence in the case legally sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover, and the evidence was not legally sufficient to show that the injury was caused solely by the negligence of the defendant. These prayers being in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, it becomes necessary for us to briefly consider the material evidence as set out in the record.

The defendant is a corporation, and operates and controls a railroad from Newark, Del., to Massey, in Kent county, Md. The plaintiff was a passenger of the defendant railroad at the time of the alleged injuries, and had purchased a round-trip ticket for passage over the road from Massey to Elkton. It was necessary for him to change cars at Townsend, Del., and take the train at that place to Massey on his return trip home. On the 17th of December, 1904, while traveling from Elkton to Massey, and at Townsend, Del., he left the rear end of the rear car, upon which he was riding, and proceeded to take the train to Massey, his point of destination. While proceeding to his train on the Queen Anne & Kent Railroad, which was about 98 feet from the rear of the car he had left, he fell into an uncovered drain box, or open culvert, filled with snow, on the defendant's premises, and was injured. The place where the accident occurred was only a few feet from the car the plaintiff had left, and, while beyond the passenger platform for passengers to leave the car, it was the most direct route and the nearest one for him to take in crossing to his train. At Townsend, where the accident happened, there are three tracks running north and south. The easterly one is used by the north-bound, the middle by the south-bound trains, and the westerly track is known as the "Queen Anne & Kent Railroad siding." The passenger platform is on the east side of the tracks, and on the west side of the tracks there is a platform used for baggage and mail to be carried over the Queen Anne & Kent Railroad. The train upon which the plaintiff was riding on the day of the accident was a long one, and the car was stopped about 235 feet beyond the platform. He and two other passengers left the rear platform of the last car, where they were seated, and from the west side of the freight platform proceeded to cross to the Queen Anne & Kent Railroad. The plaintiff and the two witnesses, who were alone in the rear car and who left in company with the plaintiff, testified that before the train reached Townsend the conductor came into the car, took up the tickets, and told them the next stop was Townsend. Then he hollered "Townsend!" and the car stopped; that they were not directed to leave the car from the front platform and not the rear one, and no notice was given them that passengers should leave the car from the east side, and not the west side; that the rear door of the car was not fastened, and there was no one on the rear platform to warn them, or tell them on which side to leave the car. There was further evidence on the part of the plaintiff that it was the custom of people leaving the rear car, when the train was a long one, to get off on the right platform, and as a rule passengers were not instructed by the railroad officials from which end of the car it would be the safest to reach the Queen Anne & Kent Railroad, and that the right side was the nearest to the train. On the part of the defendant the evidence tended to show that the plaintiff was directed by the conductor to leave the car by the front platform, and that he was not required to get off on the side away from the passenger station and platform; that the plaintiff consulted his own convenience in leaving the car, and thereby exposed himself to the risk which caused the accident.

There being, then, a manifest conflict in the evidence, the question of negligence and contributory negligence was one of fact and for the jury to determine. This is well settled and needs no citation of authority to establish it. In B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Kane, 69 Md. 11, 13 Atl. 387, 9 Am. St. Rep. 387, it is said, although a railroad company may have provided a platform where the trains regularly stop for the ingress and egress of passengers, it is not per se contributory negligence for a passenger to attempt to enter a train at a place other than the platform provided, in the absence of notice that passengers would be received only at such platform and were prohibited from attempting to enter the cars at any other place. And in McMahon's Case, 39 Md. 449, this court said: "In no case ought the court to take the question of negligence from the jury, unless the conduct of the plaintiff relied on as amounting in law to contributory negligence is established as clear and uncontradicted evidence." The law of the case in our opinion was clearly and fully submitted to the jury in the plaintiff's and defendant's granted prayers. The defendant's first and second prayers, under the facts of the case, were therefore properly rejected. There being no error in the rulings of the court below, the judgment will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

STATE, to Use of MANFUSO et al., v. WESTERN MARYLAND R. CO.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 6, 1905.)

RAILROADS—CROSSING ACCIDENT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

One who, without stopping, looking, and listening, drove upon railroad tracks at a point where his view of the tracks was obstructed, was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

Appeal from Superior Court of Baltimore City; Daniel Grand Wright, Judge.

Action by the state, to the use of Jelsomina Manfuso and others, against the Western Maryland Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

William Colton, for appellants. Leon E. Greenbaum, for appellee.

BURKE, J. John Manfuso was struck and killed by a locomotive of the defendant company on the 18th day of November, 1903, at Mt. Hope Station in Baltimore county. This suit was brought by his widow and infant children to recover damages for his death, which is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the company. Manfuso was in the act of crossing the tracks of the railroad company at Mt. Hope, and was struck by an engine of the company and killed. The tracks at the point where the accident occurred were crossed by a private road, much traveled, leading from the Reisterstown Road into the grounds of Mt. Hope Retreat.

The record contains two bills of exceptions, one to the ruling of the court on a question of evidence, and another to the action of the court in granting the prayers submitted by the counsel of the defendant at the conclusion of the plaintiff's case. In the argument before this court, counsel for the appellant abandoned the exceptions to the testimony, and, consequently, the only question to be determined is: Was the court right in withdrawing the case from the consideration of the jury? This involves an examination of the facts and circumstances under which the injury which caused the death of John Manfuso was received.

Manfuso was a fruit dealer, and on the morning of the accident had borrowed a horse and wagon from Dominick Salo for the purpose of delivering some fruit at Mt. Hope Retreat. Salo accompanied him on the journey, and was with him in the wagon when the accident occurred. In traveling to the institution they went out the Reisterstown Road, and went down the private road or lane above mentioned, crossed the tracks of the railroad, and entered the grounds of the institution. As they approached the crossing, a train passed, and Manfuso told Salo the crossing was a dangerous place. He delivered the fruit, and began the return trip to the city, and while in the act of crossing the tracks at Mt. Hope Station the wagon was struck by an express train of the defendant company—the York Limited—and Manfuso was killed, and Salo injured. The accident occurred between 9 and 10 o'clock in the morning. The day was clear and cold, and the sun was shining. The road over which they were traveling was smooth, and the wagon in which they rode was new and made little noise. It appears from the evidence that after passing the station at Mt. Hope the tracks of the company curve, and at a distance of about 600 feet from the station there is an abrupt curve, which obscures the view of an approaching train, and renders its presence at that curve invisible to one standing at the distance of 10 feet from the west-bound track; and that a fast train would cover the distance from this curve to the crossing in about 10 or 11 seconds. In approaching the crossing in the direction in which the deceased was traveling, there were trees and shrubbery which cut off the view of the tracks to the northwest, and at the entrance to the grounds of Mt. Hope there was a gate house and station house which obscured the view of the tracks as one approached more closely the crossing, and when the gate house was reached only about 25 or 30 feet of the track was visible. Near the railroad crossing there was a danger signal, warning travelers to stop, look, and listen, which notice Manfuso saw and read. The train which struck the deceased was coming from the west.

The witness Salo gives the following account of the accident: "Q. And you were looking for trains coming towards Baltimore? A. Yes, sir. Q. And he was looking for trains coming from Baltimore? A. Yes, sir. Q. And it was agreed between you that you would watch out? A. Yes, sir. Q. How fast were you going? A. Very slow. We ran fast when we first started but when we got near there he said he would go quite easy, so we see if any train was coming, because he said this is a dangerous place. Q. What did you do with the way of keeping on easy, how slow did you go? A. We went right slow, and we passed a little house. Q. That is the gate house? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you came out the gate? A. Yes, sir. Q. Then what? A. We went real slow, almost stopped. Q. Which way were you looking? A. On the left side way. Q. That way [indicating]? A. I could not look all the way though, because the house was against me. Q. But when you got outside the gate, and got near the track, you could see up the track could you? A. Yes, sir; I stuck my head through the wagon to see if any train was coming. Q. Could you see up as far as the curve? A. I could not see all the way through, because I didn't have a chance. Q. How far was your horse from the track here [indicating] when you got sufficiently open view to see up the track? A. We were near the track, and all at once, crack! and I see black smoke coming fast, and I don't know where we went to." On cross-examination Salo testified as they approached the crossing he and Manfuso "were talking about that dangerous place, because he knew it was a dangerous place there, and that is the reason we were talking. He told me to look up, and he was looking down, to pay attention to a dangerous place."

It is thus apparent from the testimony that the crossing was a peculiarly dangerous one, and that Manfuso was acquainted with its surroundings and was aware of its danger. The danger attending the crossing is made more evident by the testimony of Salo to which we have alluded. Notwithstanding the danger which confronted him, and of which he was well aware, Manfuso, without stopping, drove upon the tracks of the railroad, and was killed by a passing train. Was Manfuso guilty, as a matter of law, of contributory negligence in attempting to cross the track of the defendant company under the circumstances we have stated? If so, the court was clearly right in withdrawing the case from the consideration of the jury, and in directing a verdict for the defendant. By the settled law of this state certain well-defined and imperative duties are imposed upon persons before they make the attempt to cross the tracks of a railroad company. They are bound under all circumstances to look and listen for approaching trains, and if the crossing is one of more than ordinary danger and the view of the tracks is obstructed at or near the place of crossing, it is the duty of the traveler to stop, look, and listen before he attempts to cross; and if a person neglects these necessary precautions, and in consequence of such neglect is injured by the collision with a passing train, he will be held to have contributed by his own negligence to the occurrence of the accident, and will not be allowed to recover for any injury he may have sustained.

The circumstances under which a person is bound to stop before attempting to cross have been indicated in a number of cases in this state. In the case of Maryland Central Railroad Company v. Neubeur, 62 Md. 399, this obligation upon the part of the traveler to stop, look, and listen before making the attempt to cross was considered by the court. Referring, in that case, to this obligation, Alvey, C. J., said: "A large number of the decisions go to the extent of holding that it is incumbent upon the traveler, at ordinary street crossings, to stop, look, and listen before attempting to cross the rails; and, if he fails to observe this precaution, he forfeits all right to recover for injuries received. This precaution is not only reasonable and proper to be observed on the part of the traveler on a public road, crossing railroad tracks, for his own safety, but it is equally necessary for the safety of the multitude of the people riding in the railroad train, liable to be killed by collision of the train with obstacles on the track." While referring to the rule with approval, the court, however, declined to follow the authority of cases in many other states, and declare it to be the duty of the traveler in all cases to stop before attempting to cross. In the case of Philadelphia & Baltimore Railroad Company v. Hogeland, 66 Md. 149, 7 Atl. 105, 59 Am. Rep. 159, the question was again presented for consideration, and Alvey, C. J., speaking for the court, said: "The rule is now firmly established in this state, as it is elsewhere, that it is negligence per se for any person to attempt to cross tracks of a railroad company without first looking and listening for approaching trains, and, if the track in both directions is not fully in view in the immediate approach to the point of intersection of the roads, due care would require that the party wishing to cross the railroad track should stop, look, and listen before attempting to cross." And it was said in State, Use of Price, v. C. & P. Railroad Co., 87 Md. 188, 39 Atl. 610, that, "If the traveler's view of the railroad is obstructed so as to prevent him from seeing whether a train is approaching, it is his duty to stop, look, and listen before attempting to cross." And in Watson's Case, 91 Md. 353, 46 Atl. 996, it is said that the obligation to stop "should be applied to all crossings where the view is obstructed, or when, for any reason, it is evident that the traveler can hear better and avoid danger by stopping to listen in a place of safety." In Holden's Case, 93 Md. 417, 49 Atl. 625, where the view of the track was obstructed in one direction only, the defendant's sixth prayer, which had been refused by the trial court, was under consideration. By this prayer the court was asked to instruct the jury that, if they found that the plaintiff's view on his near approach to the track was in any manner obstructed, then it was the duty of the plaintiff before going on the track to stop, look, and listen for the train, and, if he violated this rule by failing to stop, he was guilty of contributory negligence, and could not recover. In delivering the opinion in that case, Fowler, J., speaking in reference to that prayer, said: "The plaintiff's first contention is that the language of the prayer is too broad, but we cannot agree with him. We think it clearly announces the established rule, which we said, in Hogeland's Case, 66 Md. 149, 7 Atl. 105, 59 Am. Rep. 159, 'is one which the courts ought not to relax,' as its enforcement is necessary as well for the safety of those who travel on railroad trains as for those who travel on the common highways." In the case just cited the rule is thus expressed: "If the track in both directions is not fully in view in the immediate approach to the point of intersection of the roads, due care would require that the party wishing to cross the railroad track should stop, look, and listen before attempting to cross."

The prayer we are considering declares that, if the view was in any manner obstructed, it was the duty of the plaintiff to stop, etc. This is equivalent to saying that, if the track was not "fully in view"—that is to say, if there was an obstruction of the view by a hill, a bank, trees, or in any manner—due care requires the travel on the common highway to stop and listen before attempting to cross. The prayer in the opinion of the court announced the correct principle of law applicable to the case, and was in itself free from objection, but its refusal by the court below was not pronounced to be error, because the concession of the plaintiff's first prayer estopped the defendant from complaining of the rejection of its sixth prayer. It may be declared to be the fixed and inflexible rule of law in this state that it is the duty of the traveler to stop, look, and listen before attempting to cross the tracks of a railroad, where the crossing is one of more than ordinary danger, because of obstructions at, or near, the immediate approach to the point of intersection of the roads, by reason of which the track is not fully in view; and, if he attempts to cross in disregard of this duty, and in consequence thereof is injured, he will be held to be guilty in law of contributory negligence. The undisputed evidence in this case shows that the crossing in question was of more than ordinary danger; that the view of the tracks, in the immediate approach to the crossing, on the northwest, from which direction the train which struck and killed Manfuso came, was obstructed by shrubbery, trees, a gate house, and a station house; that, without stopping, he attempted to cross and was struck by a passing train and was killed; and that his failure to stop, look, and listen was the direct and proximate cause of his injury. Therefore he was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

It was the clear duty of the court, under the facts, to have granted the defendant's second prayer, by which the jury was instructed to find their verdict for the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

MULLER et al. v. WITTE.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Jan. 26, 1906.)

1. ASSIGNMENTS—CONSIDERATION—RIGHT TO SUE.

Where a married woman assigned to plaintiff without consideration a claim against her husband for money alleged to have been loaned to him, that the assignee might sue in his own name for the assignor's benefit, the assignee was not the bona fide owner of the cause of action, and was not entitled to sue thereon.

2. EQUITY—PLEADING—RELIEF DEMANDED.

A party seeking equitable relief must specifically demand it, unless the nature of the demand itself indicates that the relief sought is equitable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Equity, §§ 319-321.]

3. ACTIONS—NATURE—LEGAL OR EQUITABLE.

An action merely to recover a debt arising out of an alleged loan made by a wife to her husband, or out of an agreement made between them concerning it, in which money damages alone are prayed, is an action at law, and not a proceeding in equity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 1, Cent. Dig. Action, §§ 125, 133, 143.]

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE—EXISTENCE OF RELATION—SUITS BETWEEN SPOUSES.

Where a wife had not been abandoned by her husband, but voluntarily left him without cause, she was not entitled to sue her husband on an alleged indebtedness for money loaned; such right having been conferred, by Gen. St. 1902, § 4543, only on a married woman abandoned by her husband.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Hartford County; John Coats, Judge.

Action by Louis J. Muller and others against Charles R. Witte to recover money only alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff Muller, in which Henrietta S. Witte was joined as a party plaintiff. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Bernard F. Gaffney, for appellant Witte.
Frank L. Hungerford, for appellee.

TORRANCE, C. J. This action was brought at first by the plaintiff Muller alone upon the common counts. He claimed to be the bona fide owner, by assignment from Henrietta S. Witte, who was in fact the wife of the defendant, of a debt alleged to be due from the defendant to his said wife. Subsequently, upon the motion of said Muller, said Henrietta was made a coplaintiff in the action. The bill of particulars as filed in the case was for money loaned to, and paid out for, the defendant by his said wife. After this the plaintiffs filed an additional count, alleging in substance these facts: That Henrietta was the wife of the defendant, married to him in 1874, but that he had abandoned her before this suit was commenced; that on or before February 2, 1898, she loaned to him $900 under an oral agreement that he would convey to her certain real estate of his in New Britain; that he has refused to make said conveyance; and that she had assigned said claim to Muller without consideration, and under a misapprehension of the law relating to married women abandoned by their husbands. This last allegation, as also the allegation that Henrietta was the wife of the defendant, married to him in 1874, were admitted in the answer, and the other allegations were denied.

The material facts found are these: The defendant and said Henrietta intermarried in 1874, and lived together until some time in February, 1898. In 1892 Henrietta received the sum of $950 as the proceeds of a policy of life insurance paid to her upon the death of her mother. Between November, 1892, and May, 1893, she, at the request of the defendant, "delivered to him a considerable portion of said sum of $950; not as a loan, but to enable the defendant to use the same in the payment of his personal debts and obligations." The defendant used said money for the purposes specified, has never repaid the same, "and claims the right to retain the same as statutory trustee of his wife." The assignment of said Henrietta's claim against her husband to the plaintiff Muller, set up in the complaint, was made without valuable consideration, and "for the sole purpose of enabling said Muller to bring this action in his own name for the benefit of Henrietta S. Witte." In February, 1898, said Henrietta voluntarily, and without lawful cause or excuse, left her husband and her home, and since that time has voluntarily continued to live apart from her husband and to support herself, and her husband has not abandoned her. The only relief claimed was "$1,000 damages."

Upon these facts the court rendered judgment for the defendant, and we think it did not err in so doing. Upon the facts found Muller clearly had no right to maintain this action, for he was not the assignee and equitable and bona fide owner of the cause of action. Birby v. Parsons, 49 Conn. 488, 44 Am. Rep. 246; Olmstead v. Scutt, 55 Conn. 125, 10 Atl. 519; Gaffney v. Tammany, 72 Conn. 701, 46 Atl. 156. It is, we think, equally clear that the other plaintiff, the wife, cannot maintain this action against her husband. She was married to the defendant in 1874, and this is an action at law for the recovery of money not alleged nor shown to be her separate property, and not a proceeding in equity for the recovery or protection of her separate property.

The rule is that "a party seeking equitable relief shall specifically demand it, as such, unless the nature of the demand itself indicates that the relief sought is equitable." Practice Book, p. 43, § 138. Nothing of that kind is indicated in the complaint in this case. It seeks merely the recovery of a legal debt arising out of a loan made by the wife to her husband, or out of an agreement made between them. It asks only for money damages, and it must be regarded as an action at law, and not a proceeding in equity. Baxter v. Camp, 71 Conn. 245, 41 Atl. 803, 42 L. R. A. 514, 71 Am. St. Rep. 189. Arising out of the common-law doctrine of the legal unity of husband and wife is the wide general rule that neither spouse can, during the existence of the marriage relation, sue the other at law, except as authorized by statute.

If the wife of the defendant had been abandoned by him, as alleged, she might, under our law, sue and be sued "as a feme sole" (Gen. St. 1902, § 4543; Moore v. Stevenson, 27 Conn. 14), and this might perhaps be held to include her right to maintain an action at law against her husband (Adams v. Adams, 51 Conn. 135); but the court has found that she had not been abandoned by her husband, and that, we think, is conclusive against her right to maintain this action.

Upon the question whether the defendant is entitled to hold, as statutory trustee, the money delivered to him by his wife, we express no opinion.

There is no error. The other Judges concurred.

CLARKE v. BLACK et al.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Jan. 4, 1906.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — ACTIONS — QUESTIONS OF LAW.

Where the facts concerning a conveyance claimed to be fraudulent as against creditors of the grantor are ascertained and determined by the trial court, the conclusion to be drawn from the facts so found, including the determination of the existence of constructive fraud and of a valuable consideration, is a question of law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 24, Cent. Dig. Fraudulent Conveyances, §§ 923, 928.]

2. SAME—CONSIDERATION FOR CONVEYANCE.

While a good consideration may support a conveyance by a grantor who is not indebted, or whose indebtedness is not unreasonably disproportionate to the value of the property conveyed, yet, where the conveyance leaves the grantor without sufficient property to meet existing debts, it cannot be supported as against creditors unless the consideration is one which the law terms valuable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 24, Cent. Dig. Fraudulent Conveyances, § 193.]

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE—CONTRACTS BETWEEN SPOUSES—VALIDITY AND EFFECT.

A transaction between a husband and wife, by which the wife obtained money from the husband to use in a business conducted by her, with the understanding that she should, from the proceeds of the business, build a house and convey it to the husband as his property, was valid, and created the relation of creditor and debtor between the husband and wife, although the latter gave no note or written obligation for the money received by her, and there was no agreement for the repayment of the money in kind, and no interest was paid or calculated upon the loan.

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—VALIDITY OF TRANSACTION — CONSIDERATION FOR CONVEYANCE.

A wife obtained $3,500 from her husband and used it in her business, with the understanding that she should build a house with the proceeds of the business and convey it to her husband. Under this arrangement she used the money for 10 years, and at the expiration of that time built the house as contemplated, at a cost of $8,000. About four years after the house was built it was conveyed to the husband, in accordance with the previous understanding of the parties; the conveyance depriving the wife of sufficient assets to meet the claims of creditors. There was, however, no actual fraud in the conveyance, as the wife fully expected to successfully defend the only claims brought against her. Held, that the conveyance was based on a valuable and adequate consideration, and was not fraudulent as to creditors of the wife, although both husband and wife knew of the claims asserted against the wife, and that the conveyance might operate as a preference.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hartford County; Edwin B. Gager, Judge.

Action by Sidney E. Clarke, administrator de bonis non of the estate of Lucy H. Black, deceased, against Madison J. Black and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

In 1896, Lucy H. Black (the plaintiff's intestate) became owner of the land described in the complaint and on September 28, 1900, conveyed the land through a third party to her husband, Madison J. Black, the defendant. At the time of this conveyance a suit was pending in the court of common pleas for Hartford county in favor of one Edward E. Rogers and against Mrs. Black, in which suit the land conveyed had been attached. Mrs. Black denied any indebtedness to Rogers, and fully expected to win the pending suit. She had no creditors other than said Rogers and after the conveyance did not have sufficient property, subject to attachment, to meet the debt claimed by Rogers. No action was taken by Rogers in his suit until May 18, 1901, when he filed a bill of particulars and no other action was taken by either party prior to February 22, 1902, when Mrs. Black died, and the attachment in the suit was dissolved. Mrs. Black left substantially no assets and no debts except the Rogers claim. About a year after Mrs. Black's death, Rogers cited in as defendant in his pending suit Mrs. Black's administrator who had been appointed for the sole purpose of defending that action and subsequently recovered judgment against the estate of Mrs. Black for $861.66. The present plaintiff having been appointed administrator de bonis non of Mrs. Black's estate brought this action. The complaint alleges in substance that the conveyance from Mrs. Black to the defendant was fraudulent, because it was made in fraud of the said Rogers, and to avoid the payment of her debt then due to said Rogers as adjudged by the judgment recovered by him against her estate, and because the conveyance was made without any valuable consideration therefor. These allegations were denied by the defendant.

Upon the trial the defendant claimed as the legal conclusion from the facts admitted and found proven, that the conveyance to the defendant was not fraudulent, and that the consideration for the conveyance was a valuable one. The court overruled this claim, and states in the finding all the facts from which the court drew its conclusion that the conveyance was fraudulent. The material facts, in addition to those above mentioned, are as follows: The conveyance was not made for the purpose of escaping or in any way avoiding the Rogers claim, or for the purpose of defeating his attachment, and was made with no intent on the part of the grantor or grantee to defraud said Rogers or any one else. The facts determining the character of the consideration for a conveyance of September 28, 1900, are in substance these: In 1886 Lucy H. Black desired to purchase a boarding house to be managed as her separate and independent business for her sole benefit. She did not have sufficient means to make said purchase and obtained from the defendant the sum of $3,500 to be used in making the purchase. She bought the boarding house, using the $3,500, obtained from the defendant in paying for the same and managed the boarding house as her separate and independent business, the defendant receiving no part of the income therefrom. The defendant and Mrs. Black often talked about the $3,500 and the general purport of their conversation was that Mrs. Black desired to retain the money in her business and make what she could out of it, and that some time she would be able to build a house, and that when she built her house, she would turn it over to the defendant, and retain as her own whatever was not required for the building of the house. At the time the money was paid by the defendant to Mrs. Black no note or other obligation was given to him, nor was he furnished any security for said sum, nor was there any agreement between them with reference to the repayment of said money; Mrs. Black did not pay interest upon said sum, and it did not appear that there was ever any calculation of interest or any conversation with reference to any specific sum that was or might be due to the defendant, or any promise of hers except her statement with reference to building a house and turning it over to the defendant. Ten years later, in 1896, Mrs. Black purchased the land in question, and built a house thereon, and told the defendant it would be his. At different times there was conversation between them about conveying the property to the defendant, but he did not urge her, and the matter was put off without any special reason until September 28, 1900, when the property was conveyed to the defendant as above stated. At the time of the conveyance the attachment of the land by Rogers was known to Mrs. Black and the defendant, and they both supposed and understood that in case Rogers recovered judgment, said judgment would hold said land to respond thereto. Said transfer from Mrs. Black to the defendant was made in good faith, and for the purposes aforesaid. The value of the property transferred was about $6,000.

Joseph P. Tuttle and James J. Quinn, for appellants. John W. Coogan and John J. McKone, for appellee.

HAMERSLEY, J. (after stating the facts). The finding of the trial court conclusively negatives the allegations of the complaint, in so far as they aver that the conveyance to the defendant was in fact made in fraud of Edward E. Rogers with intent to avoid the payment of a debt then due from the grantor to said Rogers and for this reason was fraudulent. As to the remaining allegation of the complaint, namely, that the conveyance to the defendant was made without any valuable consideration therefor, and for this reason was fraudulent, the court finds that at the time of the conveyance the grantor was indebted to Rogers to an amount in excess of the value of her attachable property other than the land conveyed, that the land conveyed was subject to an attachment lien in a suit then pending between Rogers and the grantor for the enforcement of her debt to him, and states the facts which constitute the consideration upon which the conveyance was made by the grantor. These facts being ascertained and determined by the trial court, the conclusion therefrom, including the existence of constructive fraud and of a valuable consideration, is a question of law. Pettibone v. Stevens, 15 Conn. 19, 25, 38 Am. Dec. 57; Winsted Hosiery Co. v. New Britain Knitting Co., 69 Conn. 565, 575, 38 Atl. 310. If the conveyance to the defendant was made without a valuable consideration, the fact that such conveyance left the grantor without sufficient means to meet her existing indebtedness to Rogers might render the conveyance fraudulent, notwithstanding there was in fact no intent to defraud and no intent to avoid that indebtedness. Quinnipiac Brewing Co. v. Fitzgibbons, 71 Conn. 80, 40 Atl. 913. On the other hand, if there was a valuable consideration for the conveyance, the bona fide transfer of the property upon such consideration might be valid, notwithstanding such transfer was calculated to hinder other creditors in the collection of their claims. Meade v. Smith, 16 Conn. 346, 358; Warner Glove Co. v. Jennings, 58 Conn. 74, 82, 19 Atl. 239. A controlling question, therefore, in determining the validity of the conclusion reached by the trial court is this: Was the consideration for the conveyance as set forth in the finding a valuable one? A good or meritorious consideration may be sufficient to support a conveyance by a grantor, who is not indebted or whose indebtedness is not unreasonably disproportioned to the value of the property conveyed (Salmon v. Bennett, 1 Conn. 525, 7 Am. Dec. 237); but where the conveyance leaves the grantor without sufficient property to meet existing debts, it cannot be supported as against those creditors unless the consideration is one which the law terms valuable. In general, a consideration may be valuable which involves the payment of money, satisfaction of some debt, or binding obligation or duty or some substantial benefit which is regarded as property as, for instance, an intended marriage or an understanding that the grantee shall be supported for life by the grantor. 1 Sw. Dig. (280), (281); Graves v. Atwood, 52 Conn. 512, 516, 52 Am. Rep. 610.

The answer to the question in the present case depends upon two transactions, related but in a way distinct. First, the transaction in which Mrs. Black obtained from Mr. Black $3,500 upon the understanding between them as to the obligations thereby assumed by her, and used the money, and invested the proceeds as stated in the finding; second, the subsequent conveyance of the land. As we read the finding, the first transaction is in substance this: In 1886 Mrs. Black obtained from Mr. Black $3,500 upon the understanding that she should use the money in her business until she had made sufficient to build a house, and that, when the house was built, she should turn it over to Mr. Black as his property, and that the proceeds of the business not required for this purpose should belong to Mrs. Black. In accordance with this understanding Mrs. Black used the $3,500 in her business, and at the end of 10 years was able to, and did build, the house, as contemplated by them. In 1896-97 she purchased the land in question, built upon it a house, and told Mr. Black she would convey it to him. We think that upon the completion of this transaction the relation of creditor and debtor existed between Mr. and Mrs. Black, and that Mr. Black was entitled to a conveyance of the house or to damages in case of Mrs. Black's refusal to convey. The fact that Mrs. Black gave no note or written obligation at the time she obtained Mr. Black's money, and that there was no agreement made with reference to the repayment of said money and no interest was paid or calculated thereon is immaterial. The transaction was not a loan of money upon interest. Mr. Black's property rights resulted from the acceptance and use of his money by Mrs. Black upon the understanding between them, her purchase of the land, and building of the house with the proceeds and accretions of that money, and her promise to convey the land to him. The fact that Mr. and Mrs. Black were husband and wife is immaterial, except as explaining a transaction which might otherwise seem an improvident one on the part of Mr. Black. No rights of third parties are involved in the transaction, and it is not affected by the question of creditors of either Mr. or Mrs. Black. In a case such as this, the relation of husband and wife operates rather to emphasize the good faith and honesty of the transaction. Gilligan v. Lord, 51 Conn. 567. No claim is made that Mr. and Mrs. Black could not contract with each other in the manner detailed, and such a claim, if made, could not be maintained. Spitz's Appeal, 56 Conn. 186, 14 Atl. 776, 7 Am. St. Rep. 303; Hausman v. Burnham, 59 Conn. 132, 22 Atl. 1065, 21 Am. St. Rep. 74; Corr's Appeal from Com'rs, 62 Conn. 400, 26 Atl. 478. The plaintiff cites several decisions where it is held, as it was held in Paulk v. Cooke, 39 Conn. 570, that the use by a husband of money which came to his wife, and which, under the law, he is entitled to reduce to possession and use as his own property, does not constitute a valuable consideration for a subsequent transfer to his wife of large amounts of his own property for the purpose of placing it beyond the reach of creditors; it is evident that such decisions have no application to the facts in this case.

It thus appears that in 1897 the relation of debtor and creditor existed between Mr. and Mrs. Black, and that she was then bound to satisfy the claim of Mr. Black. The second transaction, namely, the conveyance to Mr. Black, took place some three years later on September 28, 1900. There is no significance in the delay in making the conveyance as the court finds that the matter was put off without any special reason and that the transfer from Mrs. Black to the defendant was made in good faith, and for the purposes aforesaid; that is, of satisfying her obligation to Mr. Black arising from the transaction above stated. The satisfaction of that obligation was the consideration of the transfer, and such a consideration is, in law, a valuable one. There can be no question of adequacy of consideration. Land worth about $6,000 is a reasonable compensation for the loss of $3,500, and its use and profits for 10 years. Such a transfer, in good faith, upon valuable and adequate consideration might lawfully be made, although the parties knew of the Roger's claim, and that the transfer might operate as a preference, and would be valid as against Rogers, unless opportune proceedings in insolvency were commenced. That the parties supposed and understood that the intervening attachment of Rogers would, in fact, hold the land to the extent of any judgment Rogers might recover, and so to that extent affect the value of the property received by Mr. Black in satisfaction of his claim only serves to illustrate the absolute good faith of the transaction which the court so unequivocally finds. That the transfer of the land in question to Mr. Black was not fraudulent is the necessary legal conclusion from the facts found.

There is error. The judgment of the superior court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instruction to render judgment for the defendants.

PIERCE v. STAUB.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut.
Jan. 4, 1906.)

SALES—RESCISSON OF CONTRACT—REMEDIES OF BUYER—RECOVERY OF PURCHASE MONEY.

Where a contract of sale provided for the payment of the price in installments, and that the seller should have the exclusive possession of the property until full payment was made, and contained no stipulation for a forfeiture on default, and the buyer, although he faithfully tried to perform his obligations under the contract, was unable to complete the stipulated payments, and defaulted, whereupon the seller, after various extensions of time, refused to recognize any rights of the buyer to the property, and disabled himself from performing the contract by transferring the property to other parties, and both parties treated the contract as at an end, there was in effect a mutual rescission of the contract of sale, and the buyer was entitled to recover back the money paid by him under the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hartford County; John M. Thayer, Judge.

* Action by Noble E. Pierce, as ancillary administrator of the estate of James M. Crosby, deceased, against Nicholas Staub. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank L. Hungerford and Frank W. Marsh, for appellant. Marcus H. Holcomb and Noble E. Pierce, for appellee.

TORRANCE, C. J. The plaintiff is the ancillary administrator, in this state, upon the estate of James M. Crosby, who died domiciled in Massachusetts in June, 1900. In May, 1897, the defendant and Crosby entered into a written contract for the sale to Crosby of certain property belonging to the defendant. The property consisted of certain shares of the capital stock of the Falls Village Water Company, of this state, of the charter and franchisees of the New Milford Water Power Company, of this state, and of certain rights in real estate, and in water rights, fully described in said contract. That contract provided in substance as follows: In consideration of certain payments made to him by Crosby, at and before the execution of the contract, and of the promises of Crosby contained in the contract, the defendant agreed to sell and convey to Crosby on or before the 1st of December, 1897, all the property aforesaid, "upon the faithful performance by Crosby" of his part of said contract. The purchase price of the property was $150,000. Of this price Crosby paid $3,000 before the contract was executed and in the contract he agreed to pay $10,000 upon its execution, $10,000 on or before July 1, 1897, and the balance on or before December 1, 1897. Mr. Crosby, not having made all the payments required by said contract, the parties on the 23d of February, 1899, entered into a supplemental contract in which it was agreed, among other things, as follows: (1) That the amount due and unpaid by Crosby under the first contract was $97,217; (2) that said amount should bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from April 1, 1898; (3) that Crosby should pay said sum with interest as aforesaid in one year from February 23, 1899, or sooner in whole or in part at his option; (4) that upon such payment being made in full within such time, the defendant would sell and convey to Crosby all the property agreed to be sold and conveyed in and by both contracts; and (5) that the defendant should have the exclusive use and possession of all said property until it should be so conveyed. It was also agreed that these two contracts should evidence the entire understanding of the parties as to said property with one exception which need not here be noted. Neither of the contracts contained any forfeiture clauses of any kind, nor did they in terms give any power of rescission to either of the parties.

Crosby paid under both contracts the sum of $60,000 and no more. On February 27, 1900, while Crosby was confined to his bed by a serious illness, the defendant called upon him, and informed him that he (the defendant) was then ready to carry out said agreement. Crosby said he was then unable to perform his part of the agreement, and asked for an extension of time. Upon Crosby's promising to pay a certain note of his made to the defendant and then in the hands of a third party, the defendant agreed to extend the time for performance of the contracts for a period of 30 days from February 23, 1900. Crosby never paid that note nor any part of it, nor did he carry out his part of the contract, nor tender performance thereof within the extended time so given him by the defendant. On March 20, 1900, the defendant sent to Crosby a written notice of which the following is a copy: "My Dear Sir: I beg to say that I am ready to perform on my part our agreements of May 8, 1897, and February 23, 1899, by conveying, transferring, and assigning to you all the property therein mentioned, in accordance with the terms of said agreements, and as you know, have been ready and willing to do so at all times since the dates thereof. Inasmuch as the extended time for carrying out said agreements on your part expired nearly a month ago (February 23, 1900), and I cannot compatibly with my own rights and my purposes with regard to said property allow the matter to remain open indefinitely, I hereby request that without further delay you make the payments agreed by you to be made as fixed and determined in said last-named contract, and you may consider this a demand therefor. Please take notice that unless said agreements are performed and said payments made on or before the 31st day of March, 1900, I shall regard and treat said property as divested of all interest which you may now have [if any] therein. If not convenient for you to come here, I will, on notice from you, meet you in New York any day this week or next week, for the purpose of mutually carrying out our engagements in said contracts made." Nothing further was heard by the defendant from Crosby, after giving said notice, and nothing was done by Crosby with reference to said contracts, except that he endeavored, until he became too ill to do business, to dispose of the property and to raise money upon the contracts to pay the balance due thereon. Nothing else save the giving of said notice was ever done by the defendant in the lifetime of Crosby to put him in default under said contracts or to terminate his rights of purchase thereunder. Crosby died in June, 1900. He never made demand upon the defendant for the payment of the whole or any part of the money paid under the contracts, nor did he, after March 31, 1900, make any claim to the defendant that he (Crosby) had any rights in the property described in the contracts; but he did make such claim to his wife and brother a few days before he died. Up to March 31, 1900, the defendant was ever ready and willing to carry out his part of said contracts, but no offer or tender of performance was ever made by Crosby or by any one in his behalf, or, since his death, on behalf of his estate. On the 27th of June, 1900, the widow of Crosby called upon the defendant to ascertain the amount due under the contracts, and whether she could have time in which to pay it. The defendant then informed her that as her husband's time for performance had expired, his heirs had no interest in the property; but said that if the amount due was paid within 30 days then next ensuing, he would, unless the property was sold within that time before the payment was made, convey the property to Mr. Crosby's heirs. He requested her to write him next day as to whether she could raise the money. This she did not do, nor did she or any one else thereafter ever tender performance on behalf of the Crosby estate. After this, but exactly when did not appear, the defendant sold all of said property to a third party. Such sale appears to have been made some time in 1902. In September, 1900, the widow of Crosby was appointed and qualified as administratrix upon his estate, and in February, 1903, the plaintiff was in this state appointed and qualified as ancillary administrator of said estate. Demand upon the defendant, for the repayment of the money paid him by Crosby under the two contracts, was made by the administratrix in January, 1903, and by the plaintiff in February, 1903. The defendant refused to pay. The defendant until he sold said property was in the sole and exclusive use and occupation thereof. The defendant did not in this case, by his pleadings or otherwise make any claim for damages on account of the default of Crosby under said contracts.

Upon these facts the defendant made divers claims of law, which in substance and effect amounted to this: That the plaintiff was not entitled to recover back the money paid by Crosby either in whole or in part; in other words, that upon Crosby's default the defendant became entitled, at his option, to keep the property and the purchase money too. The court overruled this claim, and held that as the defendant had made no claim for damages on account of the default, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount of the money paid by Crosby, with interest from the date of the demand made upon the defendant by the plaintiff. In the case at bar the sale and conveyance to be made by the defendant were undoubtedly conditioned upon the payment of the price in full. If Crosby had paid 99 per cent. of the price in advance, he could not obtain the property without paying or tendering the remaining 1 per cent.; and if he, without legal excuse, failed to make such payment or tender, in the manner prescribed by the contract, he might lose his right to such sale and conveyance; and the defendant's claim is that he would, in such case, also lose the entire purchase money paid in advance, although the contract might contain no clause of forfeiture. The view of the law embodied in this last claim seems to put the vendee who pays a substantial part of the price in advance and then defaults, in a much worse position than the vendee who pays nothing in advance and ultimately refuses to go on with the contract. In the former case the vendor may get very much more than compensation for the loss caused by his breach; while in the latter case he gets only compensation for his actual loss, frequently measured by the difference between the contract price and the value of the property at the time of the breach, which may be merely a nominal amount. Founded upon the doctrine of the entirety of contracts, the general rule undoubtedly is that if a party, without legal excuse, fails to perform the conditions of a contract, he can recover no compensation for benefits conferred upon the other party by a part performance. Keener on Quasi Contracts, p. 215, and cases there cited.

To this general rule two exceptions, real or apparent, are not without authority for their support. One, in the case of contracts for personal services for a given time for a given sum; and the other, in case of contracts to do a specific work, as to build or repair a house, or a machine, and the like. In the former class of cases, it is held by many courts, that even a party who willfully breaks his contract may recover for the value of work done in excess of the damages caused by the breach. Britton v. Turner, 6 N. H. 481, 26 Am. Dec. 713; Pixler v. Nichols, 8 Iowa, 106, 74 Am. Dec. 298; Wheatly v. Miscal, 5 Ind. 142; Fuller v. Rice, 52 Mich. 435, 18 N. W. 204; Chamblee v. Baker, 35 N. C. 98; Parcell v. McComber, 11 Neb. 209, 7 N. W. 529, 38 Am. Rep. 366; Duncan v. Baker, 21 Kan. 107. In the latter class of cases it is held by many court that a party, who in good faith, attempts to perform his contract, and undesignedly deviates from it in some respects, may recover for benefits conferred, less damages caused by the breach. See Pinches v. Swedish Lutheran Church, 55 Conn. 183, 10 Atl. 264, and cases cited therein. Assuming, without deciding, that the principles applied in the above two classes of cases, if sound, are not applicable in the present case, does that case fall within the rule invoked by the defendant? We think not. That rule is based upon the proposition that a party who advances money in part performance of a contract, and then stops short and refuses to go on, while the other remains ready and willing to perform, cannot recover back the money advanced. This proposition is supported by the following cases, and by many others that might be cited: Ketchum v. Evertson, 13 Johns. 359, 7 Am. Dec. 384; Lawrence v. Miller, 86 N. Y. 131; Rounds v. Baxter, 4 Greenl. 454; Plummer v. Buckman, 55 Me. 105; Hill v. Grosser, 59 N. H. 513; Steinbach v. Pettengill, 67 N. J. Law, 36, 50 Atl. 443; Downey v. Riggs, 102 Iowa, 88, 70 N. W. 1091; Hansbrough v. Peck, 5 Wall. 147, 18 L. Ed. 520. The decisions in these cases all proceed upon the assumption that the special contract, though broken by one of the parties, remains open and unrescinded, and the defendant's claim in the present case proceeds upon such an assumption; but we think that in this case the fact thus assumed is not true.

We are of opinion that the parties in this case have, in effect, rescinded, and put an end to the contracts. It clearly appears that Crosby made default. In one sense it was not a wilful default, for to the last he tried to fulfil his contract; nevertheless his failure was without legal excuse, and gave the defendant the right to put an end to the contract if he chose to do so. By his written notice to Crosby the defendant said, in effect, that unless by a day certain the price was paid in full, the defendant would consider all the rights of Crosby and all the obligations of the defendant under the contracts as at an end, and all the rights of Crosby to the money paid or to the land as at an end. From the time of Crosby's default even until now the plaintiff has acted with respect to the property, the money, and the contracts, according to the tenor of his notice to Crosby. He has recognized no rights of Crosby, or of his estate, to the property covered by the contracts, or to the money paid by Crosby under the contracts, or any obligations of his own under the contracts. He has denied the existence of any such rights and obligations, has treated the property as his own, and has disabled himself from performing the contracts, by transferring the property to other parties. In short, since Crosby's default the defendant has treated the contracts as at an end. The position thus assumed by the defendant must be regarded, upon the facts found, as having been acquiesced in by Crosby in his lifetime, and by his representatives since his decease; for after his default he neither paid nor tendered any money in performance of the contracts: and since his decease his representatives have done nothing save to bring this action, and that is based upon the assumption that the contracts are at an end.

Under these circumstances both parties must be regarded as having treated the contracts as at an end, and such action is equivalent in equity to a formal and mutual rescission; and this being so, the defendant cannot be allowed to treat the contracts as dead to the prejudice of Crosby's estate, and yet alive to the advantage of himself. The contracts being thus at an end, the defendant claims, by right of forfeiture, the $60,000 paid by Crosby, although the contracts contained no clause of forfeiture. If this claim is sustained, Crosby pays, and the defendant receives that sum of money for nothing save the promise of the defendant from which he now claims to be freed; and, save this promise, the defendant parted with nothing, not even the possession and use of the property agreed to be conveyed; and it nowhere appears that he lost $1 by reason of his promise or by reason of Crosby's default. In cases like the present, it has been said by high authority that the better remedy of the vendor, and in some instances his only safe remedy, is to institute proceedings in the proper court to foreclose the equity of the purchaser where partial payments or valuable improvements have been made. Hansbrough v. Peck, 72 U. S. 497, 18 L. Ed. 520. Upon Crosby's default, the defendant, instead of bringing him into court to have their respective rights as against each other adjusted and determined, decided for himself that the money advanced was forfeited, and that Crosby had no rights whatever as against the defendant; and he is now in court asking it, in effect, to aid him in enforcing that forfeiture. Equity abhors, and the law does not favor, a forfeiture; and, if there be any difference between the defendant's position as determined by the rules of law and his position as determined by the rules of equity, it must be judged by the latter. Gen. St. 1902, § 532.

In view of the conclusion reached, that the contracts were in effect rescinded, the right of the defendant to retain the money advanced cannot be sustained; and, as he made no claim whatever for damages suffered by the default, the plaintiff, if entitled to recover anything, was entitled to recover all. Money paid upon a contract which is subsequently rescinded is never forfeited unless there is an express or implied contract to that effect (Hickock v. Hoyt, 33 Conn. 553-559); and, upon such rescission, it must be returned to him who has advanced it (Gay v. Adler, 102 U. S. 79, 26 L. Ed. 48; Frink v. Thomas, 20 Or. 265, 25 Pac. 717, 12 L. R. A. 239; Wheeler v. Mather, 56 Ill. 241, 8 Am. Rep. 683; Drew v. Pedlar, 87 Cal. 443, 25 Pac. 749, 22 Am. St. Rep. 257; Merrill v. Merrill, 103 Cal. 287, 35 Pac. 768, 37 Pac. 392; Gilbreth v. Grewell, 13 Ind. 484, 74 Am. Dec. 266; Glock v. Howard & Wilson Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17). Whether the defendant, upon proper pleadings and proof in this case, might have recovered the damages, if any, caused to him by Crosby's default, is a question that does not arise in this case, and therefore need not be considered nor decided.

There is no error.

PLUM v. SMITH et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 19, 1906.)

1. WILLS — LEGACIES — ABATEMENT — LEGACY IN LIEU OF DOWER.

As a general rule a legacy given in lieu of dower cannot abate, if at the time of the making of the will the wife had an inchoate right to any dower out of the testator's estate.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 2105.]

2. SAME—LEGACIES CHARGED ON LAND—NECESSITY OF MORTGAGE.

A will giving testator's wife the interest on a sum of money, so long as she lives and remains unmarried, "to be left secured on my real estate," does not require the legacy to the wife to be secured by a mortgage on testator's real estate, but creates a charge on such real estate without the aid of a mortgage.

3. SAME—ABATEMENT OF LEGACIES.

Testator bequeathed to his wife in lieu of dower the interest on $2,000 so long as she should live and remain unmarried, to be left secured on testator's real estate, and on the decease or marriage of the widow to be equally divided among testator's children. The sum specified was invested in a mortgage which covered all the land of which testator died seised. Default was made in the payment of interest for the last two years prior to the widow's death, and the mortgage was foreclosed, and the property sold for a sum insufficient to pay the principal and interest. Held, that the legacy to the widow would not abate so long as any portion of testator's real estate or of the proceeds thereof remained, and consequently the widow's administrator was entitled to be paid, in preference to the other legatees, the interest which was not paid during the widow's lifetime.

Bill for the distribution of an estate by Joseph S. Plum, executor of Joseph Plum, deceased, against John B. Smith and others. Decree advised.

Oliver I. Blackwell, for complainant. John B. Hoffman, for defendants.

BERGEN, V. C. Joseph Plum died leaving a last will and testament in which the only provision he made for his widow is expressed in the second and third items thereof as follows:

"Second. I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Hannah, the interest on two thousand dollars as long as she lives and remains unmarried and my widow, to be left secured on my real estate, but on her decease or marriage to be equally divided among my children.

"Third. I also give, devise, and bequeath to my beloved wife, Hannah, all my household furniture, except wardrobe," etc.

The executors named, and who qualified, were the widow and Joseph S. Plum, a son, who invested the sum of $2,000 in a mortgage on lands, of which the testator died seised, and the interest on this mortgage was paid to the widow until April 1, 1893, between which date and the date of her death, July 20, 1895, the interest remains unpaid. The mortgage has been foreclosed, the property sold, and the amount realized not sufficient to pay the principal and interest in full, and the question presented is whether the administrator of the widow is entitled to priority in payment to the extent of the unpaid interest. The claim of the administrator is that the widow, having accepted the bequest in her favor in lieu of her dower in land, is entitled to be paid the compensation which it was agreed she should have when she accepted the provision made for her in the will, rather than that conferred upon by her by the law. While this will does not in terms declare that the legacy was intended to be in lieu of dower, it is quite manifest that the provision made by this testator had that object in view, and that the widow did elect to accept the testamentary gift in satisfaction of her claim for dower. It is a general rule that a legacy given in lieu of dower shall not abate, if at the time of the making of the will the wife had an inchoate right to any dower out of the testator's estate; for in that case the widow, if she do not dissent to the bequest, is accepting a compensation for the dower which ought to be paid at the price fixed. It is not a voluntary bounty or favor, but a meritorious consideration. Perrine v. Perrine et al., 6 N. J. Law, 133-138, 10 Am. Dec. 392.

The testator here gives to his wife the interest on $2,000 as long as she lives and remains unmarried, "to be left secured on my real estate," and on the argument it was insisted that these words should be interpreted to mean secured by a mortgage, but it can hardly be doubted that this language will charge the payment of this interest on testator's land without the help of a mortgage. The land upon which this mortgage was an incumbrance was all the real property of which the testator died seised, and consequently constituted all of the real estate charged with the payment of the widow's legacy. If at any time during her life it became necessary to enforce the payment of her legacy, she could have, by proper proceedings, obtained a decree for the sale of so much of the land as might be necessary to raise and pay the share of her legacy which had matured, and such payment would have been at the expense of the corpus of the fund, and if necessity required, might, by repeated sales, have ultimately exhausted the principal. That the land which was charged with the payment of this legacy has been sold by other proceedings, and thereby reduced to money, does not, in my judgment, relieve the fund from the obligation which the testator imposed upon the land.

My conclusion is that the widow was entitled to be paid the interest on $2,000 as long as she lived unmarried; that this bequest in lieu of dower is charged upon the lands of the testator, and that the widow cannot be called upon to abate her legacy so long as any portion of the real estate of the testator, or the proceeds thereof out of which payment can be made, remains. It is the surrender of existing rights which gives the preference to a legatee of this character, and as was declared by Lord Hardwicke (1 Roper on Legacies, 297): "The wife's abandonment of her legal rights would entitle her to payment of the whole of the benefits which were given to her under the will, in preference to the other legatees." The contest here is between the general legatees of the testator and the representative of a widow, who surrendered her dower right for a consideration which the law says she is entitled to have paid without abatement. While this cause originated in foreclosure proceedings, it has been before the chancellor on a motion to strike out part of the pleadings, and in passing upon that question, the parties were allowed to amend the pleadings so as to present the issue now considered.

The result which I have reached is, that the administrator of the widow is entitled to be paid, in preference to the other legatees, the residue of the compensation promised the widow as a consideration for her dower.

MAYOR, ETC., OF JERSEY CITY v. TOWN OF HARRISON et al.
MATTHEWS v. SAME.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
 Nov. 20, 1905.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—CONTRACTS.

A contract between two municipalities for a supply of water for public and private use is within the provisions of the statute of frauds.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — CONTRACTS — WHAT CONSTITUTES — PROPOSAL—ACCEPTANCE.

A resolution of the town council of Harrison directed the president and clerk to execute a contract with Jersey City for a supply of water on certain terms. Jersey City, learning of the resolution, caused to be drawn and executed by its officials and tendered to the town council of Harrison, a paper which was claimed to accord with the terms of the resolution. Held, that no contract was thus created (a) because the paper thus executed and tendered to Harrison did not conform to the terms of the resolution, and (b) because the resolution, never having been communicated by Harrison to Jersey City, did not constitute a proposal which Jersey City might accept and thereby bind Harrison.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 86, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, §§ 675-679.]

Dixon and Gray, JJ., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Supreme Court.

Action by the mayor and aldermen of Jersey City against the town of Harrison and others, and by Martin V. Matthews against the town of Harrison and others. Judgments for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

George L. Record and Robert Carey, for plaintiffs in error. Collins & Corbin and Richard B. Lindabury, for defendants in error.

MAGIE, Ch. Four writs of error have brought to this court for review of four judgments of the Supreme Court. Two of the judgments were entered upon certiorari (one allowed upon the prosecution of the mayor and aldermen of Jersey City, and the other allowed upon the prosecution of Martin V. Matthews) which brought into review in that court a resolution of the town council of the town of Harrison, adopted September 15, 1903, and rescinding a resolution of that body adopted July 7, 1903. The other two judgments were entered upon certiorari (one allowed upon the prosecution of the mayor and aldermen of Jersey City, and the other allowed upon the prosecution of Martin V. Matthews) to review a resolution adopted by the town council of Harrison on September 15, 1903, for a contract between the town of Harrison and the New Jersey Suburban Water Company for a water supply, and the contract executed thereunder. The writs of certiorari in the two cases first named were dismissed by the Supreme Court, and in the other two cases the resolution for a contract and the contract itself were adjudged to be valid and legal, and were affirmed.

All these cases have been argued together, and present but a single question, which is raised by the contention of plaintiffs in error that the resolution of the town council of the town of Harrison, adopted July 7, 1903, and the acts of Jersey City thereon, disclosed by the affidavits, constituted a contract between the town of Harrison and Jersey City, and that in consequence thereof the town of Harrison possessed no power to pass the rescinding resolution of September 15, 1903, and their action in the passage of that resolution should have been adjudged null and void. This also involves the contention that if the resolution of rescission is void, the resolution of the town council, passed at the same meeting, for the execution of a contract with the New Jersey Suburban Water Company, and the contract executed in pursuance thereof, were ultra vires, and should have been avoided and set aside for that reason.

The resolution of July 7, 1903, is in the following words: "Resolved, that the president of the common council and the town clerk of the said town be, and they are hereby, authorized to execute on behalf of the said town, and in common with the municipal authorities of Jersey City, for a new water supply for the said town to be furnished by the said Jersey City on the same terms and conditions and for a similar period of time as are contained in a certain contract made on the 31st day of July, 1885, between the mayor and aldermen of Jersey City and the said town of Harrison, with the following exceptions: First. That the price for the water to be supplied under the contract hereby authorized shall be at the rate of the sum of $84 per million gallons per day for that quantity of water shown to be consumed on the date of contract, and at the rate of $83 per million gallons when such consumption shall have increased to an average of 500,000 gallons daily above that consumption indicated on the day of the date of contract, and at the rate of $78 per million gallons when the consumption shall have indicated a daily average increase of a second additional 500,000 gallons, and at the rate of $75 per million gallons for all water consumed in excess of 3,000,000 gallons daily."

From the return to the writs of certiorari which called for the resolution of July 7, 1903, it appears that it was adopted by a unanimous vote of the members of the town council of Harrison. But there is nothing in the return to show that the town council directed that the resolution should be transmitted to Jersey City, or gave any one authority to present the resolution to Jersey City for its action thereon. It is, however, made to appear by the affidavits that the authorities of Jersey City did, in some way not explained, procure a certified copy of the resolution, and thereupon caused to be prepared and executed, by such of its officials as might bind the city, a paper purporting and claimed to be such a contract as was called for by the resolution. The paper thus executed was afterward presented to the town council of Harrison, and a demand was made on behalf of Jersey City that it should be executed by the officials of the town of Harrison who were named in the resolution. It had not been so executed when the rescinding resolution was adopted. The claim on the part of Jersey City is that when the paper drawn as claimed, in accordance with the terms of the resolution, and executed so as to bind Jersey City, was tendered to the town of Harrison, then, although it was not executed by the officials named in the resolution, or by any one on the part of that town, a contract thereby came into existence, obligatory upon the town, which it could not avoid by repealing or rescinding the resolution giving authority to execute it. Upon its examination of the alleged contract, the Supreme Court reached the conclusion that such a contract between two municipalities for the sale and purchase of water, involving such amounts, was one within the provisions of the statute of frauds, and to be binding must be in writing and signed by the party to be charged or his agent lawfully authorized. With the view thus expressed we are in entire accord, and it has not been made matter of contest in the argument before us.

The insistent is that such a contract in writing is disclosed. The appeal is to the well-settled doctrine, illustrated by a long line of cases, which holds that a written proposition for a contract on specified terms and a written acceptance on those terms constitute a contract in writing within the statute. The contention is that the resolution was a proposition for a contract, and that the paper executed by Jersey City and tendered for execution to the town of Harrison made up a complete contract in writing. The contention we find to be ineffective. The argument ignores two facts. The resolution of the legislative board of the town is not signed by the town, and this resolution contemplated a contract to be made and executed by certain persons expressly authorized to sign for the town. Donnelly v. Currie Hardware Co., 66 N. J. Law, 388, 49 Atl. 428. In the next place the proposition had not been communicated by Harrison to Jersey City. A proposition for a contract, to be competent to be accepted, must be communicated to the party with whom the contract is proposed. It will not be sufficient that the latter acquire knowledge of it, unless the knowledge is acquired with the express or implied intention of the proposing party. An owner of land, contemplating a sale thereof, might direct his stenographer or other agent to draft a contract for sale to a particular person on specified terms. If the owner has not communicated, or intended to communicate, the proposed contract to that person, the latter, having acquired knowledge thereof, could not, by acceptance, bring the owner into a contractual relation of sale. The owner might leave his uncommunicated draft in his agent's hands without liability, and retract his agency and abandon his plan at any time. Until communication, there is no efficacious proposal which could be accepted. Potter v. Hollister, 45 N. J. Eq. 509, 18 Atl. 204; a. c., 46 N. J. Eq. 609, 22 Atl. 56. In like manner, the resolution, never having been communicated to Jersey City by any act of the town of Harrison, did not constitute a proposal, and could not be raised to a binding contract by any acceptance.

As it is found that no contract between the two municipalities came into existence upon the resolution of July 7, 1903, it of course follows that Jersey City had no interest which required the town of Harrison to give any notice of its intent to rescind that resolution. If it should be admitted that the execution by Jersey City of the paper presented by its officials to the town of Harrison, with a demand that the town of Harrison should execute the same, could operate to create an actual contract, obviously it can only be given that effect if the paper so executed and tendered conformed to the terms of the resolution of July 7, 1903. That resolution expressly called for a new water supply. It appears by the affidavits that by the former and expired contract water had been for many years supplied to the town of Harrison from the reservoir and waterworks of Jersey City. The supply thus furnished had become polluted to such a degree that Jersey City had sought for a purer supply, which was being furnished temporarily by other parties, and out of that the supply to Harrison had lately been furnished by Jersey City. As the resolution called for a new supply, it is obvious that its demand could only be met by the tender of a contract for a supply that could be thus characterized. But the paper executed by the Jersey City officials and offered to Harrison simply required Jersey City to furnish water "from the reservoir and waterworks" of the city. It is obvious that, under those terms, the city could have resorted to pumping water from the Passaic river into its reservoir as it had formerly done, and so distributing it to the town of Harrison. In my judgment, the town of Harrison was entitled to a specific contract for water from a new source, and the tender of a contract which did not include the required terms was unavailing. Nothing, therefore, is found to justify us in declaring that the town of Harrison was unable to rescind its resolution of July 7, 1903. The resolution of September 15, 1903, to that effect, was therefore properly upheld by the Supreme Court, and its judgment thereon must be affirmed. It necessarily follows that the town council of Harrison, after the passage of the rescinding resolution, had power to proceed to make a contract for a supply of water from any person or corporation having water to furnish and having power to contract with the town.

The contention that the action of the town in determining to contract for water to be supplied by the New Jersey Suburban Water Company was invalid, because no notice of its intended action was given to Jersey City, and that the city was given no opportunity to be heard thereon, cannot be yielded to. As stated, Jersey City had no rights under the resolution of July 7, 1903. By the contract dated July 31, 1885, Jersey City had supplied water to the town of Harrison for a period of 10 years. After the expiration of that contract, it had never been renewed, nor any new contract made. Water had been supplied by Jersey City, which Harrison had received and paid for at the rates fixed in the expired contract. This course of conduct created no obligation, unless it raised an implied contract to pay for such water as was in fact received. But Harrison was not bound to continue to receive it for any period of time, and might cease to receive it whenever it deemed the public interest required. Moreover, before the resolution to contract with the New Jersey Suburban Water Company, notice had been given by that company to the town of Harrison that the water which it was receiving belonged, not to Jersey City, but to that company. It has been determined, on other cases now decided, that the property in the water was then in the New Jersey Suburban Water Company. Under those circumstances, Jersey City had no interest which required the town of Harrison to give it notice of its intent to contract with the New Jersey Suburban Water Company. The case is not like that considered in Taylor v. Lambertville, 48 N. J. Eq. 107, 10 Atl. 809, and the doctrine therein stated, if capable of being supported, is not applicable here. The resolution of September 15, 1903, for a contract with the New Jersey Suburban Water Company, and the contract made with that company, were within the power of the town. Whether the contract was a judicious one is not a subject of judicial review. No reason is presented which justifies us in declaring that the contract was lacking in validity.

The judgment of the Supreme Court in affirming it will therefore be affirmed.

DIXON and GRAY, JJ., dissent.

NEW JERSEY SUBURBAN WATER CO. v. TOWN OF HARRISON.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey. Nov. 20, 1906.)

WATERS—TRANSMISSION—PROPERTY RIGHTS.

The New Jersey Suburban Water Company with another company, acquired by contract with the East Jersey Water Company the right to water transmitted by the latter company through its mains and pipes from its source of supply, and delivered at a specified place on the line of the pipes. The New Jersey Suburban Water Company contracted to supply therefrom the town of Harrison, and in performing its contract, made use of a line of pipes, laid by Jersey City in the township of Kearney many years before, to transmit the water to the water system of Harrison. Held, that the property which the New Jersey Suburban Water Company acquired in the water was not divested by its delivery to, or transmission through, such pipes.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Supreme Court.

Action by the New Jersey Suburban Water Company against the town of Harrison. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Edward Kenny, Michael T. Barrett, and George L. Record, for plaintiff in error. Collins & Corbin, for defendant in error.

MAGIE, Ch. The judgment of the Supreme Court brought up by this writ of error was entered upon a finding of a justice of the Supreme Court, trying the issue in the cause, without a jury, by consent. The issue was made up by a declaration containing a special count grounded upon a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant municipality for a supply of water at special rates, the common counts and a plea of the general issue. The only exception in the record is to the finding of the trial judge, and on this exception the sole assignment of error is founded. The contract on which the first count is founded has been attacked for invalidity by parties deeming themselves injured thereby. At the time of the trial of this cause, the Supreme Court had affirmed the validity of the contract, but a writ of error had been sued out, and the review thereon was then pending. By the decision of this court, just announced, the judgment of the Supreme Court has been affirmed. Jersey City v. Harrison, 62 Atl. 765. There is, therefore, no legal objection to the finding of the trial judge upon the contract, if there were facts before him upon which he might reach his conclusion. There was evidence from which it might be inferred that a specified quantity of water had been furnished by the water company to the municipality under the contract, during the period covered by the suit, and that the water furnished was the property of the water company. It is suggested that the fact that the water in question was delivered to the company through a pipe which had been laid by the city of Jersey City within the township of Kearney, the ownership of which pipe was claimed by Jersey City, required a finding that the water was not the property of the water company, but was the property of Jersey City. When a case is tried by a judge without a jury, the weight and sufficiency of the evidence to support his finding cannot be reviewed. Weger v. Delran, 61 N. J. Law, 224, 39 Atl. 730; Wannamassa Park v. Clark, 61 N. J. Law, 611, 41 Atl. 153. There was evidence that the water in question had become a commodity, and had been bought and paid for by the water company. The property therein would not be lost by making use of the pipe of another person to transmit the water to its customers. The company may be liable to Jersey City for such use of the pipe in question, or might possibly have been prevented from making use of the pipe, but such use neither divested the company's property in the water, nor vested any property therein in Jersey City.

The judgment on the finding must be affirmed.

DIXON, J. This suit was brought to recover the stipulated price of water upon a sealed contract entered into on September 15, 1903, by the plaintiff and defendant. The contract bound the plaintiff to furnish to the defendant a water supply, delivered at a designated place, and bound the defendant to receive and pay for the water so delivered. The water was thus furnished and received, and, under the circumstances developed in this case, I think the defendant is estopped at law from denying the claim of the plaintiff for the price. The theory that the plaintiff had delivered the water to Jersey City at another place, and Jersey City had conveyed the water to the place designated in the contract and there delivered it to the defendant, and would demand compensation therefore, was one which, in the face of the contract, could not avail the defendant at law, and would be pertinent, if at all, only on an equitable bill of interpleader.

I concur in affirming the judgment.

1. CORPORATIONS — STOCKHOLDERS — RIGHTS — STATUS AS CREDITORS.

Where complainants financed a corporation under an agreement that they should have the practical control of the corporation, although not a majority of the stock, and afterwards became liable as indorsers on notes of the corporation, and the holder of the majority of the stock subsequently repudiated their rights and asserted a right in himself to the assets of the corporation, complainants were entitled to also repudiate the transaction on their side, and to stand as creditors of the corporation to the extent of the amount paid by them on the notes which they indorsed, and to enforce an equitable lien on the proceeds of such notes which stood to the credit of the company in the bank.

2. SAME—RECEIVERS—GROUNDS—INSOLVENCY.

Evidence held to show that a corporation was in a condition of insolvency such as to justify the appointment of a receiver.

Persons who were both creditors of and minority stockholders in a corporation and who Bill by the Wood & Nathan Company and others against the American Machine & Manufacturing Company and another. On motion for a receiver. Granted.

William H. Corbin, for complainants.
Spencer Simpson, for defendants.

PITNEY, V. C. (orally). I will dispose of this motion now for present purposes. This is a bill filed by a company—Wood & Nathan company—which is composed of two gentlemen, Mr. Wood and Mr. Nathan, against the American Machine & Manufacturing Company, asking for a declaration of insolvency and the appointment of a receiver. The application is contested.

The circumstances developed are these: A Mr. Kavenaugh, who also is a defendant, was in 1904 the owner of some patents for making small printing machines for printing handbills and labels and things of that kind, and to be run by power with great rapidity. He had organized the defendant company, the American Machine & Manufacturing Company, and had put these patents all in as of a certain value, and issued to himself I don't know how much stock—$75,000—which was a patent fraud on the act of the Legislature. He had no money with which to run the company. He was not getting on either with manufacturing or selling. As it was a new thing, it required, confessedly, first, to have the machines manufactured, and have them manufactured under the superintendence, as he had no factory of his own—manufactured under the supervision—of a skilled mechanic; then to have them marketed by selling single ones, by personal application to the parties who would be likely to use them, engaged in printing that sort of thing; then they were to be set up on trial for 30 days to see whether the purchaser liked them. In the meantime they were to be watched by a skilled mechanic to see how they worked. Then, in order to promote the sales, further time was to be given to the party to try them for a while in addition to the 30 days—take them not only on trial, but to pay for them by installments. Now this was a slow business. It required capital. And it is not at all similar to manufacturing an article that sells by the dozen or the hundred, that has an established market; but every single machine has to be sold by personal application in each particular case, and then on the terms I have spoken of.

In this situation of affairs Mr. Kavenaugh fell in with the complainants, men engaged in the business of selling that sort of thing, and incidentally, as it appears, and manifestly as a part of this business, advancing of money for the manufacture and attending to the whole thing on a good commission. The result was that they made a contract, or a series of contracts. In the first place complainant advanced $25,000 hard cash for a little less than half the stock, leaving Mr. Kavanaugh still in control of the stock. Now, I believe there is no doubt they advanced that $25,000 cash. Then they met in New York City and elected officers. Mr. Wood was elected president at large. Mr. Nathan, Mr. Kavanaugh, and a Mr.—somebody, a mere dummy—were elected directors, making the requisite number of three. Then Mr. Nathan was elected treasurer and general manager. An office was opened at No. 1 Madison avenue, New York City. Then they agreed to pay Kavanaugh $70 a week. I did not understand for what, but I think he said it was for looking after the machinery and for standing around and making himself generally useful; not for selling. He was not to do any selling, but he was—I have no doubt, if he had an interest in the thing—to look up purchasers; but the real selling was to be done by the complainants. And he was to have his expenses. They commenced business. They employed a firm in New-ark, Richards & Co., to manufacture these machines, and they employed an expert, Mr. Morrison, who had invented part of the machine, to see that it was built rightly. And that was very proper, because, while Mr. Richards might be a first-rate machinist, these machines were of a delicate character and very rapid runners, as I understand. So that, when assembled, they must be adjusted with the greatest nicety, and so they had to have a man there to attend to it. So that the payment to Mr. Richards of the contract price, $400 or $500, whatever it was, was not the whole consideration, by a considerable. Then they commenced to sell, and they sold on the terms above stated one after the other, and in almost every instance there was fault found. This machine did not work in this way and that one did not work in that way. In fact, it was a delicate machine, a rapid-running machine, and I have no doubt that Mr. Nathan (I think it was) told the exact truth when he said that they had to be run by a practical man, a man who was himself something of a machinist. They were liable to get out of order. Complainant had trouble in collecting from the persons to whom they sold the payments as they came due. They found fault; and Mr. Morrison had to run after them and keep the machines going. I state this to show the character of the business. They are not salable at all, in the sense that ordinary merchandise is, at the very best.

Well, the business went on, and the $25,000 is gone. As I understand, Mr. Kavanaugh got about $9,000, something like that, for his $70 a week and expenses, and the concern was out of money. The corporation had given two notes, both payable on the same day and at the same time on their New York bank, for $3,700 each to Messrs. Richards & Co. for work done, as I understand, on goods taken away—because naturally Messrs. Richards, though there was nothing proven about it, would hold their lien on the machines before they were taken away—and the complainants were obliged to indorse those notes because Messrs. Richards would not take them without. Wood and Nathan, the complainants, indorsed those two notes. They were given on September 2, 1905, and they were for $3,712.80, including interest, each, and they came due in New York on the 2d day of January at the complainants' bank. Now there they were liable for $7,400. Then the corporation needed more ready money, and on the 16th of November the complainants indorsed the note of the company for $10,000 at four months, payable at their own bank, and got it discounted at their bank, and Mr. Paul Nathan himself individually indorsed it, as well as Mr. Kavanaugh; and that was put to the credit of the corporation at the bank.

In the meantime some disputes arose between them, and Mr. Kavanaugh was asked to transfer to complainants the half of certain patents which by his contract he had agreed that he would transfer to the company, or that the company held at the date of the contract, and the complainants found that the company did not own them, and they further found they were chargeable with interference by a company that did own a patent of that kind, something about the delivery of the printed sheet after it had passed through and been printed. And that that is so is pretty clear—not only not denied by Mr. Kavanaugh, but Mr. Morrison swears that he went to Boston and prepared changes in the machinery for delivery to attach to the machines—the one they had sold there—to prevent an interference with this very patent. That is what I understood him. At any rate, they had a dispute because Mr. Kavanaugh did not deliver this particular patent which he had made a sworn statement belonged to the company. And by and by Mr. Kavanaugh blurts out "You are not officers, anyhow." Now it was a part of the contract that those gentlemen, the complainants, should have control. Perfectly plain. They were not disposed to put their money into that concern and take the responsibility of running it and selling the machinery, unless they had control, and although Mr. Kavanaugh retained a majority of the stock, yet at the election of the directors these two gentlemen were put in substantial control of the company, handled its money, and so protected themselves against a variety of disasters which are liable to overcome one of those companies.

Now, I say that in the month of December last disputes arose, and some hard feeling arose between Kavanaugh and the complainants. The result was that Mr. Kave-naugh told them, declared verbally that they had not any rights, they were not officers, that the election in New York was void, and that he was the master of the whole concern. And that was, according to the evidence of Mr. Wood, after this $10,000 note was signed and indorsed. Well, there is their position. They were indorsers for $10,000 on paper of this company in their bank for cash lent, and they were indorsers on $7,400 more of paper that had been given to the Richards Company, the manufacturers. That makes $17,400 of liabilities, and they are coolly told by this Mr. Kavanaugh, who is, as far as appears, practically impecunious, that he is the master of the corporation, and they have no standing. Now, the letter to that effect was written by Kavanaugh December 30th, but before that date Mr. Wood swears—and I do not recollect, but think that Mr. Nathan swore to the same thing—Kavanaugh had spoken of it personally. Now, let us see what that letter is, dated December 30, 1905, which I think the evidence warrants me in holding to be an echo, a reiteration in writing, of what he had previously stated orally. Now, the company had been writing letters, I think, and all that sort of thing, dated at the office. Yes, they had their shingle out, and all that, at No. 1 Madison avenue, New York City; but here is a letter which says: "Principal Office, 825 Federal Street, Camden, New Jersey." That shows that the office of the company had been changed from No. 1 Madison avenue, New York City. But it also says: "New York, December 30, 1905. H. A. Wise Wood and Paul Nathan, 1 Madison Ave., New York—Sirs: As president of the American Machine and Manufacturing Company"—now, mind you, Mr. Wood was the president of the company—"I hereby notify you that the meeting of the stockholders which you pretended to hold in New York City November 20, 1904, was illegal and not in accordance with the laws of New Jersey, as all stockholders' meetings must be held in the state of New Jersey, and that your pretended appointment as president, treasurer, and general manager"—there is an admission that they had been appointed president, treasurer, and general manager—"is null and void; and therefore as president of such company I give you notice that I demand possession of all property, contracts, papers, and effects of said company, and hereby warn you not to interfere in the management or business of said company, either as president, treasurer, or general manager, or otherwise. And I further give notice that we shall hold you amenable to the law by any acts done by you to the affairs of the company and its capital. Joseph T. Kavanaugh, president."

Now, I repeat, I shall consider that as a simple reiteration of what he had said to them verbally before that. Now, with that kind of talk—no matter that that election in New York City was good as to strangers and would bind that company in giving all these notes in the bank, and giving the notes to the manufacturers; grant that they could not repudiate these notes—yet as between these people who were parties to the transaction a different question arises, and that was a very disagreeable and inequitable threat to make to complainants. And the question was, what were they to do then? Why, one of the statements of complainants' counsel—I do not know that it was supported by proof—was that before this letter was written they had gone to the company office and demanded to see books, etc., and they would not show them to them. That was the statement made here yesterday when a motion was made. I think it is in the petition on file here. I think that states that on a particular day, some time before December 30—

Mr. Simpson: "We went to inspect the books."

"The Court: Yes. That shows what the situation was. They were being threatened by holders of a majority of the stock with entire repudiation of their rights. Now, what was their situation? Why, I say they were on the paper of the corporation for $17,500. Of the proceeds of that note which had been discounted, put to their credit, there still remained in the treasury of the company to their credit in the bank $7,500. Now, clearly, complainants had a lien on that money in equity, in my judgment. Under that threat it did not lie in the mouth of Mr. Kavanaugh to say: "I have got the advantage of you. You have, with my knowledge and consent, indorsed the paper of that corporation for $10,000, and have put the proceeds in the treasury, and you cannot draw it out because you are not treasurer, and you cannot help yourself. We have got $10,000 out of you. We stuck you as an indorser for $10,000, and we have got you stuck as indorser for $7,500 on the company paper; and according to my view I have a right to draw that money. I have a right to take that $7,500 out of the bank and put it in my pocket and leave you to pay the other $10,000 and $7,500 that you are indorsers on to the bank and the manufacturers of Newark." Now, a gentleman that would take that ground was not too good. If he could do it, to get that $7,500 out of the bank and put it in his own pocket and leave the complainants to pay the whole $17,400. Now, in my judgment, they were perfectly justified in equity, while the money was under their control, in taking it and satisfying the debts of the company as far as they could. And it makes not a particle of difference how they did it; for if they had held that $7,500 and applied it to the payment of those two notes that matured January 2, 1906, they would still have been liable on the $10,000, and so it is only a question of time.

Counsel says: "Why, that $10,000 is not due until March 16th," and by their own act their debt is not due. But it is a debt in presenti solvendum in futuro. And there are other debts. There are debts that are past due to the manufacturing company, and I think there are other debts sworn to by the complainants. They are small, to be sure. But in my judgment the complainants had a right to change that transaction, and go right back to November 16th, and put the affairs right back to their original position, and repudiate the whole thing. If Mr. Kavanaugh proposed to repudiate their rights, they had a right to repudiate, on their side, what they had done. Therefore, in my judgment, they are entitled to stand here as creditors for the $7,400 which they had paid on the Richards note, and for $2,500 on the $10,000 which they were obliged to pay out of their own pocket in order to take up the note. That makes $10,000. Now, I forget how much the other little debts amounted to—$1,000 or $2,000 I believe. If the only debt was that $1,000 or $2,000, probably this court would not grant the motion. But, on the other side, what are the assets? Not a dollar in money, or not a dollar that is available. I cannot treat these two or three dozen machines here as available, for the reasons I have already stated. But, in addition to that, they are acknowledging the defects of those machines by inventing improvements to put on them, and they are held now from sale for the purpose of adding $100 or $200 or $300 to each one by some new attachment in order to make them more salable and more desirable, more liable to be kept and used after they are put up for trial. The trouble with them is that people who take them for trial are not satisfied with them and do not keep them. I am satisfied the evidence on that subject of Mr. Nathan is reliable—borne out somewhat by proofs. The result is that they are not available assets. They may become available by somebody coming in, who is willing to put in $10,000 or $15,000. They may be made security for that. But in order to accomplish that you must get somebody that has faith in them. It is an individual transaction, and I do not see that Kavanaugh has turned his hand over one particle to try and raise the money since the break with the complainants.

I therefore adjudge—though I will not sign my name to anything at present—that this company is in a condition of insolvency, which justifies the appointment of a receiver. Now, right there, it is not necessary that it should be absolutely insolvent in order to throw it into insolvency. It is sufficient if it cannot go on. Now in its present condition I am satisfied it cannot, and that these complainants have a proper standing in court. I have spoken of them as creditors, but they are also stockholders. They have a right to intervene as such, and their standing as stockholders under the circumstances of this case is much higher than it is as creditors. I will not enlarge on that, because I think the other is sufficient; but their standing as stockholders is much higher than that of creditors. They are entitled to the greatest consideration as stockholders, because they put all there is of value in the enterprise. They put in $25,000 in cash, besides the $10,000 that they have also advanced as creditors. In effect that makes $35,000. They say the present is a situation which ought not to go on any further. The two positions support each other. I will, though, postpone the appointment of a receiver, continuing the injunction for one week, or rather until next Tuesday, and if in the meantime Mr. Kavanaugh has shown that he is taking sensible—not flighty, but real sensible—means of raising this money, indemnifying these gentlemen, and will get somebody to give them a bond—I do not suppose they want the money, and I would not make them; I would not countenance them in demanding the money if a good bond was offered, or something of that kind—why, I will consider whether I will give them any more time, but I will not make any promise beyond next Tuesday. In the meantime the injunction stands. I say this: I will not go beyond next Tuesday. The proposition is not stated in the presence of Mr. Corbin, who has left the court, and I do not wish to do anything to affect the case without having the benefit of his argument.

Whatever settlement takes place will be done by approval of the court. The court will let up the injunction far enough to allow you to carry it through.

LLOYD v. TURNER et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 12, 1906.)

1. HOMESTEAD — RIGHTS OF WIDOW — LIABILITY FOR RENT.

Under the statute giving to a widow the right to enjoy "the homestead" during her life, where dower was never admeasured to a widow, she during her life was entitled either to occupy or rent it at her election, without any obligation on her part to pay rent.

2. TENANCY IN COMMON—OCCUPATION—RENTS—LIABILITY TO ACCOUNT.

Where the use of a dwelling house by a tenant in common did not amount to a denial of the rights of her tenants in common, and she did nothing to prevent them from equally enjoying the property, she was not bound to pay rent for the part occupied by her, in the absence of an express agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Tenancy in Common, §§ 76, 78.]

3. SAME—RENTS AND PROFITS—ACCOUNTING.

Where one tenant in common collected the rents from a portion of the property which was rented by her, she was bound to account to her co-tenants for the amount so received, less reasonable expenditures for repairs, restorations, taxes, interest on mortgages, if any, insurances, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Tenancy in Common, §§ 76, 79, 95-98.]

Suit between Elizabeth Lloyd against Helen Turner and others for partition. Decree for complainant.

Howard Carrow, for complainant. J. S. Westcott, for defendant.

GREY, V. C. (orally). The bill in this case is filed for the partition of a house and lot at Fourth and Berkley streets, Camden, N. J. The property was derived from one Edward Augustus, who, at the time of his death, was seized of it in fee. He left a widow and four children him surviving, to whom, at the time of his death intestate, the fee simple of the property descended, subject to the dower right of the widow, Mrs. Edward Augustus. At the time of the death of Mr. Augustus, it is undisputed that the property consisted of a dwelling, part of which was used separately as a store and rented out by Mr. Augustus; and of a small shop in the rear of the lot, the lower story of which he rented out, and the upper story of which he used for his own convenience and business. Mrs. Edward Augustus survived her husband, and with the family then occupied the dwelling house as their home. The law is that the homestead property of the intestate husband, in which the husband and wife resided at the time of the husband's death, may be thereafter occupied by the widow without any obligation on her part to pay rent. It has been further held in exposition of the status of the widow in the privilege of her quarantine, that the statute which gives her the right to enjoy "the homestead," gives her the right either to rent it to others, or to occupy it for her own use as she may choose. I think, therefore, that, as her dower estate was never admeasured to her, there should be no accounting for any portion of the home property at Fourth and Berkley streets for any occupation or renting of that property by Mrs. Augustus, the widow of the ancestor, during her life, which lasted up to January, 1900. It is quite plain that what her daughter, Mrs. Lloyd, did during that period was really done in behalf of Mrs. Edward Augustus, the widow of the decedent owner, for which, having received the authority and approval of Mrs. Edward Augustus, widow, enjoying her quarantine in the property, Mrs. Lloyd cannot be called upon to answer to anybody else.

This is not the only ground upon which the cross-bill rests, for the cross-bill complainant insists that Mrs. Lloyd, the complainant in the original bill, should, since the time of the death of the widow, account for the use and occupation of the dwelling house during the period that she has occupied it for her own use. It is not shown that Mrs. Lloyd has, in occupying the dwelling house, done anything which was in the nature of a denial of the rights of her co-tenants in common, or that she did anything that amounted to an exclusion of the other tenants from enjoying the property with her, according to their several rights, nor has there been any sufficient showing that she obligated herself, by express agreement, to pay rent for the portion of the property which she occupied. There has been some mention made here that she did agree to pay rent to the other tenants for her occupation of the premises. She says she did not. The testimony that she did is not sufficient to justify any decree that Mrs. Lloyd shall pay rent for the dwelling portion which she occupied. A claim is made that Mrs. Lloyd did not object, or that she was at least willing to make the payment of $15 a month for rent. Testimony on this point was given by Mr. Turner. The alleged leasing was wholly by parol, and was in its essential incidents, quite uncertain. Mr. Turner, in narrating the conversation, did not say that Mrs. Lloyd agreed that she would rent the property, and would pay $15 as rent, but only that she agreed that $15 per month was not an unreasonable rent. The alleged agreement did not specify the term for which Mrs. Lloyd was to occupy the premises, nor as stated does it show that there was, in fact, any demise thereof. The testimony does not satisfy me that there was any agreement which either at law or in equity charged Mrs. Lloyd with an obligation to pay rent, since her mother's death in January, 1900, for that portion of the premises which she occupied as a dwelling house, by herself and her family.

It is quite evident to me that the use made of the other portions of the premises stands on an entirely different basis. Mrs. Lloyd ought to account for those rents and profits which she collected after her mother's death in January, 1900, for the occupation by various lessees of the store part of the dwelling house, and also for the rents and profits which she received and collected for the use of the shop in the rear of the lot. The rentals thus collected by Mrs. Lloyd should constitute the left side of the account, showing what should be charged against her. On the other hand, she is entitled to be credited for any expenditures by her made for repairs and restorations, or for the payment of taxes, interest on any mortgages, if any there were, insurances, and such other lawful expenditures as she may have made in the care of any of the property. These should make up the right side of the account, and constitute the credits to which she is entitled. It is quite possible that, as I have settled the basis upon which Mrs. Lloyd must account, the parties may come to an agreement on that branch of the case. If they can, it would be a happy thing. If the clients will let counsel alone, it is probable that they will arrange this accounting without further contest or expense.

I will hold the matter for a week. If the parties are unable to agree, I will refer it to a master to state an account in accordance with the conclusions above expressed.

ISLAND HEIGHTS ASS'N v. ISLAND HEIGHTS WATER POWER, GAS & SEWER CO.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 12, 1906.)

1. COVENANTS — USE OF REAL PROPERTY — PERSONS ENTITLED TO PROTECTION.

An owner divided a tract into lots, and conveyed the same by deeds binding the purchasers not to use the premises for any purpose except as a residence or summer resort, without the consent of the owner or his successors. Held, that the purchasers took the lots under the protection of the restriction, so long as the owner and his successors saw fit to hold it in force.

2. INJUNCTION—LACHES.

A party beneficially interested in the enforcement of a restrictive covenant in a deed conveying land for specified purposes only must come into court promptly in order to obtain equitable relief.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Injunction, § 199.]

3. SAME.

A bill by a land company, dividing its land into lots and conveying the same by deeds binding the purchasers not to use the same for any purpose save as a residence or summer resort without its or its successors' consent, alleged that it had conveyed more than 95 per cent. of the tract; that a purchaser erected waterworks on its lots and supplied water to the inhabitants of the tract; that the secretary of the land company protested against the location of the waterworks, and suggested other locations equally desirable. The bill did not show that any lot owners whose property could possibly be affected injuriously made any objection to the continuance of the works, nor did it show that the land company held any lots injuriously affected thereby. The land company waited for more than three years, while the purchaser was expending large sums of money and establishing a valuable public improvement. Held, that it was barred by laches from maintaining the bill praying for a mandatory injunction, and should be left to its remedy at law.

Suit by the Island Heights Association against the Island Heights Water Power, Gas & Sewer Company. Demurrer to bill sustained.

E. B. Leaming, for complainant. H. H. Van Voorhees and Norman Grey, for defendant.

STEVENSON, V. C. The demurrer will be sustained.

1. The covenant which the complainant invokes to sustain its bill provides that the grantee, his heirs and assigns, should not "at any time hereafter without the written consent" of the complainant, the grantor, "and their successors," use or occupy the land conveyed, or suffer or permit the same to be occupied, "as a boarding house, store, or for any mercantile or mechanical trade or purpose whatsoever, or for any other purpose except as a residence or summer resort." The case differs in what seems to be a very important respect from the class to which De Gray v. Monmouth Beach Co. (1892) 50 N. J. Eq. 829, 24 Atl. 888, belongs.

Whether the large number of different purchasers, who have acquired portions of the tract, which the complainant laid out, by deeds containing this covenant, acquire a right to have the covenant enforced for their benefit to the same extent that such right would exist if the restrictive covenant were not by its terms made subject to discharge by the written consent of the covenantee, is a question which has not been raised in this case, and need not be considered. There are no grantees before the court except the defendant. The original covenantee is the sole complainant, and although the bill endeavors to show that the complainant is moving in part, at least, at the instance of "various of the property owners on said tract," the interest of these other property owners in the enforcement of the covenant—the injury, if there be any, to these other property owners caused by the alleged violation of the covenant by the defendant—is not disclosed. Inasmuch as we are dealing in this case with the right of the complainant on its own behalf to enforce this covenant, perhaps the peculiar feature of the covenant above mentioned, which may distinguish the case from those which have been cited on the argument, may be disregarded. All the purchasers of lots on this tract took their property, not, as in the other reported cases, under the protection of an apparently perpetual covenant restricting the use of each lot for the benefit of all, but protected in that way only so long as the grantor and its successors should see fit to hold the restriction in force. It has not been insisted, however, on behalf of the defendant, that the reserved power of the complainant at any time to discharge lot owners from this restrictive covenant makes the covenant purely a personal one, and therefore, without any consideration of that question, I shall apply to the decision of this case the principles which have been laid down in the reported cases, where the restrictive covenant has been absolute and not expressly made inapplicable whenever the covenantee sees fit to give a written consent to the doing of what without that consent would be a breach of the covenant. Whether the covenantee in a case like this holds the covenant in trust for all the lot owners, and must exercise his power to give written consents in good faith, impartially, and with the greatest good to the greatest number of lot owners constantly in view, is another question, which has not been and need not be considered. It may be noted that in another part of this covenant restrictions are imposed perpetual in form and not subject to discharge by the written consent of the covenantee.

2. The bill charges that the defendant erected its works "with a preconceived determination * * * to violate said covenant and in defiance" of the complainant's rights, and with the further determination "to erect the same at the risk of subsequently being compelled to comply with the terms of said covenants." Notwithstanding this allegation, an argument of considerable force has been submitted on behalf of the defendants to sustain the proposition that the actual conduct of the defendant alleged in the bill is not violative of the terms of the covenant. No doubt the defendant, having established its works on its property with full knowledge of this covenant, must be deemed to have intended the natural consequences of its acts. If what the defendant has knowingly and intentionally done constitutes a violation of the covenant, it follows that the defendant must be held to have determined and intended so to violate the covenant according to the allegations of the bill. I do not mean, however, to construe the covenant in its relation to the conduct of the defendant complained of in the bill, and therein alleged to be violative of such covenant, further than to point out that there appears to be some room for argument in defense of the charge that the covenant in fact has been violated. In such cases, where there is room for doubt, I think far greater effect may be given to the complainant's laches than in cases where it is perfectly clear that the defendant, with or without the aid of counsel, could not in good faith have supposed that his proposed operations were not within the prohibition of the covenant which he or his grantor had made in relation to his land.

3. The defendant erected its waterworks "in the winter of 1901 or spring of 1902" on lots which had originally been purchased by deeds containing the restrictive covenant, and proceeded to engage in the business of supplying the inhabitants of the Island Heights summer resort with water. The inference from the allegations of the bill is that the defendant, for over three years prior to the commencement of this suit, maintained its plant upon the lots in question, and carried on the business continuously of supplying this summer resort with water through pipes in the streets leading from their standpipe to the houses of the inhabitants of the place. The bill denies that the complainant has ever given its written consent to the erection of these waterworks, and denies that it has waived the covenant or in any way acquiesced in or assented to the maintenance of said works. The only allegation in the bill, however, which in any way explains the delay of the complainant in bringing this suit while it stood by and permitted the defendant to construct its plant and prosecute its business of supplying water to this community of summer residents, is as follows: "When it was proposed to erect the storage tank, water tower, or standpipe in lots 31 and 32, block 25, William T. McKaig, then secretary of the Island Heights Association, learning of said contemplated action by Charles Beck (promoter of said company, then being and still remaining its president and chief stockholder), did remonstrate with the said Charles Beck, and protested against said location upon the lots aforesaid as obnoxious to the surrounding community and detrimental to the value of properties in that vicinity, and suggested other locations equally desirable for the purpose and free from the objections thereto." It does not appear with distinctness that the protest of Mr. McKaig was made in his official capacity on behalf of the Island Heights Association, or that such protest was based upon the assertion of any right on behalf of the association under this covenant. The gist of the protest seems to be that the establishment of the waterworks upon the lots selected for them would be injurious to property and property owners in the immediate vicinity, and the suggestion which accompanied the protest might perhaps be deemed to carry the implication that the waterworks would be permitted upon other lots of the association, notwithstanding the restrictive covenant. If, however, upon general demurrer a construction is to be placed upon the bill more advantageous to the complainant, it still remains true that it does not appear that Mr. McKaig had any authority from the corporation of which the bill alleges he was secretary to make this protest on its behalf, or that the corporation ever ratified or learned of this protest until immediately before the commencement of this suit. The secretary of this water company certainly had no power ex officio to make such a protest. For all that appears the president of the corporation may have taken an entirely different view of the operations in which the defendant proposed to engage. It is true the defendant had full notice of this restriction, but it also knew that the entire force of it at any time might be removed by the consent of the land company. The land company was thus absolute master of the situation and deliberately elected to do nothing, to wait for more than three years while the defendant was necessarily expending large sums of money and apparently establishing a valuable public improvement.

In determining the effect of the complainant's laches, the beneficial effect of the covenant should be borne in mind. It has been held in cases of this kind, but where the covenant was on its face apparently intended to be perpetual, that the grantor holds the covenant, not only for his own benefit, but also as trustee for all the purchasers of lots and their grantees. Peck v. Matthews, L. R. 8 Eq. 518 (1867); Trout v. Lucas, 54 N. J. Eq. 361, 368, 35 Atl. 153 (1896). After all, or even a portion, of the lots, have passed from the original owner, the projector of the scheme, he (the covenantor) may have no interest whatever in the enforcement of the covenant, and its whole binding operation practically may be among the grantees of the covenant and their successors in title. If the covenant in this case is held by the complainant in trust, such trust, as we have seen, is coupled with a discretionary power to discharge grantees from the operation thereof. The bill alleges that in a few cases lots had been wholly released from this covenant, where "for the benefit of the public" the complainant deemed such release expedient. The bill does not show that any lot owners whose property can possibly be affected injuriously by the maintenance of the defendant's waterworks make any objection to their continuance. The action of the lot owners who have petitioned the complainant to compel the defendant to remove its waterworks, the location of whose lots in relation to the waterworks is not set forth, may have been dictated by an arbitrary or malicious desire to injure the defendant. For all that appears the property of these objecting parties may be so remote from the waterworks that they are in no way affected by them. On the other hand, it appears distinctly that certain of the lot owners occupying their property as residences are receiving water from the defendant's works. The relief which the complainant prays for necessarily involves the cutting off of this public water supply, and it is fair to presume from all the allegations of the bill that such a result would be a very great injury to many of these lot owners, in whose interest to a large extent this covenant was inserted in the original conveyances, and in whose interest, also, provision was made practically for a release from the covenant where "the benefit of the public" called for such release. If this covenant is held in trust by the original covenantee, it would be quite unsafe to permit him to enforce it against the defendant in this case by a mandatory injunction. However, I am not dealing with any question of nonjoinder of necessary parties, but merely pointing out that the complainant in this case must, I think, be limited strictly to the enforcement of its own rights which it holds on its own behalf. Whether, in case this covenant must be deemed to be held by the complainant not only for its own benefit but also in trust for the lot owners, these lot owners, or any of them, after this long delay, can enforce the covenant against the defendant by a mandatory injunction, or in case the waterworks are a great benefit to them and not injurious to any of them, they can practically compel the complainant to consent to their continuance, are questions suggested in this case which need not be considered. Confining the scope of this inquiry to the grievance which the complainant sets forth on its own behalf, it is important to note that the bill alleges that "a large percentage of lots comprising" the tract laid out by the complainant has been conveyed by the complainant to various parties, and that at present "more than 95 per cent. of the said tract of land is held by persons under deeds of conveyance made by the complainant containing the covenant." It does not appear that the complainant, who remains the owner of less than one-twentieth of the tract, now holds a single lot which is injuriously affected by the maintenance and operation of the defendant's works. The complainant may not be able to recover at law more than nominal damages.

The complainant, by its long delay, has indicated that it has no personal interest in the enforcement of the covenant. There is nothing to show that there are any other lot owners whose property is injuriously affected by the waterworks, or, assuming that there are such lot owners, that any one of them desires specifically to enforce the covenant or is now in a position to procure from a court of equity a decree for such specific performance. But, however this may be—assuming that this covenant is enforceable in equity at the instance of the lot owners other than the covenantee—the grievance of such lot owners cannot be redressed upon this bill. They are not before the court. The rule in cases of this kind is that the complainant, the party beneficially interested in the enforcement of the restrictive covenant, must come promptly into court if he is to have the aid of an injunction. Trout v. Lucas, supra. The complainant cannot repose upon any notice which he may give or the defendant otherwise may have received of the existence of the restriction. Ocean City Association v. Hadley, 62 N. J. Eq. 322, 338, 50 Atl. 78 (1901); Roper v. Williams, Turn. & R. 18 (1822).

Under the circumstances of this case, with no complaining party before the court who is shown to have a beneficial interest in enforcing this covenant against the defendant, and in view of the peculiar nature and function of the covenant itself, the laches of this complainant, the original covenantee, is a bar to the drastic remedy prayed for in its bill. The complainant should be left to prosecute its remedy at law. Whether, apart from the objection of laches, the bill presents a case for an injunction, is a question which need not be determined.

FORRESTER et al. v. ISLAND HEIGHTS ASS'N et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 12, 1906.)

1. EASEMENTS—THREATENED INJURY—PROOF—SUFFICIENCY.

To prove that a corporation purchasing land threatened to use it for hotel purposes in violation of easements granted by the vendor to third persons, it was shown that one of the original stockholders of the corporation drafted a resolution for submission to the borough council indicating a purpose on the part of the corporation to use the premises for hotel purposes. It was not shown that his act was the act of the corporation, nor that it proposed to proceed to use the land for hotel purposes until all private interests had been adjusted. Held insufficient to show a threatened violation of the easements of the third persons.

2. SAME—PROTECTION—AID OF EQUITY.

An owner of an easement cannot ask the aid of equity to protect the easement against the acts of the owner of the fee until the latter threatens to interfere therewith.

3. SAME — DISTURBANCE — CONVEYANCE OF FEE.

A transfer of the fee in land is not an interference with an easement therein, and the owner of the easement cannot require the owner of the fee to continue to hold it.

Suit by James Forrester and others against the Island Heights Association and others. Demurrer to bill sustained.

Norman Grey, for complainants. E. B. Leaming, for defendants.

STEVENSON, V. C. I shall advise an order sustaining the demurrer.

1. Conceding all claims on behalf of the complainants which have any basis whatever, the defendant the Island Heights Association, after the dedication of the "camp ground," retained the fee of all the land so dedicated. The property so retained by this land company appears to have been valuable. At any rate it is not alleged in the bill that the defendant's title, even when subjected to all possible public and private easements and restrictions set up or suggested in the bill, had not a substantial money value. These restrictions all appear to have been and to be now susceptible of extinguishment. A speculative purchaser might pay even a large price for 20 acres of land on the seashore, embracing a lofty bluff and a grove, even though subject to all the public and private rights set forth in the bill.

2. The Island Heights Association in July, 1893, conveyed a part of the "camp ground"—apparently a small part—to one Angeline D. Brinley, who in 1896 conveyed the same parcel to the defendant James Bryant. In March, 1901, the association conveyed the remainder of the "camp ground" to one Ralph B. Gowdey for the sum of $5,000, and took back a mortgage to secure that sum. In November, 1903, Gowdey, together with one Louis F. Bodine, to whom Gowdey had conveyed an undivided half of the land which he had purchased, conveyed the property to a corporation named the Island Heights Hotel & Improvement Company, one of the numerous objects of which was to acquire, own, improve, and sell real estate. The bill insists that all the conveyances by which the legal title to the "camp ground" passed from the Island Heights Association to the Island Heights Hotel & Improvement Company and James Bryant should be declared void, and prays that the land may be conveyed back to the association, and that the mortgage for $5,000 may be surrendered and canceled, and that the defendants may be perpetually enjoined from making any further transfers. The only parties brought in as defendants are the two corporations and James Bryant. It is not necessary, however, to notice the questions which have been raised, or the questions which might have been raised, as to the misjoinder or the nonjoinder of parties.

3. The fatal defect in the case presented by the bill consists in the failure to allege that the defendant the Island Heights Hotel & Improvement Company or the defendant James Bryant has threatened to put the land to any use which will be violative of any of the alleged public or private easements or other rights in which the complainants or any of them are interested. The sole suggestion of any such purpose is found in the draft of resolution submitted to the borough council in August, 1904, by the said Louis F. Bodine, who appears in October, 1903, to have been one of the incorporators and original stockholders of the Island Heights Hotel & Improvement Company when that corporation was created. This act of Bodine is not alleged to have been the act of the corporation, and, if it was, it is not alleged that the corporation is proposing to proceed with the use of the "camp ground" for hotel purposes until all private interests have been adjusted and harmonized. If the present owners of the "camp ground" desire to free it from all public or private claims arising from the dedication and other transactions set forth in the bill, it is manifest that they must begin at some point with some party, public or private, who claims to hold an adverse interest. In regard to the small portion held by the defendant Bryant, for all that appears the title to this small part of the "camp ground" had been reposing in Bryant or his grantor for 12 years without any effort being made on the part of either of them to use the land in violation of the restrictive covenant.

4. The interests, and especially the private interests, existing in a "camp ground" laid out, mapped, and dedicated in the manner set forth in the complainant's bill, have been the subject of judicial investigation in this state in several recent cases. Lennig v. Ocean City Association, 41 N. J. Eq. 606, 7 Atl. 491, 56 Am. Rep. 16 (1886); Bridgewater v. Ocean City R. R. Co., 62 N. J. Eq. 276, 49 Atl. 801 (1901). It is altogether unnecessary to define the nature and extent of the interest which the complainants have in the "camp ground" described in their bill. My present conclusion merely is that, whatever rights may be held adversely to the defendants as owners of the fee, the complainants must wait until the defendants threaten to interfere with those rights before they can ask the aid of this court. A mere transfer of the fee is not an invasion of any of these rights. In the case of Lennig v. Ocean City Association, supra, which is cited on behalf of the complainants to sustain their bill, the land company which laid out the "camp ground" formed a scheme for dividing it up into lots and leasing the lots for the erection of permanent cottages. The court found, not that the land company was merely transferring its fee, but that it was promoting a scheme for the occupation of the land by permanent structures in direct violation of the rights of the prior grantees. The complainants have no right to compel the original dedicator to continue to hold the fee. No authority is cited to sustain the contradictory of this proposition, which seems to be a fundamental premise of the bill of complaint. There is certainly strong ground for claiming that, admitting the widest possible definition of the public and private rights set up by the complainants, the owners of the fee in this land nevertheless can occupy it or use it for many purposes with substantial pecuniary advantage to themselves, without in the slightest degree affecting these outstanding public or private rights. But, however this may be, the fee at all times presumably is of some value because of the possibility that it may be discharged from some or all of these outstanding rights.

It may also be observed that there is nothing in the bill to raise the implication that the conveyance of the fee should be restrained in order to prevent the creation of new rights vested in bona fide purchasers. The maps upon which the "camp ground" is laid out have been recorded, and all the facts connected with the dedication of the "camp ground" and the creation of all public and private rights therein appear to be matters of public notoriety and largely matters of record. The bill does not allege that there is any danger that rights may be created in bona fide purchasers unless the transfer of the fee shall be restrained, nor are there any facts alleged from which such a result could be inferred.

HOWE v. CITY OF ORANGE.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 12, 1906.)

WATERS AND WATER COURSES—MUNICIPAL SUPPLY—DUTY TO FURNISH—WATER RENTS—PAYMENT.

P. L. 1876, p. 371, § 10 (Gen. St. p. 649), provides that in case of nonpayment of water rents the water shall be shut off from the building, place, or premises, and shall not again be supplied to said building, etc., unless such arrears, with interest thereon, shall be fully paid, and Act 1885, § 1 (P. L. 1885, p. 66; Gen. St. p. 655), declares that any city wherein waterworks are owned by the city shall have full power, in case of neglect or refusal of any person to promptly pay for the use or rents of water furnished, to shut off the supply, and that the city shall not be compelled again to supply the building until the arrears, with interest and penalty, shall be fully paid. Held that, where a city had a claim for water rents in arrear against complainant's grantor of the property in question at the time she purchased, she was not entitled to compel the city to furnish her with water until such arrearages were paid.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Waters and Water Courses, § 295.]

Bill by Annie H. B. Howe against the city of Orange. On demurrer to bill. Sustained.

William Read Howe, for complainant.
William A. Lord, for defendant.

GARRISON, V. C. This is a bill filed by Annie H. B. Howe, charging that she is the owner of a house in the city of Orange; that the city of Orange owns and maintains a system of public water supply for the benefit of the inhabitants; that on Saturday, May 6, 1905, the complainant was notified by the clerk of the water department of the city of Orange that water would not be supplied to the premises until a bill of $201.39 for water previously supplied thereto had been paid; that subsequently the water was turned on, but she was again notified that the supply would be discontinued and the water shut off unless the said arrears were paid. She charges that irreparable damage will come to her if the water is shut off from her premises. To this bill a demurrer is interposed by the defendant.

The sole question, as I view it, is whether the city, under the legislation in existence in this state, has the authority to shut off the water from these premises, and whether a court of equity should restrain it from so doing. Under section 10 of the act of 1876 (P. L. 1876, p. 371; Gen. St. p. 649) it is provided that, "in case prompt payment of any water rent or rents shall not be made when the same become due, the water shall be shut off from such building, place or premises, and shall not be again supplied to said building, place or premises until such arrears with interest thereon shall be fully paid. * * *" By section 1 of the act of 1885 (P. L. 1885, p. 66; Gen. St. p. 655) it is provided that "In any city of this state wherein waterworks are owned by the city and controlled by the city authorities, the municipal department of the city government having charge of such waterworks * * * shall have full power and authority, in case of the neglect or refusal of any person or corporation to promptly pay for the use or rents of water heretofore or hereafter furnished by such city or any municipal department thereof, in or upon any building, place or premises, to shut off the supply of water from such building, place or premises * * * and in case the supply of water shall be shut off from any building, place or premises for nonpayment of water rent or water rents, the said city or such municipal department aforesaid, shall not be compelled again to supply said building, place or premises * * * until said arrears, with interest and penalties, if required, shall be fully paid and satisfied. * * *"

Counsel for the complainant does not in any way attack the constitutionality of the legislative provisions relating to this subject. The act of 1876, above referred to (Gen. St. p. 649, § 10), makes the water rents a lien upon the premises until the same shall be paid and satisfied. The bill in this case does not in any way dispute the claim, which it sets out, of the city for the arrears of rent. The gravamen of the bill is that because the water, for which these water rents are in arrears, was furnished to the building while it belonged to a previous owner, the city has not the right to shut off the water from the premises because of the nonpayment of the arrears. I am unable to perceive any reason why this should be held to be the law. If the legislation be constitutional, and it is not suggested that it is not so, it undoubtedly vests in the municipal authorities the right to shut off the water from premises when the water rents for water furnished to such premises are in arrears. Under the pleadings in this suit there are arrears against these premises for water previously furnished. There would seem to be no reason why the city should not be permitted to pursue the statutory procedure with respect thereto. It cannot be said that irreparable injury will ensue to the complainant if the city is permitted to shut off the water, because, by paying the water rents in arrears, the water will be furnished. If this complainant wants the water, and is compelled to pay the back rents to obtain it, and should not in law have been compelled so to do, the cases hold that she may recover back from the city the amounts of money thus wrongfully extorted from her. Westlake v. St. Louis, 77 Mo. 47, 46 Am. Rep. 4; St. Louis Brewing Ass'n v. St. Louis, 140 Mo. 419, 87 S. W. 525, 41 S. W. 911; Panton v. Duluth G. & W. Co., 50 Minn. 175, 52 N. W. 527, 86 Am. St. Rep. 635; Penna. Iron Co. v. Lancaster, 17 Lanc. Law Rev. 161, affirmed 15 Pa. Super. Ct. 556.

The only case cited by counsel for the complainant is Hudson Savings Institution v. Carr-Curran Paper Mills Co., 58 N. J. Eq. 59, 43 Atl. 418 (Pitney, V. C.; 1899). In that case the Vice Chancellor held that the lien of the city, under the act of 1876, for water rents, was not prior to the lien of a mortgage previously given. I do not find in that case any decision militating against the right of the city to shut off the water from the premises where arrears for water previously furnished are existing. In other jurisdictions similar legislation to that in this state upon this subject has received consideration, and the courts have held that the city or the water company has the power to shut off the water, and will not be restrained with respect thereto.

It is held that the premises to which the water is furnished are liable, that indulgence with respect to the time of shutting the water off will not be held to operate against the right to do so, and that the fact that the title has changed hands since the furnishing of the water is immaterial. Girard L. Ins. Co. v. Philadelphia, 88 Pa. 893; Appeal of Brumm (Pa.) 12 Atl. 855; Atlanta v. Burton, 90 Ga. 488, 16 S. E. 214.

I will advise a decree sustaining the demurrer in this cause, with costs.

GARVEY v. HARBISON-WALKER RE- FRACTORIES CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. DEDICATION — STREETS — SALE ACCORDING TO PLAT.

Where an owner of lots sells them according to a plan which shows them to be on a street, it is a dedication of the street to a public use, and implies a covenant to the purchaser that such street shall be forever open.

2. SAME.

Where lots are sold by the owner according to a certain plan showing streets, the fact that the plan does not appear on the maps of the municipality is immaterial as between the parties to the sale.

3. HIGHWAYS — OBSTRUCTION — REMOVAL.

An owner of lots sold the same according to a certain plan. A corporation purchasing some of the lots encroached with its building on one of the streets shown in the plan, and its successor, another corporation, purchased all the lots on the plan, except lots owned by one person. Held, that the latter could, by bill in equity, compel the corporation to remove the encroachments from the street.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 25, Cent. Dig. Highways, §§ 430, 432.]

4. ESTOPPEL — SILENCE.

Where a purchaser of lots according to a plan has not acquiesced in the placing of an obstruction on the street by the purchaser of other lots, his mere silence will not prevent him from demanding the removal of the obstruction.

5. HIGHWAYS — OBSTRUCTION — RELIEF IN EQUITY.

Where a purchaser of a lot according to a plan obstructs a street shown on the plan, another purchaser can maintain a bill in equity to remove such obstruction; the remedy at law being inadequate.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Cambria County.

Action by Bernard Garvey against the Harbison-Walker Refractories Company. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Roberts S. Murphy, Thomas E. Murphy, and James E. McCloskey, for appellant. William Williams and Harry Doerr, for appellee.

MESTREZAT, J. It is settled by numerous decisions of this court that a sale of lots according to a plan which shows them to be on a street implies a grant or covenant to the purchaser that the street shall be forever open to the use of the public, and operates as a dedication of it to public use. Transue v. Sell, 105 Pa. 604; Quicksall v. Philadelphia, 177 Pa. 301, 35 Atl. 609. The proprietor cannot revoke the dedication, and the purchaser of a lot abutting on one of the streets, as well as all other persons owning lots in the general plan, may assert the public character of the street and the right of the public to use it. In re Opening of Pearl Street, 111 Pa. 565, 5 Atl. 430. "Where one owns property by a title sufficient to give him entire dominion over it," says

Thompson, C. J., in Davis v. Sabita, 68 Pa. 90, "he can grant it all, or reserve portions of it, as he pleases. So may he dedicate it to uses not contrary to law, either public or private, and it is only by lawful process, or the assent of those for whose use the dedication was made, that any change can be made. It is not for one citizen to disregard the lawful exercise of rights by another." The fact that the plan of lots does not appear on the maps of the municipality is immaterial as between parties claiming under the original owner and affected with knowledge of his plan. Transue v. Sell, 105 Pa. 604.

Both parties to this litigation claim under Mrs. Tibbott, the common grantor. She was the owner in fee of a tract of land in Lower Yoder township, now situate in the city of Johnstown, Cambria county, and laid out into building lots. In 1893 she began to sell the lots, and in the conveyances they were described as adjoining and bounded by the streets and alleys designated on the plan. One of the streets named on this plan is Tibbott street. The lots on the south side of this street extended to an alley running parallel with the street, and were sold to persons who improved them by the erection of buildings with reference to the street and alley. Three of the lots, at the intersection of Tibbott and River streets, are now owned by the plaintiff, and were conveyed by Mrs. Tibbott and her husband to the plaintiff's predecessor in title in 1893 and 1894. Tenement houses and a stable were erected on these lots. In 1894 the Basic Brick Company, the defendant's grantor, purchased some lots in the Tibbott plan, and erected thereon a plant for the manufacture of brick. In extending the plant Tibbott street and the two alleys mentioned in the plaintiff's bill were encroached upon and obstructed. Subsequently the company acquired title to all the other lots in the plan, except those owned by the plaintiff, and on July 1, 1902, conveyed by deed its entire plant to the defendant company. This deed calls for Tibbott street. The trial judge found, on sufficient evidence, that "neither party has acquired any title to Tibbott street or the lots in question, except that acquired in the conveyance of lots by deeds calling for streets or alleys upon a plot or plan."

It is apparent from a statement of the undisputed facts that the defendant company and its predecessor in title had no authority, against the objection of an owner of another lot in the plan, to place obstructions on Tibbott street or any other street or alley designated on the plan of lots of which its real estate formed a part. By its deed the Basic Brick Company took the lots conveyed to it, subject to an easement by the public in the streets and alleys on which the land abutted. It held its lots subject to the same easement and with the same rights on the streets and alleys designated in the plan as the owners of the other lots had. It is claimed, however, as a defense to this proceeding that equity has no jurisdiction, and that the plaintiff has no right to the relief he seeks, because of the acquiescence of himself and of his predecessor in title in the encroachments complained of, that the relief sought would be disproportionate to the alleged injury, that the damage to the defendant company by granting the relief asked would be irreparable, and that the buildings and encroachments were built on the streets and alleys with the belief that no public or private right was invaded. We do not regard either of these positions as tenable. That equity has jurisdiction to give the plaintiff relief for the injury he has sustained we have no doubt. His right to have the streets and alleys kept clear of obstructions must be conceded under all our decisions. It is conferred by the grant contained in his deed, the validity of which is not questioned. Mrs. Tibbott was the owner of the land at the time it was subdivided into lots and is, as we have seen, the common grantor of both parties to this litigation. Hence the defendant company is not in a position to deny the existence of the ways designated in the plan of lots laid out by her and sold with reference to the plan. Hacke's Appeal, 101 Pa. 245; Ferguson's Appeal, 117 Pa. 426, 11 Atl. 885; Manbeck v. Jones, 180 Pa. 171, 42 Atl. 536. In Hacke's Appeal, Mr. Justice Trunkley, speaking for the court, says (page 249): "It has long been settled that nuisances to rights of way are one of the classes of cases in which the equitable remedy by injunction may be sought. This was established in England and accepted as a rule in this country. No case has been cited where it was denied or doubted in this state. Its existence has been recognized. * * * This right of way is founded upon contract; the grant being shown by the respective deeds under which Brown and Hacke hold their lots. The owner has a right to its enjoyment in the mode and form stipulated for in the deed. The mere fact that the appellants prevent such enjoyment is a sufficient ground for interference of the court by injunction."

Nor will the alleged acquiescence or laches of the plaintiff and his predecessors in title avail the defendant company in this proceeding, and estop the plaintiff from asserting his right to have the obstructions removed from the street and alleys designated on the Tibbott plan of lots. The plaintiff contends that neither he nor those through whom he claims title consented to or acquiesced in placing the obstructions on the street and alleys, and the court found, in support of this contention, that from 1897 until the plaintiff became the purchaser of the property he was the agent of the owners, and as such protested from time to time against the encroachments. But, aside from any objections which may have been made against the obstructions being placed upon the highways, the silence of the owners of the lots would not, under the facts of the case, prevent them now from demanding the removal of the obstructions. The defendant admits that its title papers call for Tibbott street and the alleys, and refer to the plan, and the learned trial judge found as a fact, on sufficient evidence, that the defendant's grantor, the Basic Brick Company, "knew that it was encroaching upon and obstructing this street and the alleyways, though it continued to encroach upon and obstruct Tibbott street by building a brickkiln thereon in 1890, and a machine shop in 1900." The Basic Brick Company therefore knew of the streets and alleys and of their location when it placed the obstructions upon them, and hence had knowledge that its act was unlawful and to the prejudice of the other owners of lots in the Tibbott plan. The deeds in its chain of title gave it notice of the streets and of their location, and there was nothing to justify the belief that in obstructing the streets and alleys it was not invading a public or private right. The silence of the plaintiff or of his predecessors in title, therefore, under the record facts in this case, will not work an estoppel. Hill v. Epley, 31 Pa. 331; Ormsby v. Ihmsen, 34 Pa. 462; Woods v. Wilson, 37 Pa. 379. "If the truth be known to both parties, or if they have equal means of knowledge," says Strong, J., in Hill v. Epley, "there can be no estoppel." And in Ormsby v. Ihmsen, the same justice, delivering the opinion, says: "If the truth was known to both parties, there can be no estoppel, for it is essential to such an estoppel that the party who asserts it has been misled, and he cannot be misled by a statement, the falsity of which he knows." In Woods v. Wilson it is said that silence will not postpone a title when a party who is himself aware of the title seeks to postpone it on the ground of silence, and that, when both parties are aware of their respective rights, it (the doctrine of estoppel) has no place in law or equity.

It has been distinctly ruled that in cases of this character the question of irreparable damages does not enter, and that the law does not afford an adequate remedy. Hacke's Appeal, 101 Pa. 245. In that case it is said (page 249): "It is not necessary that the owner should prove damage to entitle him to his property. * * * The court will not, unless under very exceptional circumstances, take into consideration the comparative injury to the parties from granting or withholding the injunction. The obstruction of a way by the owner of the land differs widely from the maintaining of a mill or factory which is in itself lawful, but by its noise, fumes, or odors becomes a private nuisance to a person in the vicinity. Here the question of irreparable damage enters. * * * But not where a man buys land subject to an easement, or grants an easement. He cannot appropriate such property against the owner's will, and say, 'I will compensate him in damages.' * * * The law does not offer an adequate remedy. He is entitled to a remedy that will restore him to enjoyment, and is not confined to actions at law for damages resulting from obstructions."

We find no substantial error in this record, and the decree of the court below is affirmed.

In re McCausland's Estate. Appeal of STUART.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. MARRIAGE—COMMON-LAW MARRIAGE.

Where a father and mother of a child lived together in Colorado as husband and wife after the birth, holding themselves out to the world as such, the contract of marriage was valid, not only in Colorado, but also in Pennsylvania, and legitimized the child.

Appeal from Orphans' Court, Westmoreland County.

In the matter of the estate of Anna McCausland. From a decree of distribution, Jane B. Stuart appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

V. E. Williams, A. M. Sloan, and W. F. Wegley, for appellant. W. S. Byers and J. A. C. Ruffner, for appellee.

BROWN, J. This is an appeal from the decree of distribution in the estate of Anna McCausland, deceased. By the seventh clause of her will she devised to her daughter, Jane B. Stuart, the appellant, and to her son, Jacob W. McCausland, the rents, issues, and profits issuing from her real estate in Greensburg, and provided that "if either one survive the other then during the lifetime of the one surviving one half to him or her and the other half to the child or children of the one deceased." Jacob W. McCausland, the son, died on January 18, 1903, and one-half of the fund in the hands of the accountant is now claimed by the Safe Deposit and Trust Company of Greensburg, Pa., guardian of Jacob Welty McCausland, found by the court below to have been the legitimate son of Jacob W. McCausland, the son of the testatrix. The legitimacy of the ward of the appellee is the single question before us.

The court below, having found the boy to be the legitimate son and only child of Jacob W. McCausland, deceased, awarded his guardian one-half of the fund brought before it for distribution. We are not asked by any of the assignments to say that error was committed in receiving the testimony of witnesses, upon which the court's findings were based, but it is urged that from this testimony there ought to have been a finding that the ward of the appellee was not the legitimate child of the son of the testatrix, and therefore not entitled to a portion of her estate under the seventh clause of her will. Elizabeth McCausland, the mother of Jacob Welty McCausland, found by the court below to have been the lawful wife of Jacob W. McCausland, the son of testatrix, was the daughter of John and Sarah M. Evans, and prior to March 26, 1882, had lived with her mother at Hannibal, Mo. On that day, when she was about 25 years of age, she was married to one John E. Rodgers, and lived with him until some time in the year 1884. The findings of the court below are that during this period Rodgers frequently told her she was not his wife, as they had not been legally married, because the man who performed the ceremony was not an alderman or justice of the peace; that on August 3, 1885, she saw him at the Union Depot, in the city of Denver, for the last time, since which date he has never been heard of by any one connected with or interested in this case; that she then went to Hannibal, Mo., on a visit to her mother, and, returning in about a month, took up her residence, in September, 1885, with Jacob W. McCausland, the deceased son of the testatrix; that she and he lived together continuously until his death, January 18, 1903; that she gave birth to a son, the ward of the appellee, on March 4, 1887; that this child was called Jacob Welty McCausland, and was recognized by Jacob W. McCausland, deceased, as his son; that about six weeks after the birth of the child she and the said Jacob W. McCausland agreed with each other to become husband and wife and to live together in that relation until parted by death; that they did continue to live together as husband and wife, she performing all the duties of a wife to him and of a mother to the boy; that Jacob W. McCausland introduced her as his wife; that telegrams, by his direction, were addressed to her as Mrs. Jacob McCausland; that he had himself registered as a married man in the city of Denver, Colo., and they were known and recognized in the community where they lived as husband and wife; that the boy was always recognized by him as his son, and at his death, by his will, he named and acknowledged Elizabeth McCausland as his wife and Jacob Welty McCausland as his son, and gave all of his property to them as such.

It is conceded, first, that by the laws of Colorado the common-law marriage prevails there just as it does in this state; second, that there is a presumption there, as well as here, of the death of a person who has been absent and unheard of for seven years; and, third, that the subsequent marriage of the parents of children legitimatizes those born prior to the marriage. The seventh section of chapter 28 of the General Statutes of 1883 of the state of Colorado provides that "illegitimate children shall inherit the same as those born in wedlock, if the parents subsequently intermarry, and such children be recognized after such intermarriage by the father to be his." Our act of May 14, 1837 (P. L. 507), is of similar import. It is: "In any and every case where the father and mother of an illegitimate child or children shall enter into the bonds of lawful wedlock and cohabit, such child or children shall thereby become legitimated, and enjoy all the rights and privileges as if they had been born during the wedlock of their parents." That the marriage of Jacob W. McCausland to Elizabeth Rodgers was valid, if she were not under a disability existing from her marriage to John E. Rodgers, who might still have been alive, cannot be questioned. It was not only valid in Colorado, where they agreed to become husband and wife, but it would have been valid if entered into here as it was there, and the law of neither state puts the brand of bastardy upon their issue. When their babe was six weeks old, they agreed to become husband and wife, and to live together in that relation until death should part them. From that moment, if they were competent to make the solemn compact, their babe was no longer the son of no one, but the child of parents wedded as lawfully as if their marriage had been solemnized by pomp and religious ceremony; and their simple vows, made over a cradle, were kept to the end. The father, on January 10, 1903—but eight days before his death—declared in his will that Elizabeth McCausland was his beloved wife and that Jacob W. McCausland was his son. When Jacob Welty McCausland was born, on March 4, 1887, John E. Rodgers had not been seen or heard from for a period of 19 months. He was last seen on August 3, 1885, so that on August 3, 1892, seven years afterwards, he was presumed to be dead. For nearly 11 years after that date the woman he had married continued to live as the wife of Jacob W. McCausland, without hearing anything from him or about him, and up to the day of the audit in the court below nothing had been heard from him. By the laws of Colorado and this state he was presumed to be dead on August 3, 1892. Even if Elizabeth McCausland had been under disability before that day to enter into a lawful marriage contract with Jacob W. McCausland, it then presumptively disappeared, and thereafter, in the absence of proof that her former husband was living, she could become the lawful wife of Jacob W. McCausland. Though seven years must elapse before the presumption of death arises, when this period does elapse, there is no presumption as to the time when, during the seven years, the death of the absent party actually occurred, and therefore, to help the presumption of innocence or legitimacy, there is no presumption that it occurred after the second marriage, but rather that it occurred before. "Semper præsuntur pro matrimonio." This is, of course, but a presumption to be rebutted by proof of the actual date of the death, but, in the absence of such proof, with the presumption in favor of legitimacy, the presumption is in favor of the validity of the second marriage, as not having occurred prior to the death of the absent husband. 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 41; 1 Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, §§ 949-953; Senser et al. v. Bower et ux., 1 Pen. & W. 450; Pickens' Estate, 163 Pa. 14, 29 Atl. 875, 25 L. R. A. 477.

Under the facts found, the only conclusion that could be arrived at was reached by the learned judge of the court below; and his decree is affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, at the cost of the appellant.

ELK BREWING CO. v. NEUBERT.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. CORPORATIONS—OFFICERS—DIFFERENT CORPORATIONS.

Where the treasurer of a trust company is also the treasurer of a brewing company, and as such opens an account with the trust company and appropriates the moneys of the brewing company, the trust company, in the absence of fraud on its part, is not liable for the moneys misappropriated.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 12, Cent. Dig. Corporations, § 1383.]

2. SAME.

Where the treasurer of a brewing company deposits its moneys with a trust company, of which he is also treasurer, and misappropriates the same, that the president of the brewing company is also a director of the trust company does not render the trust company liable, where there is no evidence of fraud or collusion for a loss resulting to the brewing company from the misfeasance of its president.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 12, Cent. Dig. Corporations, § 1383.]

8. EQUITY—MISJOINDER OF DEFENDANTS.

A bill in equity is defective for misjoinder of parties defendant, where such parties act in different capacities and are not chargeable with any joint liability in the relief sought.

4. DISCOVERY—IN EQUITY—WHEN BILL LIES.

Where the bill seeks an accounting and merely incidental discovery, if there is no right to an accounting, it is demurrable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Discovery, § 27.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Armstrong County.

Bill by the Elk Brewing Company against

Charles Neubert and others. From a decree dismissing the bill, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Each of the defendants filed a demurrer in substantially the same form, which was as follows: "(1) The bill is multifarious: (a) Because it joins three persons as defendants, against whom, if the plaintiff has any equitable right, its remedy would be against them as individuals, and not against them jointly or collectively. (b) Because the defendants are distinct and separate in business relations, and are not jointly liable (if liable at all) under the averments of the bill. There is no common liability of the defendants. (c) Because the bill avers and charges the defendants in separate relations and capacities. (d) Because a chancellor could not make a decree, if the facts were found to be true as averred, that would be just against said defendants jointly. (e) Because the bill prays for relief against three defendants, and with respect to at least two distinct matters, and against said defendants, who were, either as individuals or officially, in distinct separate capacities or positions. (f) Because these defendants, under the averments of the bill, would have different defenses and different proofs, and a chancellor would be required to make different decrees. (g) Because the right of the decree prayed for, under the averments of the bill, must be established by evidence different from that introduced against other of the defendants, or upon a finding of facts in regard to which the other defendants are unconcerned and unadvised. (2) The bill does not disclose a case for equitable jurisdiction against Charles Neubert. (3) If any right exists against Charles Neubert, a proceeding at law is the proper remedy and not by equity." The court entered a decree dismissing the bill.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, PORTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

O. E. Harrington and M. F. Leason, for appellant. Rush Fullerton, McCain & Christy, Ross Reynolds, and J. W. King, for appellee.

ELKIN, J. The bill avers substantially that Charles Neubert was the treasurer of the brewing company and also of the trust company; that as treasurer of the brewing company he kept its accounts in the trust company, and intermingled or mixed the funds of the brewing company with those of the trust company, so as to render complainant unable to determine how much money is in his hands as treasurer and deposited in the trust company; that Valentine Neubert was the president of the brewing company and a director of the trust company; that said Valentine Neubert was a cestui que trust in the Bernd mortgage, and that he has in his possession papers, agreements, records, and memoranda showing the transaction concerning said mortgage, and refuses an inspection of the same; that said Valentine Neubert has failed, as president of the brewing company, to supervise and inspect the accounts of the treasurer thereof, and to ascertain the funds belonging to said company, and has knowingly permitted the corporate funds to be used improvidently; that on September 27, 1898, in pursuance of an agreement made prior to that date, Henry F. Bernd executed a mortgage to said trust company as trustee in the sum of $11,000 to secure a loan of that amount made to him, and of this amount the brewing company advanced $4,000, and that afterwards, to wit, on December 18, 1900, said trust company received the sum of $4,500 on account of said mortgage for use of the appellant, and has not accounted for the same; that said trust company has refused to allow plaintiff to make an examination of its books, records, and accounts showing the status of the accounts of Charles Neubert as treasurer, and has failed to account for other moneys belonging to the appellant. Upon this allegation of facts the complainant relies to show such joint liability and interest between the respondents as will entitle it to the equitable relief prayed for.

Much of the confusion in this case has arisen because of a seeming misapprehension of the legal status of Charles Neubert, who acted as treasurer of both corporations. He had a right to act in this dual capacity, if the corporations chose to have him so act. In so doing, however, the relations, duties, and liabilities of the two corporations were in no way changed. Any act performed by him within his duties as treasurer of the brewing company was not his individual act, but the act of the company whose officer he was, just as his act as the treasurer of the trust company was the act of said company and not his individual act. The rights, duties, and liabilities of each company are just the same as if a different individual had acted as treasurer of the respective companies. If the trust company is indebted to the brewing company, the obligation arises, not because Charles Neubert was the treasurer of one or both companies, but on account of said trust company having received moneys belonging to the brewing company which it has not accounted for. In such event a bill in equity does not lie because there is an adequate remedy at law.

Again, if the treasurer of the brewing company has failed or refused to account for all the moneys which came into his hands as treasurer, or if he is guilty of any misfeasance or malfeasance in office, he is liable to his company entirely independent of the fact of where he deposited said moneys, or, indeed, whether he deposited them at all. Certainly the trust company, which received said deposits in its usual course of business, like all other deposits, in the absence of fraud or collusion, cannot be held liable for the failure of the plaintiff's own treasurer to perform his duty. It would be a harsh rule to hold the trust company liable to the brewing company because of the alleged malfeasance of its own officer. Even if it be conceded, which it is not, that the treasurer of the brewing company failed to deposit or account for all moneys which came into his hands as such, the trust company cannot be held liable for such default or misappropriation merely because said treasurer happened to be an officer of the trust company at the time of the default or misappropriation.

And how does Valentine Neubert come into this equitable proceeding? He is charged with being president of the brewing company and a director of the trust company during the period covered by the bill. He is also charged with having failed in the performance of his duties as president of the brewing company, and with having permitted the corporate funds to be improvidently used. If these allegations be true, how do they affect the trust company? How can the trust company be made answerable for the alleged wrongful acts of the president of the brewing company? The only connection between them in this respect is that the same man happens to be president of one and director of the other corporation. This fact neither increases nor diminishes the liability of the respective companies. If Valentine Neubert has been derelict in his duty as president of the brewing company, that company must look to him in a proper proceeding, and cannot hold either the trust company or Charles Neubert answerable for such dereliction of duty, in the absence of fraud or collusion, and none such is charged.

What has already been said brings the case within the rule stated in Artman v. Giles, 155 Pa. 409, 28 Atl. 668, wherein it is held that a bill in equity which joins separate respondents, acting in different capacities, upon different rights, and not chargeable with any joint liability or interest in the relief sought, is defective.

As to the allegation that the trust company owes the brewing company $4,500 on the Bernd mortgage, as well as other moneys, it is only necessary to say that an action at law provides a full, complete, and adequate remedy.

There only remains one question to be considered. It was contended in the court below, and it is argued here, that the bill should be sustained for discovery, and if good for discovery, equity jurisdiction having attached for this purpose, all other questions may be considered and disposed of in the same proceeding. It may be conceded that it is difficult, under the authorities, to draw the line between the cases where a bill for discovery, having also a prayer for relief, is entertained, and where refused. It is not open to doubt, however, that, if discovery is used as a mere pretense to give jurisdiction, it would be a gross abuse to entertain a suit in equity when the whole foundation upon which it rests is either disproved or is shown to be a colorable disguise for the purpose of changing the forum of litigation. Story's Eq. p. 70 et seq. The question has been ruled in our own state in Holland v. Hallahan, 211 Pa. 223, 60 Atl. 735, wherein Mr. Justice Fell said: "Where there is no right to the main relief sought by a bill, and discovery is merely incidental to this relief, it will not be granted. In a bill seeking an account and discovery, the discovery is prima facie merely incidental to the account, and, if a right to an account is not disclosed, the bill will be held bad on demurrer."

We have already said that the plaintiff is not entitled to the equitable relief prayed for, and, since the discovery is only incidental to the relief, it necessarily follows, under the rule stated, that the bill must fail.

Decree affirmed, at the cost of the appellant.

CUNNINGHAM et al. v. WALLACE.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF COURT.

A decree fixing the fee of a master in partition will not be reversed, where no abuse of discretion is shown.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 3881, 3882.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Lawrence County.

Bill for partition by J. P. H. Cunningham and S. W. Cunningham against Caroline C. Wallace. From the decree, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Following is the opinion of Wallace, P. J., in the court below:

"This case came before me on exceptions to compensation of master. It was fixed by the court at $4,500, when plaintiffs claimed it was excessive and fixed without notice to them. The matter was referred to the master, to be considered by him in his distribution of the fund. The master reported the same amount, whereupon exceptions were filed before him and are now renewed in court; the exceptants representing about one-half of the estate. The services in this case were of a very complicated nature, requiring, not only skill and ability as a member of the bar, but the exercise of more than ordinary care, and involving considerable labor and responsibility. The master performed all the duties imposed upon him faithfully and well, and to the satisfaction of all the parties interested. Their own agreement says: 'The entire partition and all the various proceedings therein, and the execution by the master of the decree appointing him, are satisfactory, and are hereby duly approved.' The master awarded two purparts to two of the heirs at their bid of $6,472, and advertised all the remaining purparts for sale at public outcry, as directed by law and order of court, and sold at public sale several of the purparts for $125,910.50, and at the instance of the parties in interest adjourned the sale of the remainder from time to time, until the heirs entered into an agreement, by the terms of which each of the heirs agreed to take certain of the purparts at certain prices, and that the master should report as sold at public sale. This was in effect a private sale to the several parties for $35,467. His service and responsibility extended to the entire property which was so sold by him. The total amount distributed by him, and for which he was responsible, was $167,849.50. His fees were fixed a little more than 2% per cent. It was agreed for exceptants that he should only be allowed commission upon the property actually sold at public sale. This amounted to $125,910.50, and if we should allow commissions on that alone, and in addition compensation for the labor, care, skill, and ability, outside of these public sales, it would aggregate more than the amount we have allowed him. Without going into details, however, our knowledge of this case, and of all the proceedings, satisfies me that the amount is not excessive, but, upon the contrary, is a reasonable compensation.

"Now, December 31, 1904, the exceptions are therefore dismissed, and the adjudication fixing the master's fees at $4,500 is confirmed absolutely, and it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said amount be retained by him out of the moneys of the estate in his hands."

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

S. W. Dana, Robert K. Aiken, and C. H. Akins, for appellants. James A. Gardner, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The services of the master were familiar to the court below, and he was in better position to judge as to the proper compensation than we can be. We have not been convinced that there was any abuse of his discretion, and the judgment is therefore affirmed on his opinion.

HANNA v. SWEENEY.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut.
Jan. 26, 1906.)

1. ASSAULT AND BATTERY—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

In an action for a violent, unprovoked, and malicious assault, plaintiff is entitled to recover punitive damages.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 4, Cent. Dig. Assault and Battery, § 54.]

2. SAME—AMOUNT—LITIGATION EXPENSES.

In an action for assault, it was error for the court to permit the jury to assess punitive damages in favor of plaintiff according to their discretion; such damages being limited to the amount of plaintiff's expenses in the suit, less his taxable costs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hartford County; Edwin B. Gager, Judge.

Action for assault and battery by William H. Hanna against John F. Sweeney. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

William F. Henney, for appellant. John Walsh and James Roche, for appellee.

TORRANCE, C. J. In the trial court the evidence for the plaintiff tended to prove that the defendant committed upon him a violent, unprovoked, and malicious assault and battery, whereby the plaintiff was greatly injured in mind, body, and estate. Upon that evidence the plaintiff claimed to be entitled, if the jury found in his favor, not only to full compensation for all his actual injuries, but also to damages, in excess of such compensation, variously termed exemplary, punitive, or vindictive; and the court correctly charged the jury in accordance with the tenor of this claim. St. Peter's Church v. Beach, 26 Conn. 355; Burr v. Plymouth, 48 Conn. 480; Mais-enbacker v. Society Concordia, 71 Conn. 369, 42 Atl. 67, 71 Am. St. Rep. 213; Welch v. Durand, 36 Conn. 182, 4 Am. Rep. 55.

The court, however, further charged the jury with reference to such damages that, if they found in favor of the plaintiff, they might, "in addition to actual or compensatory damages, award punitive damages or 'smart money,' as it is sometimes called, proportionate to the degree of malice or wantonness evinced by the defendant." It is of this part of the charge that the defendant chiefly complains. He says that by it the amount of "exemplary" damages which the jury might award to the plaintiff was erroneously left entirely at large to the discretion of the jury, and we think he is right in this claim. At common law, in certain actions of tort, the jury were at liberty to award damages, "not only as a satisfaction to the injured person, but likewise as a punishment to the guilty, to deter from any such proceeding for the future, and as a proof of the detestation of the jury to the action itself." Pratt, L. C. J., in Wilkes v. Wood, Lofft, 1, 18, 19; Huckle v. Money, 2 Wils. 205; Lake Shore Railway v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 101, 13 Sup. Ct. 261, 37

L. Ed. 97; Goddard v. Grand Trunk Railway, 57 Me. 202, 2 Am. Rep. 39; Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. 363, 14 L. Ed. 181; Dalton v. Beers, 38 Conn. 529.

Moreover, at common law, the amount of punitive damages that might be awarded was left almost entirely to the discretion of the jury; for the courts generally refused to grant a new trial for excessive damages of this kind. In Huckle v. Money, supra, the actual damages appeared to be about £20 sterling, but the verdict was for £300; and the court, in refusing to grant a new trial, said: "It must be a glaring case, indeed, of outrageous damages in a tort, and which all mankind at first blush must think so, to induce a court to grant a new trial for excessive damages." In Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. 363, 14 L. Ed. 181, in speaking of the discretion of the jury in such cases, Justice Grier says: "This (i. e., the amount of 'smart money') has been always left to the discretion of the jury, as the degree of punishment to be thus inflicted must depend upon the particular circumstances of each case. It must be evident, also, that, as it depends upon the degree of malice, wantonness, or oppression, or outrage of the defendant's conduct, the punishment of his delinquency cannot be measured by the expenses of the plaintiff in prosecuting his suit. It is true that damages assessed by way of example may thus indirectly compensate the plaintiff for money expended in counsel fees, but the amount of those fees cannot be taken as the measure of punishment or a necessary element in its infliction." That the amount of punitive damages, in cases where such damages may be awarded, is generally left to the discretion of the jury, see, also, Cyc. vol. 13, p. 119, and cases there cited, and Hale on Damages, c. 7, par. 83, and Sedgwick's Elements of Damages, p. 85.

This power of a jury, at common law in certain actions of tort, to award damages beyond mere compensation, and practically of such an amount as they in their discretion may determine, has resulted in the doctrine of punitive damages, which has been called "a sort of hybrid between a display of righteous indignation and the imposition of a criminal fine." Haines v. Schultz, 50 N. J. Law, 481, 14 Atl. 488. This doctrine has been said to be exceptional, anomalous, logically wrong, and at variance with the general rule of compensation in civil cases; but, notwithstanding the objections urged against it, it prevails in many, if not in most, of the states. Sedgwick's Elements of Damages, pp. 86, 87. In this state the common-law doctrine of punitive damages, as above outlined, if it ever did prevail, prevails no longer. In certain actions of tort the jury here may award what are called punitive damages, because nominally not compensatory; but in fact and effect they are compensatory, and their amount cannot exceed the amount of the plaintiff's expenses of litigation in the suit, less his taxable costs. "Such expenses in excess of taxable costs * * * limit the amount of punitive damages which can be awarded." Malsenbacker v. Concordia Society, 71 Conn. 369-378, 42 Atl. 67, 71 Am. St. Rep. 213, and cases there cited.

The court, it is true, told the jury that in estimating punitive damages they might consider counsel fees and other expenses of the plaintiff to which he had been put in attempting to get compensation; but, probably by an oversight, they were not told that the amount of the punitive damages which they might award was limited by the amount of those expenses less the taxable costs in the suit; and afterwards they were told in effect that the amount of punitive damages was a matter that rested in their discretion, dependent upon "the degree of malice or wantonness evinced by the defendant."

There is error, and a new trial is granted. The other judges concurred.

LAMPHIRE et al. v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Grafton. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. BAIL—DISCHARGE OF SURETIES—GROUNDS.

Under Pub. St. 1901, c. 252, § 30, providing that, when the sureties in a recognizance are prevented without their fault from surrendering their principal by the act of the government of the state or of the United States, the Supreme Court may discharge them on such terms as may be just, it must be shown, to entitle sureties on a forfeited recognizance to a discharge, not only that they were prevented without their fault from surrendering their principal, but that such prevention was accomplished by the act of the government of the state or of the United States; and a showing that the principal voluntarily enlisted in the United States Navy without the knowledge of the sureties, and was thus enabled to depart from the state beyond the reach of the sureties, is insufficient.

2. SAME—ACTIONS—EXCEPTION BY STATE.

A proceeding by sureties on a forfeited recognizance for the appearance of one accused of crime to obtain their discharge is a civil proceeding, and the state is entitled to take an exception to an order of discharge.

Exceptions from Superior Court; Stone, Judge.

Petition by Henry A. Lamphire and Fred W. Towle for a discharge as sureties upon a recognizance. There was an order discharging the sureties, and the state excepted. Exception sustained.

The petitioners recognized as sureties for the appearance at the superior court of Daniel McIntyre, who was duly bound over for such appearance at the May term, 1904, by a justice of the peace upon a complaint charging him with breaking and entering a dwelling house and stealing therefrom. At the May term McIntyre was indicted for the crime charged before the justice, but did not appear, and the recognizance was defaulted. After entering into the recognizance, and before the May term, McIntyre, without the knowledge of the sureties, enlisted in the United States Navy. He is now in the service of the United States, and has been ever since his enlistment. Upon these facts the court found that the sureties without their fault were prevented from surrendering the principal, and ordered their discharge, under section 30, c. 252, Pub. St. 1901. To this order the state excepted.

Scott Sloane, for petitioners. Marshall D. Cobleigh, for the State.

PARSONS, C. J. "When the sureties in a recognizance, without their fault, are prevented from surrendering their principal by the act of God, or of the government of the state or of the United States, or by sentence of law, the Supreme Court, on petition and notice thereof to the county commissioners and state's counsel, may discharge them on such terms as may be deemed just." Pub. St. 1901, c. 252, § 30. Upon petition under this section by the sureties in a recognizance, the superior court found that the sureties without their fault were prevented from surrendering their principal, and ordered their discharge. The order was not warranted by the facts found. To bring the case within the statute the sureties must have made it appear, not only that they were prevented from surrendering their principal without their fault, but also that they were prevented by the act of God, or of the government of the United States or of this state, or by sentence of law. Neither fact is found, or could be found, from the evidence. The principal was not impressed as a seaman or drafted by the government, but voluntarily enlisted. If, by such voluntary act, he has been enabled to depart from the state, so that the sureties cannot reach him, his absence is due to his voluntary act, and not, as far as appears, to any act of the government of the United States. His absence is purely voluntary, and affords the sureties no justification or excuse. "It was against that they guaranteed the government. To prevent that they became responsible." State v. McAllister, 54 N. H. 156, 158. The causes named in the act would be a good defense at common law to an action against the sureties. Goodwin v. Smith, 4 N. H. 29, 30; Harrington v. Dennie, 13 Mass. 93; Belding v. State, 25 Ark. 315, 4 Am. Rep. 26, 99 Am. Dec. 214, 216-218, note. The purpose of the statute does not appear to be to introduce a new ground for releasing the sureties, but merely to provide a convenient method of determining their liability. But, whatever its purpose, it does not make the voluntary absence of the principal, without fault of the sureties, alone sufficient ground for their discharge. The recognizance was a contract between the sureties and the state for the production of the principal at the required time. The sureties upon an action for breach of this contract are not accused of crime. The proceeding is civil, and the state is entitled to its exception. State v. Kinne, 39 N. H. 129, 137; s. c., 41 N. H. 238. As no facts are found which, as matter of law, authorize the order of discharge, and no evidence was before the court upon which the facts necessary to authorize the order could be found, the order made was erroneous, and must be set aside.

Exception sustained. All concurred.

NOYES v. THORPE.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Grafton. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. DISCOVERY—BILL—NATURE OF ACTION.

Where a bill for discovery in aid of an action for libel stated the nature of the action, the names of the parties, the term of court at which it was entered, and where it was pending, it was not demurrable for failure to set out a legal cause of action in aid of which the discovery was sought.

2. LIBEL—OFFENSE—MISDEMEANORS.

The malicious publication of a libelous article is a common-law crime, punishable as a misdemeanor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Libel and Slander, §§ 405, 406.]

3. SAME—PERSONS LIABLE.

Every person who requests, procures, or asks another to publish a libel, is answerable as though he published it himself.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Libel and Slander, § 414.]

4. DISCOVERY—LIBEL—PRIVILEGE.

A bill for discovery of an original libelous article alleged to have been published by defendant in a newspaper, and the names of the persons who dictated the article to defendant and procured him to publish it, in aid of an action at law for libel, was demurrable as calling on defendant to disclose matter which would tend to incriminate him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Discovery, § 12.]

Exceptions from Superior Court; Wallace, Judge.

Bill by Walter S. Noyes against Charles A. Thorpe for discovery in aid of an action for libel. A demurrer to the bill was sustained, and plaintiff brings exceptions. Exceptions overruled.

Everett O. Howe and Smith & Smith, for plaintiff. Scott Sloane and Mitchell & Foster, for defendant.

BINGHAM, J. In the bill it is alleged that the plaintiff has brought an action at law against the defendant to recover damages for publishing in his newspaper a libelous article concerning the plaintiff; that the article was instigated and its publication brought about by persons unknown to the plaintiff, who either sent or dictated it to the defendant; that the plaintiff is not able to discover who the persons are; that the defendant knows who they are, but will not state; and that the plaintiff desires to know, so that he may join them in his action against the defendant. The prayer of the bill is (1) that the defendant be required to produce the original writing containing the alleged libelous article, and (2) that he may be required to disclose who the persons were who dictated the article to him and procured him to publish it. The defendant demurs to the bill, and says his demurrer should be sustained (1) because the bill does not set out a legal cause of action, in aid of which the discovery is sought, and (2) because a disclosure of the matters prayed for would tend to incriminate him.

1. The bill states the nature of the action, the names of the parties to it, the term of court at which it was entered, and where it is pending. If this is not a sufficient reference to the action and the declaration contained therein, so as to incorporate into the bill the alleged slanderous words, the objection may be obviated by an amendment. As the bill may be amended to meet this objection, it is unnecessary to further consider the first reason assigned in support of the demurrer.

2. It is an established rule that a demurrer to a bill of discovery lies where the matter sought to be disclosed will convict or tend to convict the defendant of a crime; that he cannot be required to discover the principal fact, or any one of a series or chain of facts, which may contribute to establish a criminal charge against him. Reynolds v. Fibre Co., 71 N. H. 332, 334, 51 Atl. 1075, 57 L. R. A. 949, 93 Am. St. Rep. 535; Adams v. Porter, 1 Cush. 170; Marsh v. Davison, 9 Paige, 580; 6 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 743, 779. The malicious publication of a libelous article is a common-law crime, and punishable as a misdemeanor. May, Cr. L. 148. If, then, the production of the original article, taken in connection with other evidence, may tend to convict the defendant of a violation of the criminal law, he cannot be required to produce it. That the production of the article from the defendant's possession, unexplained, taken in connection with evidence of its publication, would tend to show that he was the person who published it, cannot be doubted. And if it appeared, on the production of the article, that it was in the handwriting of the defendant, the evidence would be of still greater weight in the establishment of his guilt. Regina v. Lovett, 9 Q. & P. 462.

3. "Every one who requests, procures, or commands another to publish a libel is answerable as though he published it himself." Odg. Lib. 119, 120; Cochran v. Butterfield, 18 N. H. 115, 45 Am. Dec. 363. The allegations of the bill, read in the light of this principle, disclose that the publication relied upon to establish the guilt of the unknown persons is the same publication as that with which the plaintiff seeks to charge the defendant. This being so, it follows that an answer to the question, who communicated or dictated the article to the defendant and procured him to publish it? involves an admission that he himself was the agency through which the publication was effected. Such an admission would tend to establish his guilt, and he cannot be required to make the disclosure.

It is unnecessary to consider whether, in the absence of the foregoing reasons, the plaintiff would (Post & Co. v. Railroad, 144 Mass. 341, 11 N. E. 540, 59 Am. Rep. 86; Hoppock's Ex'rs v. Railroad, 27 N. J. Eq. 286; Telephone Co. v. Mohler, 51 W. Va. 1, 41 S. E. 421; Heathcote v. Fleete, 2 Vern. 442; Morse v. Buckworth, 2 Vern. 443; Moodalay v. Morton, 2 Dick. 652; Orr v. Diaper, L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 92) or would not (Opdyke v. Marble, 44 Barb. 64; Twells v. Costen, 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 373; Dineley v. Dineley, 2 Atk. 394; London v. Levy, 8 Ves. 398) be entitled to have the defendant disclose the names of the unknown persons. The demurrer was properly sustained.

Exceptions overruled. All concurred.

FLINT v. UNION WATER POWER CO. (Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Coos. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. TRIAL—VIEW BY JURY.

In an action for alleged illegal flowage of plaintiff's land, it was not error during a view to call the jury's attention to a newly dug hole in the ground near the stream and the height of the water therein, as compared with the height of the water in the river, as bearing on the extent of the flowage.

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—FLOWAGE—ACTION—EVIDENCE.

In an action for alleged illegal flowage, it was proper for the court to permit a civil engineer to testify that water would percolate through the soil, and that he dug a hole in the land and found that water in it stood on a level with the stream.

3. EVIDENCE—EXPERTS—FINDING.

The fact that a civil engineer was permitted to testify to the percolating character of the soil of plaintiff's land between a certain hole and a river implied a finding that he was qualified to testify on the subject.

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—FLOWAGE—INJURIES TO REAL ESTATE—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to plaintiff's land by flowage, evidence that plaintiff relied on the lowlands, which could be cropped without fertilizing, to keep up his light upland, and that the damage to him from water held back by defendant's new dam more than by the old dam was $1,000 for six years prior to the date of the writ, was admissible.

5. SAME—EASEMENTS—DEEDS—CONSTRUCTION.

A deed under which defendants claimed conveyed the land on which a dam stood and all rights of flowage of any lands belonging to the grantors, or either of them, on a lake and certain rivers and their tributaries, and all right "they had to flow the land of others by any of such dams," followed by a clause that the deed was intended to convey all rights of flowage of any lands in Co. county, caused by any of such dams, wherever situated and however the right may have been acquired. Held, that such deed only conveyed the right to flow as it was exercised at the time the deed was executed.

Exceptions from Superior Court; Peaslee, Judge.

Action by Benjamin H. Flint against the Union Water Power Company. A verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and defendant brings exceptions. Overruled.

The plaintiff's evidence tended to prove a record title to the premises (located in Wentworth's location) from 1851, possession and use by the various holders of the title, a customary control of the water in the Magalloway river adjoining the premises by the dam at Errol, operated by the defendants and their predecessors in title down to 1887, the building of a new dam at that time, and an increased flowage thereafter. The defendants' evidence tended to prove that the plaintiff's title originated in a tax sale about 1850; that in 1877 Coe & Pingree held the record title to Wentworth's location and to the Errol dam, and then conveyed to the defendants' grantors the land on which the dam stood, and "all rights of flowage of any lands belonging to us [them], or either of us [them], upon Lake Umbagog, and also upon the Androscoggin and Magalloway rivers and their tributaries, including, also, all right which we [they] have to flow the land of others by any of said dams, intending hereby to convey all right of flowage of any lands in said county of Coos, caused by any of said dams, wherever situate, above or below said dams, and however the right may have been acquired, whether by purchase, grant, prescription, or otherwise, to the end that the grantees may have and enjoy the same rights of flowage, and to the same extent over all said premises, as we [the grantors] now have the right to enjoy." At a view of the premises by the jury, the plaintiff called attention to a newly dug hole some rods from the river, to the water in the hole, and to its height as compared with the level of the river. A civil engineer testified that water would percolate through that soil, and that he dug the hole and found that the water in it stood on a level with the stream. To all this the defendants excepted. Subject to exception, the plaintiff testified that he relied upon the lowlands, which could be cropped without fertilizing, to keep up his light upland, and that the damage to him from water held back by the new dam more than by the old dam was $1,000 for the six years prior to the date of the writ.

The defendants excepted to the following instructions given to the jury: "The evidence apparently shows that the plaintiff's title is a prescriptive one; but this does not render it any the less valid. He has had such possession and color of title as give him a right to recover damages if the defendants have exceeded their legal rights in the premises. And so the practical question for you is whether the defendants have flowed beyond what they have a right to. The defendants say that they have title by deed, and also a prescriptive right to flow as much as they have flowed. The deed to them from Coe & Pingree conveys the right of flowage by Errol dam. This means the right to flow as it was exercised at the time the deed was given in 1877; and that is the limit of the defendants' right as founded upon the deed." Instructions were also given as to what was necessary to enable the defendants to acquire flowage rights by prescription as against the plaintiff. The charge then proceeded as follows: "So whether this title is by deed or by prescription, it is measured by the extent of the use; and, as there is no dispute but that the use was substantially the same for more than 20 years, the practical question for you will be whether there has been a substantial increase of the flowage by the new dam. The question, as you will see, is purely one of fact for you to settle. Was the flowage for the 6 years just before March 11, 1908, substantially greater than that which the defendants had claimed and exercised the right to the enjoyment of for 20 years?" There was no exception to these instructions.

Edmund Sullivan and Goss & Tardivel, for plaintiff. Drew, Jordan, Buckley & Shurtleff and White & Carter, for defendants.

CHASE, J. There was no error in the calling of the attention of the jury at the view to the newly dug hole in the ground and the height of the water therein, as compared with the height of the water in the river, nor in the receipt of the civil engineer's testimony regarding the hole and the water. The height of the water in the plaintiff's land, as compared with its height in the river, was a physical fact relevant to the issue on trial, and it might be shown by direct observation and by the testimony of those who had observed it. Concord, etc., Co. v. Clough, 70 N. H. 627, 47 Atl. 704. The fact that the civil engineer was permitted to testify to the percolating character of the soil between the hole and the river implies that the court found that he was qualified to testify upon the subject. As there is nothing in the case tending to show that there was any error of law involved in this finding, the parties are bound by it, and his testimony was competent. Jones v. Tucker, 41 N. H. 546; Dole v. Johnson, 50 N. H. 452. Nor is the exception to the plaintiff's testimony concerning his damages tenable. Carter v. Thurston, 58 N. H. 104, 42 Am. Rep. 584; Foster v. Foster, 62 N. H. 532.

It would seem, from the manner in which the case was presented to the jury, that it was not denied that the plaintiff had acquired a title by prescription to the land flowed, subject to a flowage easement appurtenant to the defendants' land at Errol, on which their dam was located. The extent of this easement appears to have been the only question in dispute. The defendants asserted title to the easement by virtue of the deed of 1877 from Coe & Pingree to their grantors, and also by prescription. The only exception to the charge related to the interpretation that was given therein to the Coe & Pingree deed. There were conveyed by this deed the land on which the dam stood and "all rights of flowage of any lands" belonging to Coe & Pingree, or either of them, upon Lake Umbagog, the Androscoggin and Magalloway rivers and their tributaries, and all right they had "to flow the land of others by any of said dams." Whether the phrase "by any of said dams" limits the right of flowing lands above the Errol dam, owned and retained by Coe & Pingree, as well as all rights acquired by them to flow lands of others, might be doubtful in the absence of further statement. But this description is immediately followed by the explanation: "Intending hereby to convey all rights of flowage of any lands in said county of Coos, caused by any of said dams, wherever situated, * * * and however the right may have been acquired," etc. Here, the right of flowing lands other than those conveyed is specifically limited to that "caused by any of said dams." The only flowage easement involved in the action is the one pertaining to the dam at Errol, which, according to the case, must be one of "said dams" mentioned in the deed. The right of flowage conveyed in connection with this dam or the land on which it stood, was not a right to flow Coe & Pingree's other lands to any extent and depth that it was possible to flow them by a dam at Errol, but only a right to flow such lands to the extent that they were customarily flowed by the existing dam. The further explanatory clause is added: "To the end that the grantees may have and enjoy the same rights of flowage, and to the same extent over all said premises, as we now have the right to enjoy." This does not modify the prior explanatory clause. "The same rights of flowage" are of the flowage "caused by any of said dams." These rights are to be enjoyed "to the same extent over all said premises as we [the grantors] now have the right to enjoy"; that is, by means of "any of said dams."

The rightful state of the property at the time of the execution of the deed is weighty evidence of the intention which the parties attempted to express by its terms. Dunklee v. Railroad, 24 N. H. 489; Seavey v. Jones, 43 N. H. 441; Watson v. Bartlett, 62 N. H. 447. Reading the deed in the light of this evidence, and giving its terms their ordinary meaning, it appears that there was no error in the court's instructions to the jury that the right of flowage conveyed by the Coe & Pingree deed was "the right to flow as it was exercised at the time the deed was given in 1877," and that "that is the limit of the defendants' right as founded upon the deed."

Exceptions overruled. All concurred.

STATE v. TRUITT.

(Court of General Sessions of Delaware. Kent. Oct. 26, 1906.)

1. ASSAULT AND BATTERY—DEFINITION OF ASSAULT.

An assault is any unlawful and wrongful attempt by force and violence to do injury to the person of another.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 4, Cent. Dig. Assault and Battery, §§ 1, 68.]

2. RAPE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO RAPE—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE.

In order to authorize a conviction of assault with intent to commit rape, the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that, if defendant had consummated his intent, he would have been guilty of rape.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 42, Cent. Dig. Rape, §§ 15, 79-81.]

3. SAME—DEFINITION.

Rape is the carnal knowledge of a woman above the age of 10 years against her will.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 42, Cent. Dig. Rape, §§ 1-19.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—INTOXICATION.

Where a crime involves a specific intent and purpose as a constituent element of the offense, evidence of defendant's intoxication is competent on the question whether, by reason thereof, defendant was capable of forming and entertaining the intent requisite to constitute the crime.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 67, 761.]

5. SAME—EFFECT OF INTOXICATION.

An intoxicated person may be capable of premeditation and deliberation, and, if he commits a wrongful act willfully and premeditatedly while in his drunken condition, he is as guilty of crime as if he had been sober.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 67.]

6. SAME.

Where a person resolves to commit a crime, and then drinks to intoxication and commits the same, the fact of intoxication cannot lessen the degree of the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 65, 67.]

7. SAME—CRIMINAL INTENT—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where a specific intent is a necessary ingredient of the crime, defendant, so long as he is capable of conceiving and entertaining such intent, must be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to have intended the natural and probable consequences of his act.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 26-28.]

8. SAME—DEFENSES—DRUNKENNESS—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO RAPE.

Where defendant, at the time of the commission of an alleged assault with intent to commit rape, knew what he was doing, and was able to appreciate the character of his act, and knew that it was unlawful and wrongful, his drunkenness was no defense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 65-70.]

9. SAME—ASSAULT AND BATTERY.

A person may be found guilty of a mere assault, no matter how drunk he was at the time of the commission of the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 65-70.]

10. SAME—REASONABLE DOUBT—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Reasonable doubt as to the guilt of one accused of crime must be such a real and substantial doubt as intelligent and impartial men might reasonably entertain upon a careful consideration of all the evidence, and must not be a vague, fanciful, or merely possible doubt.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1267, 1906-1922.]

James Irvin Truitt was indicted for assault with intent to rape, and convicted of assault.

At the trial one Celestine Lito, the prosecuting witness, testified: That on the 5th day of July, 1905, between 8 and 9 o'clock in the evening, while she was driving from her home to the town of Marydel, she saw a person lying across the road, and stopped her horse, got out, and told the person (who proved to be the defendant, Truitt, whom she knew) to get over onto the side of the road, as he was in danger, if he remained where he was, of being run over. That after she had induced Truitt to move from his position to the side of the road she told him that, when she came back from Marydel, she would take him home in her dearborn. Shortly thereafter she came back and stopped, and Truitt got into the wagon and sat on the board, which formed the seat of the dearborn, beside Mrs. Lito, the prosecuting witness. That she talked with him and urged him to become a better man, as she had observed that he had been drunk on several occasions. That he spoke to her rather encouragingly along that line, telling her that he believed in God, etc., until they had passed by several houses along the road and were approaching a road, which crossed the one upon which they were traveling, near a woods, when he asked her if she was going to drive up this road to her son-in-law's house. She told him that she was not, but was going to drive on home. That he thereupon grabbed her around the waist with his arm and made an indecent proposal to her, which she refused and resented. That he then threw her down in the bottom of the dearborn, and in her efforts to free herself from him the seat was upset and was thrown across her, with the prisoner's weight resting upon the same. That she screamed, but, as nobody was apparently within hearing, she asked him to let her up from under the seat, as it was hurting her, and, when he did so, quick as a flash she jumped from the dearborn and started running down the road towards her home. That the prisoner jumped out and ran after her, and overtook her a short distance down the road, and threw her down in the grass alongside of the road, where she continued to struggle with him and screamed. That he put his hand over her mouth and told her that, 'f she did not keep still, he would kill her. That she told him, if he killed her, he would have to pay the penalty by being killed himself, and he said he did not care if he was, that he was going to have what he was after. That about that time she saw a man come along the road (whom she thought to be a Mr. Luff, but who proved to be a Mr. Betton, whom she did not know, but who lived near and had heard her scream), and she called to him several times for help. That he did not heed her at first, but finally came to her assistance, when she jumped up and ran home, a distance of about two miles; her horse having in the meantime gone on ahead of her and being home when she arrived there.

The witness Betton testified: That, when he approached the prosecuting witness at the side of the road, the defendant, Truitt, ran at him, cursed him, and told him he would fix him. The witness thereupon struck the defendant, knocking him down, and then jumped upon him and struck him twice, when the defendant said: "Do not strike me any more. This is only poor Truitt." That he thereupon desisted and let Truitt go.

The husband of the prosecuting witness testified that, when she arrived at home, she was bruised on the arm and side of the neck; that her hair was down, and that she was very much excited; and that she related to him the facts of the assault made upon her by the defendant.

The defendant did not deny that he committed the assault, but stated that he had drunk a quart of apple brandy during the day of the alleged assault (July 5th) and was so drunk that evening that he did not know anything about the matter of the assault, or anything else that happened. Several other witnesses testified to the defendant's drunken condition during the day and evening of July 5th, and one witness testified that in his opinion the defendant was so drunk that he did not know what he was about. There was also testimony to the effect that the character of the defendant for peace and good order was good.

Argued before LORE, C. J., and GRUBB and PENNEWILL, JJ.

Robert H. Richards, Atty. Gen., and Daniel O. Hastings, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the State. Alexander M. Daly, for defendant.

PENNEWILL, J. (charging jury). The prisoner at the bar, Joseph Irvin Truitt, is charged in this indictment with having committed, on the 5th day of July of the present year, an assault upon one Celestine Lito, with intent her, the said Celestine Lito, to ravish and carnally know. This indictment is based upon a statute of this state, which provides "that if any person shall, with violence, assault any female with intent to commit rape, such person shall be deemed guilty of felony," etc. And the charge embraces, as you have doubtless observed, not only an assault, but also the intent to commit rape.

An assault is any unlawful and wrongful attempt by force and violence to do injury to the person of another, and you may find the prisoner at the bar guilty of an assault simply, if the evidence shall justify such a finding. In order to find the prisoner guilty in manner and form as he stands indicted (that is, guilty of an assault with intent to commit rape), you must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that if the prisoner had consummated his intent (that is, accomplished his purpose) he would have been guilty of rape. It is therefore necessary for us to tell you briefly what constitutes the crime of rape. It has been defined by this court to be the carnal knowledge of a woman, above the age of 10 years, against her will; and if you believe that the prisoner not only committed the assault alleged in the indictment, but that he intended at the time to commit the crime of rape, you should find him guilty in manner and form as he stands indicted.

We have been asked by the counsel for the defendant to instruct you as to the effect of drunkenness as a defense, where the charge embraces a specific intent; and we think the law upon this question has been very correctly and clearly stated by the court in the case of State v. Di Guglielmo, 4 Pennewill, 336, 55 Atl. 350. Judge Grubb, in charging the jury in that case, said: "Although voluntary intoxication constitutes neither excuse for nor palliation of crime, yet, in cases where a specific or particular intent and purpose is an essential or constituent element of the offense, intoxication, even though voluntary, becomes a matter for consideration, and is competent evidence on the question whether, by reason thereof, the defendant was capable of forming or entertaining such an intent or purpose at the time the act was perpetrated. Evidence of intoxication, however, should always be received with great caution, and carefully examined, in connection with the other proven circumstances. A person who is intoxicated may be capable of premeditation and deliberation, and a drunken man who commits a wrongful act willfully and premeditatedly is as guilty in the eyes of the law as if he had been sober. If a person resolves to commit a crime, and then drinks to intoxication and commits the act, the fact of intoxication cannot lessen the degree of the offense, because he specifically intended to commit it. When the specific intent is a necessary ingredient of the crime, so long as the defendant is capable of conceiving and entertaining the design, he must be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to have intended the natural and probable consequences of his act."

If you believe from the evidence that the prisoner, at the time of the commission of the alleged offense, knew what he was doing, and was able to appreciate the character of his act, and knew it was unlawful or wrongful, his drunkenness would be no defense. All we have said to you about intoxication or drunkenness has reference only to the intent to commit the rape, and does not apply in any manner to the charge of assault, because that does not embrace any specific intent. Therefore, no matter how drunk the person may have been at the time, you may find him guilty of assault only, provided the evidence in this case shall warrant you in so finding.

In this case you may find any one of three verdicts. If you should believe that the prisoner at the bar did not commit the assault at all, your verdict, of course, should be not guilty. If you believe that he did commit the assault alleged, but are not satisfied that he intended to ravish or rape the prosecuting witness, your verdict should be not guilty in manner and form as he stands indicted, but guilty of assault only; and if you should believe that he not only committed the assault, but that it was his intent at the time to ravish or rape the prosecuting witness, your verdict should be guilty in manner and form as he stands indicted. If, after carefully considering all the evidence in this case, you entertain a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the prisoner, that doubt should inure to his benefit, and your verdict should be not guilty. But we say to you that such a doubt must not be a vague, fanciful, or merely possible doubt, but such a real and substantial doubt as intelligent and impartial men may reasonably entertain upon a careful consideration of all the evidence in the case.

Verdict: Not guilty in manner and form as he stands indicted, but guilty of assault only.

GREEN v. COUNCIL OF NEWARK.

(Superior Court of Delaware. New Castle. March 10, 1905.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—TORTS—DEFECTIVE SIDEWALKS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

In an action against a city for injuries to a pedestrian caused by falling on a defective footway or crossing, whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence held, under the evidence, a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 1754.]

2. SAME—DUTIES OF MUNICIPALITY.

It is the duty of municipal corporations to keep streets or highways in a reasonably safe condition for the use of travelers.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 1612.]

3. SAME—PRESUMPTIONS BY TRAVELER.

In the absence of knowledge to the contrary, a traveler on a street may presume that it is in a safe condition, and need not look out or search for holes or obstructions.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, §§ 1673, 1678.]

4. SAME—DUTY OF TRAVELER—AVOIDANCE OF INJURY.

Where a traveler on a street has knowledge of the existence, nature, and character of any obstruction or danger, he must look out for such obstruction, and take all such precautions to avoid injury as an ordinarily prudent person would take under such conditions, and if he carelessly incurs risk, and is injured thereby, he cannot recover against the city for his injuries, although the city authorities were also negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 1677.]

5. SAME—NEGLIGENCE OF DEFENDANT—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action against a city for injuries caused by a defective crossing or footway, the burden is on plaintiff to prove defendant's negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 1725.]

6. EVIDENCE—WEIGHT OF CONFLICTING TESTIMONY.

Where testimony is conflicting, the jury should reconcile it, if they can, and, if not, they should give credit to those witnesses who, from their intelligence, truthfulness, impartiality, and opportunity of knowledge, are most entitled to credit under all the facts of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, §§ 2424, 2437.]

7. DAMAGES—PERSONAL INJURIES—AMOUNT.

The measure of damages for personal injuries is such an amount as will reasonably compensate plaintiff for expenses incurred in treating his injuries, for bodily pain and suffering, for loss of wages incurred in the past, and for such permanent disability to earn a living in the future as may be the result of the injuries complained of.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Damages, §§ 222-259.]

Action by Joseph L. Green against the Council of Newark. The jury disagreed.

Action on the case to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff on November 11, 1903, by being caught and thrown upon a footway or crossing on Chapel street, in the town of Newark. Plaintiff claimed that said defective footway was allowed to be and remain in such condition through the negligence of the defendant.

The plaintiff testified concerning the accident and his knowledge of the locality and condition of the stone, and also as to his injuries, as follows: "Q. What happened to you on the night of November 11, 1903, if anything? A. I fell on a loose flagstone on Chapel street, in Newark, in this county, and crippled my back. Q. Tell the court and the jury how this accident happened. A. Well, I was going up to my son's store—he had a little store on the corner—to my home, and was walking along with my little boy seven years old alongside of me, and I went across this street with my boy along close by me. I was walking along as I always do ordinarily, as any ordinary man would; and I stepped on the edge of this loose flagstone, and it tilted with me, and my foot went down between it, and it caught that foot, and I made the other step, and it went from under me and throwed me on my back. Q. Was this stone lighted by any street lamp? A. There was a street lamp right below it, but there was a tree that stood between the light and the stone, and it made a kind of shade over the stone—a shadow. Q. Tell the court and the jury, now, the condition of that stone at that time. A. Well, the stone appeared that it laid on a pivot. Sometimes that stone would be apparently placed so that it did not rock much, and other times it went that way. (Witness indicates a rocking motion.) Q. How long had you known of this stone being in that loose condition? A. For two years. Q. In what condition was that stone the last time you noticed it prior to the time of the accident? A. Well, it appeared to be pretty solid. Q. Knowing this, will you explain to the jury just how you approached the stone to cross it that night? A. Well, I knew that the stone was a dangerous place at times, and I always looked for it, which any man would that knew the stone to be in that condition; and I came up there, walking slow, with my little boy alongside of me, and of course this shadow of the tree was there, and I stepped on this stone; and the last time I had noticed it, it was up close together, and this time it was far enough apart just to let my foot go between it. Did you look at the stone to see if it was flat or otherwise before you crossed it? Yes, sir; but I could not tell, for this shade that was over it, how it was laying. Q. What happened to you after this accident? A. I lay there and tried to get up, and could not do it until help came and gathered me up and taken me in the house. Q. Then what did you do? A. They sent for the doctor. Q. Did it cause you pain? A. Severe pain. Q. Explain to the court and the jury the character of the pain. A. It was right across the small of my back. Q. How long did that pain continue? A. Until the doctor came and injected something in my back that eased it at the present time, and then they carried me to bed. Then I suffered severe for weeks. Q. How long were you in bed? A. Between four and five weeks. Q. Then did you go about your work? A. No, sir; went around my room for quite awhile before I was able to go downstairs. Q. Then how soon did you return to your work? A. I did not return to my business until November, 1904. Q. What business is that? A. My business I am at now is frame making in the paper mill. Q. What wages do you get now? A. One dollar and twenty-five cents a day. Q. How long were you disabled from working at all? A. A year, all but about five weeks. Q. What wages did you make during those five weeks? A. Five dollars a week. Q. And that amounted to how much? A. Twenty-five dollars. Q. Why did you discontinue that work? A. It was climbing in and out the wagon, and I could not stand it. Q. What kind of work was it? A. Driving a huckster wagon, and getting in and out the wagon was too much for me. Q. Then you were idle until when? A. November 3d. Q. Was that because of disability or inability to work following this injury? A. There was nothing that I could do. Q. So that you were out of work from November 11, as I understand, 1903, until November 3, 1904? A. Yes, sir. Q. A year lacking one week? A. Yes, sir. Q. Excepting that week, what was the loss to you in wages as a blacksmith for the 51 weeks? A. That would be about $510. Q. But during that time you say you received in wages $25? A. Yes, sir. Q. And since November 3d you have been making, as I understand you, $1.25 a day, making how much per week? A. Seven dollars and fifty cents per week. Q. Which is a loss of $2.50 per week from November 3d to this time? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you know your expenses in the way of doctor's bill, medicine, etc., or nursing? A. Well, my wife she did the nursing, and as for the doctor's bill I cannot say. He did not send me my bill alone, as I owed him another bill for tending my wife. Q. Are you able to return to your business as a blacksmith? A. No, sir; and don't think I ever will be for the way I suffer with my back. Q. Did your trade as a blacksmith furnish you with steady work? A. Yes, sir. Q. Does your present occupation furnish you with the same probability of steady work and employment? A. I suppose so, if I am able to stand it. Q. How old are you? A. I was born in 1851. Q. That would make you 54 years old? A. Yes, sir. Q. In what month were you born in 1851? A. September 25th. Q. Do you know whether or not the council of Newark or any of its officers knew of the condition of this stone prior to your accident? A. No, sir; I don't know of my personal knowledge. Q. Is the stone in the same condition now that it was at the time of the accident? A. No, sir."

Other witnesses testified on behalf of plaintiff, corroborating his testimony as to the insecure condition of the footway or stone in question, and that it had continued in such condition for a year or more prior to the accident to the plaintiff; one witness testifying that by reason of the rocking motion of the stone she had slipped and come near falling. There was also testimony to the effect that the defendant town council had been notified of the defective condition of the crossing six months prior to the accident.

Argued before LORE, C. J., and PENNEWILL and BOYCE, JJ.

Josiah Marvel, for plaintiff. Chas. B. Evans and J. Harvey Whiteman, for defendant.

The defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground that the plaintiff had actual and constructive knowledge of the defects alleged to have caused the injury, having crossed over the particular crossing three or four times daily for several years before the accident, knew where the stone was, knew of its defective condition, but nevertheless stepped upon it; that he was therefore guilty of contributory negligence, and could not recover.

LORE, C. J. For the purposes of this nonsuit, we are only to determine now whether there is any evidence to go to the jury to show that the plaintiff exercised reasonable care and caution with the knowledge with which he is affected. While we do not attempt to pass upon the merits of the case or upon plaintiff's right to recover, or anything of that kind—that being for the jury—yet it does occur to the court that there is some evidence to go to the jury as to the degree of caution with which the plaintiff approached that stone, with the knowledge with which he was affected, and that therefore it is a question for the jury, and that we ought not to take it away from the jury. We therefore refuse to grant the nonsuit.

LORE, C. J. (charging the jury): Joseph L. Green, the plaintiff in this action, seeks to recover from the council of Newark, a municipal corporation of this state, the defendant, damages which he alleges he sustained on the 11th day of November, 1903, by being caught and thrown upon a footway or crossing on Chapel street, in the town of Newark, which he alleges was caused by the negligence of the defendant. The plaintiff claims that on the evening of the day named, while he and his little boy, in the exercise of due care, were walking upon the stone footway of the crossing on Chapel street, one of the stones of the footway which was unsafely bedded turned, threw the plaintiff down, and so injured him in his back and otherwise that for nearly a year he was unable to work, and that he still suffers therefrom; that the crossing was in a dangerous condition at the time of the accident, and had been so dangerous for a long time before; that the defendant knew of such condition and negligently permitted it to continue. The defendant, on the other hand, claims (1) that the footway, at the time of the accident, was in a reasonably safe condition; (2) that, even if it was in a dangerous condition, the plaintiff was fully acquainted therewith and negligently took the risk of using it as he did.

There are no difficult or contested questions of law in this case. It is our duty, however, under the prayers of the respective parties to the action, to instruct you as to certain principles of law that bear upon the case. We have been asked by the counsel for the defendant to instruct you to return a verdict for the defendant. This we decline to do. We consider that the case should be determined by the jury upon the evidence submitted, and under the charge of the court.

It is not denied that Newark is an incorporated town of this state, and that the council of Newark, the defendant, had full jurisdiction and control of the streets and crossings of the said town at the time of the accident, and that Chapel street was one of the said streets and a public highway of this county. Such streets or highways are for the use of the public, and for the public convenience. It is the duty of the persons having control of them to keep them in a reasonably safe condition, free from holes, pits, or other obstructions, so that they may be safe for the traveler, on foot or otherwise, who may use them in a lawful and careful manner. In the absence of any knowledge to the contrary, the traveler may presume that such streets or highways are in such safe condition, and in such case he is not bound to look out or search for holes or other obstructions.

On the other hand, if the traveler has knowledge of existence, nature, and character of any obstruction or danger, he is put upon his guard, and must look out for such obstruction, and take all such precautions to avoid injury therefrom as an ordinarily prudent person would take under such conditions. His care and precaution should be in just proportion to the measure of his knowledge. If, knowing the danger, he carelessly incurs risk and is injured thereby, he may not hold others accountable for the results of his own negligence, even though such others may have been jointly negligent with him. The right of the plaintiff to recover in this action is founded upon the negligence of the defendant. If there was no negligence on the part of the defendant, there can be no recovery. The burden of proving such negligence rests upon the plaintiff.

In reaching your verdict you are to be governed by the law as we have stated it in this charge. If you should be satisfied from the evidence that at the time of the accident the footway or crossing in question was in a dangerous condition, although known by the plaintiff so to be, yet that the plaintiff was injured in crossing the footway while using such reasonable care as the conditions demanded (that is, without negligence on his part), your verdict should be for the plaintiff, provided the defendant had actual or constructive knowledge of such dangerous condition. Should the evidence, however, satisfy you that the footway was then in a dangerous condition, and known to the defendant to be so, but that the plaintiff was entirely familiar with such condition, and with such knowledge carelessly and negligently saw fit to use that crossing, and was thereby injured, your verdict should be for the defendant. In such case the plaintiff would be guilty of contributory negligence and may not recover, as the law will not attempt to measure the extent of each one's contribution to the accident. If you should find that at the time of the accident the footway was in a reasonably safe condition, your verdict should be for the defendant.

Where testimony is conflicting, as in this case, the jury should reconcile such testimony, if they can; but, if they cannot so reconcile it, they should give credit to those witnesses whose apparent intelligence, truthfulness, impartiality, and opportunity of knowing the facts about which they speak, most entitle them to credit, taking into consideration all the facts and surroundings of the case. Your verdict should be based upon a careful consideration of all the testimony, and for either the plaintiff or defendant, as you may deem just.

Should your verdict be for the plaintiff, it should be for such an amount as would reasonably compensate him for expenses incurred in treating his injuries, for his bodily pain and suffering, for loss of wages incurred in the past, and for such permanent disability to earn a living in the future as may be the result of the injuries sustained by him in the accident set out in the declaration.

The jury disagreed.

STATE v. NILES.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Franklin. Jan. 29, 1906.)

1. GAME—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Acts 1896, p. 74, No. 94, as amended by Acts 1898, p. 84, No. 108, prohibiting the killing or possession of deer during the closed season and the hunting or capturing of deer by certain methods during the open season, making the possession of deer during the closed season presumptive evidence of guilt, and further regulating the hunting and shipment of deer, is not wholly repealed as to nonresidents by Acts 1904, p. 167, No. 128, providing for the granting of hunting licenses to nonresidents, regulating in certain particulars the exercise by nonresidents of the privilege of hunting and shipping game, and repealing such acts and parts of acts as are inconsistent therewith, but is only repealed in so far as it is inconsistent with the later statute. In other respects, nonresidents must conform to its provisions, and are subject to the penalties and presumptions therein prescribed.

2. SAME—NATURE OF PROPERTY.

No one can acquire an absolute property in animals feræ naturæ, but the ownership of such animals is at most a qualified one, and belongs to all the people of the state in common.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 2, Cent. Dig. Animals, § 3.]

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAWS—DISCRIMINATIONS—JUSTIFICATION.

Acts 1896, p. 74, No. 94, as amended by Acts 1898, p. 84, No. 108, prohibits any person, except in the open season, from killing a wild deer or having such a deer in his possession, imposes a fine of $100 for killing more than one deer during the open season, and requires one transporting deer to have the carcass open to view, tagged, and plainly labeled with his name. Acts 1904, p. 167, No. 128, providing for the granting of hunting licenses to nonresidents on the payment of a fee, repeals the act of 1896 as to nonresidents, in so far as it is in conflict therewith, and permits a licensed nonresident to transport the carcass of a deer by merely having a coupon attached thereto, and authorizes the imposition of a lesser fine than $100 on a nonresident for unlawfully having deer in his possession. A resident is not required to have a license in order to be entitled to hunt deer. Held, that the discriminations in favor of a nonresident are justified by the fact that the nonresident, having paid for and obtained a license, acquires a qualified property in the carcass of the animal, while the resident, who hunts without a license, acquires no such property, and consequently the legislation does not infringe the equality clause of Const. U. S. Amend. 14.

Exceptions from Franklin County Court.

Calvin B. Niles was informed against for having in his possession wild deer in the closed season. There was a judgment overruling a demurrer to the indictment, and respondent excepted. Judgment affirmed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, START, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

Lee S. Tillotson, for plaintiff. Warren R. Austin, State's Atty., for the State.

START, J. The respondent demurs to the information wherein he is charged with the offense of having in his possession two wild deer during the closed season for hunting, and with taking wild deer, contrary to the provisions of No. 94, p. 74, of the Acts of 1896, as amended by No. 108, p. 84, of the Acts of 1898, and insists that by No. 128, p. 167, of the Acts of 1904, nonresidents of this state are exempt from the penalties provided for by the act of 1896, and that he is thereby discriminated against in contravention of his rights under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. He claims that by No. 128, p. 167, of the Acts of 1904, a resident of this state is unlawfully discriminated against, in that he is by the act of 1896, as amended by No. 108, p. 84, of the Acts of 1898, prohibited from killing or having in his possession a deer during the closed season for hunting; that for killing or having in his possession, during the open season, more than one deer, he subjects himself to a fine of $100; that he is prohibited from transporting a deer during the open season without its being open to view, tagged, and plainly labeled with the name of the owner thereof, and accompanied by him; that he is prohibited, during the open season, from hunting, destroying, or capturing deer with a dog or dog kind, by the aid or use of a jack or artificial light, by the method known as "crusting," while the deer are yarded, or by the use or assistance of any snare, trap, or salt lick; and that the possession of a deer, except in the open season, is presumptive evidence that he is guilty of a violation of the provisions of section 1 of the act of 1896; while a nonresident is, by No. 128, p. 167, of the Acts of 1904, exempt from all of these prohibitions and requirements. These claims, as a whole, are not sound.

Section 1 of the act of 1896 provides that no person, except in the open season, shall pursue, take, or kill a wild deer, or have in his possession a wild deer or part thereof, so taken or killed, and that the possession of a deer or any part thereof, except in the open season, shall be presumptive evidence that the person having it in his possession is guilty of a violation of the provisions of the section. The act of 1904 only repeals such acts and parts of acts as are inconsistent therewith. The act of 1896, as amended by the act of 1898, is still in force and binding upon a nonresident, as well as a resident, of this state, except as is otherwise provided by the act of 1904. There is nothing in the act of 1904 that is inconsistent with the act of 1896, except the provision relating to the transporting of deer, the penalty for killing more than one deer, and the provision requiring a nonresident to procure a license. That part of the act of 1896, as amended by the act of 1898, which prohibits the killing or possession of a deer during the closed season for hunting, or, at any time, the hunting of deer with a dog or dog kind, by the aid or use of a jack or artificial light, by methods known as "crusting," while deer are yarded, or by the use or assistance of any snare, trap, or salt lick, remains in force; and for a violation of any of these provisions residents and nonresidents are alike punishable under the act of 1896. A nonresident's license to hunt in this state, except as is otherwise provided by the act of 1904, must be taken to be a license to do so in conformity to the general game laws of this state, and a nonresident who has in his possession, during the closed season, a deer, subjects himself to the penalty provided by the act of 1896. A nonresident, being punishable under the act of 1896 for having a deer in his possession during the closed season, is not exempt from the presumption therein provided for, which arises from such possession; and in prosecutions against him under the act of 1896 for having such possession he must overcome this presumption to the same extent that a resident is required to in a like case. The act of 1904 does not impose the same penalty on a nonresident for killing more than one deer during the open season that is by the act of 1896 imposed upon a resident for doing the same act; for that a nonresident may be fined not less than $25 nor more than $100, while a resident must pay a fine of $100. Also, a nonresident may transport the carcass of one deer by having a coupon, furnished by the fish and game commissioners, attached thereto, while a resident to do so must have the carcass open to view, tagged, and plainly labeled with the name of the owner thereof, and accompanied by him. These regulations for admitting nonresidents, on payment of a license fee, to this state for the purpose of hunting, which differ from those regulating hunting by residents of this state, who are not required to procure a license, are within the police power of the state, and do not render either act nonenforceable.

A resident is not by the acts denied his constitutional right to hunt deer under legislative regulations as to the time for doing so and the number of deer that may be killed by one person; and we cannot say that the regulations are oppressive or unreasonable. These regulations apply to a nonresident, as well as to a resident, hunter. There is nothing in the act of 1904, which provides for licensing of a nonresident hunter, that takes away the right of a resident to hunt. The regulations respecting the licensing of a nonresident hunter, which differ from those provided for a resident, relate to the license fee, the punishment, and the transportation of deer. If these discriminate against a resident, they are discriminations, which are within the police power of the Legislature to make.*

No person can acquire an absolute property in animals feræ naturæ. The ownership of such animals is, at most, a qualified one. They belong to no persons in particular. As Blackstone says (2 Com. 394): "A man may, lastly, have a qualified property in animals feræ naturæ * * *; that is, he may have the privilege of hunting, taking, and killing them, in exclusion of other persons. Here he has a transient property in these animals, usually called game, so long as they continue within his liberty, and may restrain any stranger from taking them therein; but the instant they depart into any other liberty this qualified property ceases." It follows that this qualified property belongs to all the people of the state in common, and, as Blackstone further says, " * * * that this natural right * * * may be restrained by positive laws enacted for reasons of state or for the supposed benefit of the community." Mr. Justice White, in Geer v. State of Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 16 Sup. Ct. 600, 40 L. Ed. 793, remarks that "the right to preserve game flows from the undoubted existence in the state of a police power to that end, that in most of the states laws have been passed for the protection and preservation of game, and that the power of the state to so legislate has not been questioned." He further says " * * * that the power or control lodged in the state, resulting from this common ownership, is to be exercised like all other powers of government, as a trust for the benefit of the people, and not as a prerogative for the advantage of the government as distinct from the people, or for the benefit of private individuals as distinguished from the public good." He quotes from Ex parte Maier, 103 Cal. 476, 37 Pac. 402, 42 Am. St. Rep. 129, where it is held that the wild game in a state belongs to the people in their collective sovereign capacity. In State v. Rodman, 58 Minn. 393, 59 N. W. 1098, the court said, in respect to the ownership of wild animals, that such ownership is in the state, not as proprietor, but in its sovereign capacity, as the representative and for the benefit of all its people in common. This is the doctrine of American Express Co. v. People, 133 Ill. 649, 24 N. E. 758, 9 L. R. A. 138, 23 Am. St. Rep. 641, where it is held that the ownership of game is in the people of the state, and that the power to legislate on this subject is part of the police power, inherent in each state. See Phelps v. Racey, 60 N. Y. 10, 19 Am. Rep. 140; Wheatley v. Harris, 70 Am. Dec. 259. The law upon this subject is concisely stated in Magner v. People, 97 Ill. 333: "The ownership being in the people of the state, the repository of the sovereign authority, and no individual having any property rights to be affected, it necessarily results that the Legislature, as the representative of the people of the state, may withhold or grant to individuals the right to hunt and kill game, or qualify and restrict it, as, in the opinion of its members, will best subserve the public welfare." This doctrine is fully stated in Payne v. Sheets, 75 Vt. 335, 55 Atl. 656. In State v. Norton, 45 Vt. 268, the court said: "The numerous statutes which have been passed for the protection of game and fish have been deemed necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of the constitutional right, and the court will not hold such laws unconstitutional until it is clearly shown that they are so prohibitory as to virtually deprive the inhabitants of the right secured to them by the Constitution." In State v. Theriault, 70 Vt. 617, 41 Atl. 1030, 43 L. R. A. 290, 67 Am. St. Rep. 695, a statute which authorized the fish and game commissioners, when they placed fish in a pond or stream, to prohibit fishing therein, or in specified portions thereof, for a term of years, and provided that waters when so stocked should be treated as public waters, etc., was held not unconstitutional, but as a reasonable exercise of the police power of the state.

The granting of licenses by the fish and game commissioners to nonresident hunters to kill deer within this state is within the proper exercise of the police power of the state, provided it does not discriminate in their favor and against resident hunters, without classification. Classification is essential to discrimination, and there can be no classification unless there is some difference between resident and nonresident hunters that bears a just relation to the classification. In this case a difference is found in the fact that the resident hunter has a qualified property in the deer, while the nonresident has no property whatever therein. There is a clear discrimination in the law, as has been shown, in favor of nonresidents in respect to having the carcass exposed to view, labeling, etc. But we think that a nonresident person, having paid for and obtained a license, and having killed a deer under his license, acquires such a property in the body of the animal that it may be removed from the state without its being open to view, tagged, labeled, etc. In this respect the act is not unconstitutional.

Judgment affirmed and cause remanded.

HILTON v. HANSON et al.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 27, 1905.)

1. CONTRACT—WAIVER—EVIDENCE.

A written contract may be waived either directly or inferentially, and such waiver may be proved by express direction, or by acts and directions manifesting an intent not to claim the supposed advantage, or by a course of acts and conduct, or by so neglecting and failing to act, as to induce a belief that it was the intention and purpose to waive.

2. EVIDENCE—PAROL EVIDENCE—CONTRACT—WAIVER.

Parol evidence of a subsequent waiver of any of the stipulations in a written contract, or of a right under such contract, is admissible, even when such contract is under seal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 2146.]

3. WORK AND LABOR—QUANTUM MERUIT.

When a written contract has been waived, an action of quantum meruit will lie for work and labor done.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Work and Labor, §§ 27, 29.]

4. SAME—EXPRESS CONTRACT—WAIVER—EVIDENCE.

In the case at bar, the jury found, and it is held, that the written contract had been waived, and that the plaintiff's verdict must stand.

(Official.)

Action by Herbert M. Hilton against Charles E. Hanson and David M. Parks. Verdict for plaintiff for $143.44. Motion for a new trial overruled.

Assumpsit on account annexed for services rendered in cutting, splitting, and piling wood, and for cutting and hauling logs, and for peeling hemlock bark, etc. The writ also contained an omnibus count of the common form. Tried at the December term, 1904, of the Supreme Judicial Court, Somerset county. Plea, the general issue, together with a brief statement alleging that there was a written contract duly executed between the plaintiff and the defendants upon which the plaintiff's action should have been brought, and that the action of assumpsit, as brought by the plaintiff, could not be maintained, and also alleging that the plaintiff had broken said contract, thereby damaging the defendants to the amount of $500, which said sum the defendants asked to be allowed to them against the plaintiff by way of recoupment.

Argued before WHITEHOUSE, SAVAGE, POWERS, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

Daniel Lewis, for plaintiff. Morse & Anderson, for defendants.

SPEAR, J. This is an action of assumpsit containing a count for quantum meruit, brought by the plaintiff to recover of defendants for the sum of $168.94, and interest thereon amounting to $15.20, for services rendered in cutting, splitting, and piling wood, and for cutting and hauling timber, etc. The defendants set up in defense a written contract duly executed between the plaintiff and defendants, upon which they say the plaintiff's action should have been based, and that his action of assumpsit cannot be maintained. The plaintiff admits the execution of the written contract, but says that it was waived and a new oral agreement substituted in its place, whereby he was thereafter to receive an agreed compensation as set forth in his account annexed for services rendered.

That a written contract may be waived either directly or inferentially is almost too well settled to require citation. Waiver may be proved by express declaration, or acts and declarations manifesting an intent not to claim the supposed advantage, or by a course of acts and conduct, or by so neglecting and failing to act as to induce a belief that it was the intention and purpose to waive. Peabody v. Maguire, 79 Me. 586, 12 Atl. 630. Parol proof of the subsequent waiver of any of the stipulations in the written contract, or of any right under such contract, is admissible, even when such contract is under seal. Adams v. Macfarlane, 65 Me. 152. In Blood v. Enos, 12 Vt. 626, 36 Am. Dec. 363, the court say: "It is always competent for the parties to rescind a subsisting simple contract by a naked verbal agreement to that effect, whether this was the intention of the parties is to be determined by the jury from what passed between them." Waiver is also held to be a question of fact. See Peabody v. Maguire, supra, and cases cited.

It is also well settled, when a contract has been thus waived, an action of quantum meruit will lie for work and labor done. Abbott's Trial Evidence (2d Ed.) p. 446, § 8. It is held in Greenleaf (volume 2, § 104) that the plaintiff may resort to the common counts, where the contract, though partly performed, has been abandoned by mutual consent, or where it appears that what was done by the plaintiff was done under a special agreement, but not in a stipulated time or manner, and yet was beneficial to the defendant. See, also, Munroe v. Perkins, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 298, 20 Am. Dec. 475.

But the defendants reply further and assert that, even if this is so, the plaintiff's action cannot be sustained, inasmuch as he has brought suit against the defendants jointly, and the evidence in the case shows that the modified contract, if made at all, was made between the plaintiff and only one of the defendants to the original contract without any knowledge or consent on the part of the other, and that one joint contractor cannot thus waive the original contract and bind the other to a new or modified contract.

The defendants were owners in common of the land on which the wood and timber was to be cut by the plaintiff. The legal position of the defendants, with regard to the right of one joint contractor to waive or bind the other to a new and modified contract without his knowledge or consent, may be well taken, but the plaintiff avers that the defense set up by the defendants is not warranted by the facts, and that the defendant Charles E. Hanson, instead of being without knowledge of, and not consenting to, a modified contract, was cognizant throughout the whole transaction of what was going on, of what his co-contractor was doing; that he received his share of the benefit of all the services performed by the plaintiff; and that, under all the facts and circumstances in this case, the inference is fairly warranted that the defendant Parks acted as the agent of Hanson in engaging in the new agreement with the plaintiff, and that Hanson understood and ratified all that was done in pursuance thereof. The jury found that the plaintiff was entitled to recover of the defendants for the services rendered the sum of $143.44. No ground is found in the evidence, equitable or legal, for disturbing the amount of the verdict. The case finds that the plaintiff performed services for the defendants which were worth to them $143.44 and received and appropriated the benefit of these services to their own account.

The only remaining question is whether the evidence warrants the other conclusion which the jury must have arrived at in order to find a verdict for the plaintiff, that the defendant Hanson was represented by his co-contractor Parks in negotiating the contract under which these services were rendered, or ratified the contract while they were being performed, or after they were completed. It would be practically impossible, in a case like this, to prove that one of the contractors was an agent for the other, in procuring the services of the plaintiff, by direct evidence of any specific agreement between them. It is not essential that the agency or the ratification claimed by the plaintiff should be so proved. These facts may be established by inference drawn from the other circumstances and facts connected with the case.

A ratification may be implied as from the principal's act. A. & E. Ency. of Law, vol. 1, p. 437. The acceptance of the moiety originally paid over to the co-tenant was held to be the ratification by him of the act in the other in making a shipment and consignment of goods for sale. Rogers v. White, 6 Me. 193. In this case the parties were tenants in common. A party cannot claim the property, and yet deny the agency of the purchaser. When they have claimed the property purchased, it is too late to deny the agency. Newhall v. Dunlap, 14 Me. 180, 31 Am. Dec. 45. If one joint debtor, not a co-partner, signs the name of another without authority to a promissory note, the promise of the latter to pay it with full knowledge of all the facts will amount to the ratification of an assumed authority, and the court will draw the inference that he must have known of the facts when he made the promise to pay. Waite v. Foster et al., 33 Me. 424. When an agent, without the authority or knowledge of his principal, borrows money and applies it to the payment and discharge of the legal liabilities of his principal, and the principal knowingly retains the benefit of such payment, the lender may recover therefor in an action against the principal. The principal cannot retain the benefit of the money hired by his agent, and at the same time legally refuse to pay the lender, upon the ground that the agent had no authority to borrow the money. Perkins v. Boothby et al., 71 Me. 91. It should not require a great quantity of evidence to warrant the legal inference of a duty to do what is right. In this case the rule would seem to apply. The undisputed facts show that the defendants were owners in common of the property in which the plaintiff operated; that they were jointly interested in the result of the operation; that the defendant Hanson, as well as Parks, knew what the plaintiff was doing; that he saw the plaintiff, talked with him, and personally made a partial payment to him for work performed; that he received and appropriated to his own use his share of the services rendered by the plaintiff, and had repeatedly promised the plaintiff to pay him therefor. No intimation that Hanson repudiated the action of Parks or the services done by the plaintiff was ever made until after the trial of this case. It was only after a verdict against them that they raised the defense now offered.

From all the evidence in this case, we are not prepared to say that the verdict was so clearly wrong as to warrant us in setting it aside. The case was tried upon its merits. No exceptions were taken to the rules of law given by the court. The contention of both sides was therefore properly presented to the consideration of the jury. We do not think that the inference can be properly drawn that the jury acted under a mistake, disregarded their duty, or were influenced by improper motives.

Motion overruled.

COMMONWEALTH BANK OF BALTIMORE, to Use of PRESTON, v. KIRKLAND.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 10, 1906.)

1. PLEADING — DECLARATION — INSTRUMENT SUEB ON.

Baltimore City Charter, § 312, provides that, when a cause of action is a contract, plaintiff is entitled to judgment after 15 days from the return day, unless the plea filed contains a good defense, etc.; and section 313 declares that the plaintiff shall not be entitled to judgment under the preceding section, unless at the time of bringing an action he shall file with his declaration an affidavit stating the true amount the defendant is indebted to him, and shall also file the bond, bill of exchange, promissory note, or other writing or account by which the defendant is so indebted, etc. Held, that the proceeding contemplated by such sections was a special statutory one, and must be strictly complied with in order to entitle plaintiff to judgment thereunder.

2. SAME—WRITTEN CONTRACT—FILING.

In an action on an alleged guaranty, to recover a deficiency arising on a mortgage foreclosure sale, the declaration alleged that the mortgagor covenanted to pay the debt to H. or his assigns, and that by successive assignments the debt and mortgage were transferred to P., the use plaintiff; that the debt was due from the mortgagor to P.; and that defendant guaranteed the payment of the mortgage debt in consideration of the forbearance of plaintiff, who was not the equitable owner of the debt, to enforce a mortgage for a reasonable time. Plaintiff filed as the obligation of defendant, a receipt for certain interest due on the mortgage alleged to have been signed by defendant, which recited that it was understood that he guaranteed the payment of the debt. Held, that such receipt, unexplained, did not constitute a contract by defendant to pay the mortgagor's debt, and that the filing thereof, in the absence of a denial of the signature, did not entitle plaintiff to judgment, as provided by Baltimore City Charter, §§ 312, 313.

3. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—DEBT OF ANOTHER.

A contract by which defendant was alleged to have guaranteed the payment of a mortgage debt, in consideration that plaintiff, who was not the equitable owner of the debt, would forbear to enforce the same for a reasonable time, was a promise to answer for the debt of another, within the statute of frauds.

Appeal from Superior Court of Baltimore City; Danl. Girard Wright, Judge.

Action by the Commonwealth Bank of Baltimore, to use of James H. Preston, against Ogden A. Kirkland. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

S. S. Field, for appellant. Wm. S. Bryan, Jr., for appellee.

PAGE, J. It is alleged in the narr. that by mortgage a certain Edward O. Pritchett covenanted to pay to Joseph E. Hall the sum of $3,750, three years after the 15th of April, 1890, with interest thereon at 5 per cent., payable annually, with power of sale to the mortgagee or his assigns, upon default being made in the payment of the principal or interest, at the time limited for the payment of the same or the interest thereon; that the said mortgage debt and mortgage were assigned by Hall to William T. Donaldson on the 2d of October, 1890, and by him, on the same day, to the Baltimore Building Association, and on the 12th of December, 1890, by the latter to the appellant; that afterwards, the appellant being still the holder of the mortgage and the debt secured thereby, and the appellee being the real owner of the equity of redemption, and the said mortgage being in default for the nonpayment of overdue interest, and the appellant being about to sell the mortgaged property, the appellant and appellees "in conversation" agreed together that the appellant would accept from the appellee the overdue interest and give up its right to proceed to enforce the said mortgage for a reasonable time and to demand the entire mortgage debt, and that the appellee, in consideration thereof, would guaranty the payment of the said debt, but said debt was never paid; that subsequently, the said mortgage being again in default, and the whole of the entire debt being due, the appellee having refused, after due notice and request, to pay the same, the appellant sold the property, and after applying the proceeds of sale to the said debt, there remained a balance of $2,289 still unpaid; and that subsequently, for a valuable consideration, the said bank assigned the balance of the mortgage debt and guaranty to James H. Preston, the equitable plaintiff, but the said appellee has refused to pay him the said sum due as aforesaid, though often requested so to do. Annexed to and filed with this declaration was the following paper, with an affidavit: "Office of O. A. Kirkland, Auctioneer, Rooms 104 and 105 Law Building, First Floor. C. & P. Telephone Call 960. Home Telephone Call 465-3. $93.75. Baltimore. Received, Baltimore, Mch. 6, 1900, of Mr. Ogden Kirkland, the sum of ninety-three 75/100 dollars in payment of 6 months' interest due Oct. 15, 1889, on mtge. at Cedar Heights, being same mtge. given by Edw. C. Pritchett and wife to Joseph E. Hall, and recorded in Balto. County Liber N. B. M. No. 195, folio 260. It is also understood that this interest is accepted from Mr. Ogden Kirkland with the understanding that he guarantees the payment of the said mtge. debt of $3,750. O. A. Kirkland [Seal], per J. M. Winkler." The court instructed the jury to render a verdict for the appellee, and after judgment this appeal was taken.

There were seven bills of exception, six to the rulings on the evidence, and one to the ruling of the court taking the case from the jury and refusing the prayer of the appellant. No evidence was offered to prove the execution of the alleged guaranty, filed with the narr. The important question in the case is whether the genuineness of the signature thereto is admitted by the pleadings, for the purposes of the cause. The charter of Baltimore (section 312) provides that in any suit, when the cause of action is a contract, etc., the plaintiff shall be entitled to judgment, after 15 days from the return day to which the defendant shall have been summoned, although the defendant may have pleaded, unless such plea contains a good defense, and unless the defendant, or some one in his behalf, under oath or affirmation shall state that every plea is true, and that the affiant believes the defendant will be able, at the trial, to produce sufficient evidence to support it, etc., "and if the copartnership or incorporation of any of the parties to the suit shall be alleged in the declaration and the affidavit to be filed thereto, as hereinafter provided, or if there shall be filed with the declaration in said cause any paper purporting to be signed by any defendant therein, the fact of such alleged copartnership and the genuineness of such signature, shall be deemed to be admitted for the purposes of said cause, unless the affiant knows or has good reason to believe such allegation of copartnership or incorporation to be untrue, or that such signature was not written by or by the authority of the person whose signature it purports to be." By section 313 it is further provided that the plaintiff shall not be entitled to judgment under the preceding section, unless at the time of bringing his action he shall file with his declaration an affidavit stating the true amount the defendant is indebted to him, "and shall also file the bond, bill of exchange, promissory note, or other writing or account, by which the defendant is so indebted," etc. It is clear that the proceeding contemplated by these sections, being "a special statutory one," must be "strictly complied with." Thillman v. Shadrick, 69 Md. 523, 16 Atl. 138.

The objection made here is that the paper filed with the declaration does not comply with the provisions of the statute, which requires that there shall be filed the "writing or account by which the defendant is so indebted." It is certainly not necessary under this provision to file that which is evidence only. Dawson v. Brown, 12 Gill & J. 59. Lee v. Tinges, 7 Md. 229. But the writing should show on its face at least a prima facie case of indebtedness from the defendant to the plaintiff. Now, was the paper filed with the declaration the writing "by which the defendant is so indebted." It purports to be a sealed instrument, and is signed by "O. A. Kirkland, per J. M. Winkler." It acknowledges the receipt from Ogden Kirkland, of $93.75 "in payment of six months interest due Oct. 15th, 1889, on mortgage at Cedar Heights, being same mortgage given by Edw. C. Pritchett and wife to Joseph E. Hall, recorded in Baltimore County, Liber N. B. M. No. 195, folio 260," and concludes with the following words: "It is also understood that this interest is accepted from Mr. Ogden Kirkland with the understanding that he guarantees the payment of the said mortgage debt of $3,750." It is difficult to perceive how a receipt from O. A. Kirkland to Ogden Kirkland can in any manner unexplained constitute or be evidence of an indebtedness from O. A. Kirkland to the Commonwealth Bank of Baltimore. There is no stipulation on the part of Kirkland to become indebted to that institution, and no facts are stated from which that can be inferred. The most that can be stated about it is unexplained, that O. A. Kirkland accepts the interest with the understanding that Ogden Kirkland is to guaranty the payment of the mortgage debt; but there is nothing showing to whom the guaranty was made. If the mortgage and the assignments thereof had been filed with the declaration, there might have been a clearer statement of the cause of action. But, standing alone, it cannot be regarded as the paper upon which the defendant was indebted. Unexplained by other evidence, it is unintelligible, and imposes no obligation upon anyone. It cannot be regarded as containing a promise to pay the debt of another, for the reason that the contract to do so is not stated with such certainty as that it can be understood, without reference to parol proof. Such a paper could not of itself constitute a valid cause of action, for the additional reason that it does not comply, even when taken in connection with the averment of the narr., with the requirements of the statute of frauds. It is set out in the narr. that by the mortgage one Pritchett covenanted to pay the debt to Hall and his assigns, and that by successive assignments the debt and mortgage was transferred to Preston, the equitable plaintiff. The debt was therefore due from Pritchett to the assignee, Preston, and that the defendant Kirkland "guaranteed the payment of the mortgage debt" in consideration that the plaintiff (not the equitable plaintiff) would forbear for a reasonable time to enforce said mortgage and to demand the entire mortgage debt. Such a contract is within the statute of frauds, and must be by writing and not by parol. Thomas v. Delphy, 33 Md. 373. The contract "must be stated with reasonable certainty, so that it can be understood from the writing itself, without having recourse to parol proof." "It cannot be partly in writing and partly in parol." Frank v. Miller, 38 Md. 459. Nor could proof of the other writings set out in the narr. avail the appellant in this case. Here the mortgage, certainly the writing standing alone, without the aid of the assignments thereof, together with the paper filed with the narr., could show any legal obligation on the part of Kirkland to pay Pritchett's debt to the Bank or Preston.

The plaintiff in this case having failed to comply with the provisions of sections 312 and 313, in that it did not file with the declaration the writing by which the defendant was indebted, cannot claim the benefit of the special proceedings permitted by the statute. The case of Thorne v. Fox, 67 Md. 67, 8 Atl. 667, contains nothing in conflict with this view. There the plaintiff had fully complied with the statute, but pleas were interposed which permitted the defendant under the general issue to contest everything involved in the issues except the two facts which under the pleadings had been legally admitted. Here, not having complied with the statute, the appellant can claim nothing under it. Nor can the claim be successfully made that the paper can be regarded as admitted, under the provision of Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 75, § 24, subsec. 108, that provides: "Whenever the partnership of any parties, or the incorporation of any alleged corporation, or the execution of any written instrument filed in the case, is alleged in the pleadings in any action or matter at law, the same shall be taken as admitted for the purpose of said action or matter, unless the same shall be denied by the next succeeding pleading of the opposite party or parties." There is no allegation in the narr. of the execution of any instrument. The averment is that the defendant "guaranteed the payment of the mortgage debt," but refers in no manner to the writing. There being, therefore, no legal admission of the execution of the writing, and no proof thereof, the court committed no error in rejecting it, and, there being no evidence in the case tending to establish the alleged guaranty, it was correct in taking the case from the jury and directing a verdict for the defendant. It follows, also, that the appellant's prayer was properly rejected.

Judgment affirmed.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. et al. v. RING.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 10, 1906.)

1. TRESPASS—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

In an action for trespass on plaintiff's land, causing damage to his trees, evidence that plaintiff had an offer for a piece of the property on which some of the trees were cut, and that when the purchaser found the trees had been cut he refused to take the property for that reason, was inadmissible.

2. SAME—ELEMENTS OF DAMAGE—EVIDENCE—RELEVANCY.

Where, in an action for injuries to plaintiff's land by the cutting of certain of his trees, plaintiff testified on cross-examination that he had sued another two years previously for a similar injury and had settled the case for $50, a question asked as to whether the trees then alleged to have been injured were of the value of $2,000, as alleged in plaintiff's narr. in that suit, was inadmissible to show that the damages to the trees for which the suit at bar was brought had been occasioned by cutting done by another.

3. EVIDENCE—OPINIONS—DAMAGES—INJURIES TO TREES.

In an action for injuries to plaintiff's trees, evidence of a witness' estimate or judgment of the damage in exact figures was objectionable as invading the province of the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 2285.]

4. SAME—SPECIAL KNOWLEDGE.

In an action for injuries to plaintiff's trees, it was error for the court to permit a witness to testify to the value of a tree like those injured, for wood or timber, after merely answering that he knew something about the value of such trees, without a further showing as to his knowledge of the subject.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, §§ 2217-2218.]

Appeal from Baltimore City Court; John J. Dobler, Judge.

Action by Robert H. Ring against the Western Union Telegraph Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Argued before MCSHERRY, C. J., and BOYD, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Albert R. Stewart, for appellants. Howard Bryant, for appellee.

JONES, J. This was an action of trespass quare clausum fregit brought by the appellee against the appellants. The narr. contained two counts. The first charged that the appellant corporations by their servants and agents "broke and entered a parcel of land in the possession and ownership of the plaintiff (appellee) * * * and dug up the ground, injuring shrubbery by cutting and otherwise mutilating the same, which consisted of ornamental shade and fruit trees," and the second that the appellee was possessed of a parcel of land on which "there was growing valuable ornamental shade and fruit trees," and that "the defendants (appellants) by its agents and servants cut, bruised, and injured said trees wrongfully and maliciously." The defendant pleaded the general issue pleas, and the case was tried before a jury. In the course of the trial, as appears from the record, 12 exceptions were reserved to the rulings of the trial court. Eleven of these relate to rulings upon questions raised as to admissibility of evidence, and the twelfth to the ruling upon the prayers. The fifth, sixth, and twelfth exceptions were abandoned. The others will be considered and disposed of in their order in the record.

There was error in the ruling in the first exception. The plaintiff, after proof of his ownership of the premises trespassed upon and the cutting of trees growing thereon, with a view to prove damages under the first count of his narr., "offered to prove that he had an offer for a piece of this property upon which some of the trees were cut, and that when the purchaser came to close the bargain and found the trees had been cut he refused to take the property on account of the damages to the trees. He did not want that lot because the trees were cut and mutilated in that way." And the court, against the objection of the defendant, allowed the proffered testimony to be given to the jury. The plaintiff, under this count, could only recover for damages resulting to his premises from the trespass, and as a measure of damage was entitled to show depreciation in value of the property by reason of the trespass, and as a basis for showing a depreciation he could, by competent testimony, prove the value of the property before the trespass; but it was not competent to prove value by an offer of purchase. This seems to be according to all of the authorities. In 2 Lewis on Eminent Domain (2d Ed.) § 446, it is said: "It is not competent for the owner to prove what he has been offered for his property, or what persons who have been looking for similar property were willing to give for it. * * *

As a general rule offers for property cannot be proven." The reason for this is succinctly stated in Fowler v. Co. Com'rs of Middlesex, 6 Allen (Mass.) 92-96, as follows: "The value of an offer depends on too many considerations to allow it to be used as a test of the worth of property." Among cases in point are Whitney v. Thacher, 117 Mass. 523; Wood v. Firemen's Ins. Co., 126 Mass. 316; Watson v. Milwaukee, etc., R. R. Co., 57 Wis. 332, 15 N. W. 468; Minnesota Belt Line Ry. v. Gluek, 45 Minn. 463, 464, 48 N. W. 194; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Ryan, 64 Miss. 399, 8 South. 173; St. Joseph's, etc., R. R. Co. v. Orr, 8 Kan. 419.

There was no error in the ruling in the second exception. The plaintiff as a witness upon cross-examination had testified that in July, 1902, he brought a suit against the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Company for cutting trees on his property; that said company "claimed they had some sort of paper and that is why he settled it"; and that he settled for $50. Counsel for defendants then read the declaration in said suit, which claimed $2,000 damages, and proposed to ask the witness, "Were those trees which the Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Company cut of the value of $2,000?" Upon objection by plaintiff, the court refused to allow the question to be asked. The object of the defendant's counsel was to elicit testimony going to show that the damage to the trees for which the suit at bar was brought had been occasioned by the cutting of the trees by the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Company. The question asked would elicit nothing with respect to the fact of who had done the cutting of the trees involved in the present suit; and the damages laid in the declaration which was read to the witness was no fair test of his estimate of the damages sustained by him from the cutting involved in that suit. The amount was stated in the declaration without reference to its strict, or even approximate, accuracy, most probably; and it is hardly to be supposed the witness was responsible for the statement of the narr. in that regard; or that it had been inserted as an expression of his judgment of the real damage sustained.

As far as appears from the record, we can see no error in the rulings in the third and fourth exceptions. These exceptions were taken to the refusal of the court to permit the questions therein set out to be asked. The object of the evidence sought to be elicited by the questions was the same as that referred to in disposing of the second exception, and the questions were asked of a photographer who had gone upon the scene of the trespasses in October, 1904, to obtain for the defendants pictures of the same. These pictures were exhibited in connection with his testimony and he was asked, as indicated in the third exception, "Was there, or not, an extensive cutting of the cedars around the wires running between the larger poles of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Company?" and, in the fourth exception, "State whether the wires running between the Chesapeake & Potomac poles did or did not run over the tops of the trees." The relevancy of the evidence here sought to be elicited to the situation existing in 1902, the time of the alleged trespass here sued for, is not perceived, in the absence of anything to show or an offer to show the connection or relation between that and the situation in 1904, when the observation of the witness was taken.

There was error in the seventh and eighth exceptions with respect to the rulings therein set out. In the seventh exception a witness had testified that he knew the plaintiff's premises and the trees to which the suit had relation; that he had seen the trees had been cut—three walnuts and some cedars; and that the trees had been injured by the cutting. In the seventh exception, it appears he was then asked: "Give to the jury an estimate of the damage that was done to them. Whether they were your trees or the trees of anybody else, * * * what was the actual damage done to those trees by their being cut as you saw them?" Against the objection of the defendants, the witness was permitted to give in exact figures his estimate or judgment of the damage. It was the function of the jury to give this estimate or judgment. The witness could go no further than to give the facts within his knowledge that has caused injury, and the fact that damage had resulted. This was ruled in Balto. Belt R. R. Co. v. Sattler, 100 Md. 306, 59 Atl. 854. The ruling there was made as to the evidence offered through a witness examined as an expert—a class of witnesses forming an exception to the rule excluding opinion evidence; and it was said in the course of the opinion: "Strictly speaking, perhaps, no witness, whether expert or not, should be allowed to draw from the facts the conclusion that the property is damaged, for the jury are quite as competent to do that as the witness. But we believe the practice in this state has been otherwise, and witnesses, who are acquainted with the property and have observed the effects of the alleged tort, have been generally allowed, after giving the facts to the jury, to testify to the fact of damage." Then, after saying that the object for which the jury is sworn, if they find there is damage, "is to find the extent of it measured in dollars and cents," it is said: "To allow the expert to give such testimony not only puts him in the place of the jury, but permits him to indulge in mere speculation. Witnesses who are competent for that purpose may testify to the value of the property before and after the alleged injury. But it by no means follows that the injury is the sole cause of the diminution, if any exists. Whether it is or not, or to what extent, is for the jury, and not the witnesses, to determine." The opinion concludes as follows: "It was error to have permitted experts to give their opinions as to the fact, as well as to the exact amount, of damage." If, therefore, the evidence set out in the exception now under consideration was intended to be offered as from an expert witness, nothing more needs to be said than that it is within the ruling of the case just cited. If the witness of whom the question objected to was asked was not intended to be qualified as an expert, then the evidence offered was not within the exception to the general rule which excludes opinion testimony—a rule the limits of which, it is intimated in the opinion just cited, ought not to be enlarged, and which we may here say is a most salutary one in its operation as a restraint upon testimony which otherwise too often would be the result more of bias, recklessness of statement, and mere speculation than of judgment calmly and intelligently applied to relevant facts. In the eighth exception the witness, having given his estimate of damage as $500 under the ruling last referred to, was asked to "tell the gentlemen of the jury how you [he] arrived at that," and proceeded, not using the facts in the case as a basis of judgment, or making reference to such facts at all, to give as a basis of the opinion expressed matters and considerations altogether speculative and hypothetical. The objection to this testimony should have been sustained.

The witness to whom the interrogatories embraced in the seventh and eighth exceptions were put was further asked, "Do you know anything about the value of the walnut tree as a tree for wood or timber?" and answered, "I do," and was then asked, "What is that?" and was permitted to state such value. This question was objected to, and forms the subject of the defendants' ninth exception. The witness should have been interrogated further, and required to show his knowledge of the subject of inquiry, before being allowed to give the values he was asked about.

The rulings in the tenth and eleventh exceptions are disposed of by what has been said in respect to that in the seventh exception. The question objected to and forming the subject of the tenth exception was: "Now tell the gentlemen of the jury what was the sound value—what was the amount of damage done to the trees in money." And that of the eleventh exception was: "Tell the gentlemen of the jury what was the actual damage they did in your opinion." Both of these questions were allowed, and in this there was error, for the reasons given in considering the seventh exception.

For the errors pointed out in the several exceptions, the judgment below must be reversed.

Judgment reversed, with costs to the appellants, and new trial awarded.

SCHAUMLOEFFEL v. STATE.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 10, 1906.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—LIMITATION OF PROSECUTIONS—FALSE PRETENSES.

The offense of obtaining money by false pretenses, with intent to defraud, is a misdemeanor punishable, at the discretion of the court, by fine or imprisonment or by confinement in the penitentiary, and is not, therefore, within Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 57, § 11, providing that no prosecution or suit shall be commenced for any fine, penalty, or forfeiture, or any misdemeanor, except those punishable by confinement in the penitentiary, unless within one year from the time the offense was committed.

2. SAME—WITNESSES—DISCLOSURE.

Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 27, § 440, provides that in an indictment for false pretenses it shall not be necessary to state the particular false pretense intended to be relied on in proof of the same, but the defendant, on application before trial, shall be entitled to the names of the witnesses and a statement of the false pretenses to be given in evidence. Held, that such section did not limit the state to the introduction only of such witnesses as were disclosed by the list furnished defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1416, 1428.]

3. FALSE PRETENSES—VARIANCE.

Where defendant was charged with obtaining by false pretenses "$1,800 current money," proof of obtaining the money by means of a check, which defendant deposited in the bank and drew the proceeds, was not a fatal variance.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. False Pretenses, § 53.]

Appeal from Criminal Court of Baltimore City; Pere L. Wickes, Judge.

T. Julius Schaumloeffel was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Thomas C. Weeks, for appellant. George A. Solter and Attorney General Bryan, for the State.

BRISCOE, J. The appellant was indicted and convicted in the criminal court of Baltimore of obtaining money by false pretenses, and was sentenced to the Maryland penitentiary for the period of five years. From this judgment he has appealed.

The indictment was filed on the 20th of June, 1904, and contains three counts. A motion to quash the first and a demurrer to the second count were sustained at the trial of the case. There is no objection raised to the rulings of the court upon these pleadings, and they will not be considered by us.

The third count of the indictment, and the one upon which the appellant was tried, is as follows: "That T. Julius Schaumloeffel, late of the city of Baltimore, on the 30th day of July, 1901, by a certain false pretense by him then and there made to Otto Bregenzer, with intent then and there to defraud, he, the said T. Julius Schaumloeffel, then and there well knowing the said pretense to be then and there false (which said false pretense was not then and there a mere promise for future payment, and was not then and there a mere promise for future payment not intended to be performed), unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly did then and there obtain from Otto Bregenzer eighteen hundred dollars current money, of the value of eighteen hundred current money, of the goods and chattels, moneys, and property of Otto Bregenzer." To this count the appellant interposed the plea of limitations, that the alleged misdemeanor was not committed within one year next preceding the commencement of the prosecution. The state demurred to the plea, and the demurrer was sustained. There were eight exceptions taken during the trial to the rulings of the court upon the admissibility of evidence. There was no error, we think, in the ruling of the court in sustaining the demurrer of the state to the plea of limitations. The offense of obtaining money by false pretense with intent to defraud is a misdemeanor, to be punished, at the discretion of the court, by fine and imprisonment or by confinement in the penitentiary for not less than two years nor more than ten years, as the court shall award. By article 57, § 11, of the Code of Public General Laws, it is provided that no prosecution or suit shall be commenced for any fine, penalty, or forfeiture, or any misdemeanor, except those punished by confinement in the penitentiary, unless within one year from the time of the offense committed. Misdemeanors punished by confinement in the penitentiary are excluded from the provisions of this section of the statute, and are placed along with felonies. They are not barred by limitations, if not prosecuted within one year from the time of the offense committed. The authorities hold that it is the liability to punishment, and not the punishment actually inflicted, which controls the jurisdiction of the court. In re Mills, 135 U. S. 263, 10 Sup. Ct. 762, 34 L. Ed. 107; People v. Murphy, 185 Ill. 623, 57 N. E. 820.

The questions raised on the exceptions may be considered together and can be disposed of without discussing them seriatim. The fifth and sixth exceptions present the identical question, and that is whether the state, on a trial for false pretenses under the statute, can call other witnesses than those furnished in the list by the state's attorney to the defendant. The statute (section 440, art. 27, of the Code of Public General Laws) provides that in any indictment for false pretenses it shall not be necessary to state the particular false pretenses intended to be relied on in proof of same; but the defendant, on application to the state's attorney before the trial, shall be entitled to the names of the witnesses and a statement of the false pretenses to be given in evidence. And in Jules v. State, 85 Md. 305, 36 Atl. 1027, this court said: "The office of a bill of particulars like this is, first, to inform the defendant of the names of the witnesses the state expects to call; and, secondly, to furnish him with a statement of the false pretenses intended to be relied on and given in evidence. It is no part of the pleading, cannot be demurred to, but must be excepted to if insufficient." There can be no good reason for holding the rule here sought to be enforced to be mandatory and not directory. The statute requires the list to be furnished, but does not restrict the state's attorney to the list, nor does it control or affect the competency of the witness. In Gardner v. People, 3 Scam. 83, where a similar rule was under discussion, it was said: "If such a construction were placed upon this statute as would exclude all persons whose names were not indorsed on the indictment, many offenders would go unpunished, not on account of their own innocence, nor of the negligence of the state's attorney, but by a defect in the law itself, or a narrow and illiberal construction of it not sanctioned by reason or justice. We think, therefore, that the prosecution is not confined to the list of witnesses indorsed on the indictment, but furnished previous to the arraignment; but the circuit court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, and having a strict and impartial regard to the rights of the community and prisoner, may permit such other witnesses to be examined as the justice of case may require."

There was no error in the rulings of the court in admitting the evidence set out in the second, third, and fourth exceptions. It was evidence tending to establish the theory of the state's case, and was admissible as part of the res gestæ.

The first, seventh, and eighth exceptions contain the rulings of the court in admitting in evidence the $1,800 check given by Bregenzer to the appellant. The ground of the objection is that, as the indictment charged the obtaining "of eighteen hundred dollars current money," the check did not tend to prove the averment of the indictment. The statute (section 112, art. 27, of the Code of Public General Laws) under which the appellant was indicted provides that any person who shall by any false pretense obtain from any other person any chattel, money, or valuable security, with intent to defraud any person of the same, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. The indictment, it will be seen, charges that the appellant obtained "eighteen hundred dollars current money." The bill of particulars alleges the false pretense to be "that on or about the 20th day of May, 1901, the appellant knowingly and falsely represented to Bregenzer that one Harris Flinder was the owner of certain property and that he desired to borrow the sum of $1,800 and give as security therefor a mortgage on said property, that the appellant knew that Flinder was not the owner of the property, and that by virtue of the false representation Bregenzer was induced and did pay to the appellant the sum of $1,800. The question, then, is whether a charge of obtaining by false pretense "eighteen hundred dollars current money" can be sustained and supported by proof of obtaining the money by the check for a like sum. It is well established that certainty to a reasonable extent is an essential requirement of criminal pleading, where conviction is to be followed by penal consequences. One of its objects is notice to the party of the nature of the charge, so as to enable him to defend against a second prosecution of the same crime by pleading a former acquittal or conviction. We do not see, under our statute (section 112, art. 27, of the Code of Public General Laws), how the admission of the check in evidence could be held a variance. The proof in the record shows that the check was given by Bregenzer to the appellant for $1,800, was deposited in bank to the credit of his account, and the proceeds subsequently paid or check-ed out by him. The check was, therefore, the means by which the money was procured, and was, within the meaning of the act, obtaining money under false pretenses.

We therefore find no error in the ruling of the court in admitting the evidence contained in the first and seventh exceptions, nor in its refusal to strike out the testimony as to the Bregenzer check, in the eighth bill of exceptions. For the reasons given the judgment will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

STANDARD OIL CO. v. HARTMAN.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 10, 1903.)

1. HIGHWAYS—USE OF HIGHWAY—COLLISIONS BETWEEN TRAVELERS—NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Evidence in an action for injuries received by a traveler on a highway in a collision with a vehicle of another traveler examined, and held, that the question of defendant's actionable negligence was for the jury.

2. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Evidence in an action for injuries received by a traveler on a highway in a collision with the vehicle of another traveler examined, and held, that the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence was for the jury.

3. SAME—CARE REQUIRED IN USE OF HIGHWAY.

The right of one driving on a highway to use any part of the highway must be exercised with reference to the rights of others, and one driving a heavy wagon, necessarily slow in being changed from its course in an emergency, ought to take such part of the highway as will afford to lighter vehicles the opportunity of passing it without colliding with it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 25, Cent. Dig. Highways, §§ 459-465.]

4. SAME—ACTION FOR INJURIES IN COLLISION—RECOVERY—NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

A traveler on a highway, injured in a collision with the vehicle of another traveler, is entitled to recover for the injuries received, in case they resulted directly from the want of ordinary care on the part of the latter, and not from his own want of ordinary care directly contributing to the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 25, Cent. Dig. Highways, § 470.]

5. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action for injuries received by a traveler on a highway in a collision with the vehicle of another, defendant has the burden of proving contributory negligence on plaintiff's part.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 25, Cent. Dig. Highways, §§ 472, 473.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Queen Anne County; William R. Martin and Edwin H. Brown, Judges.

Action by Nancy G. W. Hartman against the Standard Oil Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Roger W. Cull and Phil. B. Hopper, for appellant. W. T. Warburton, for appellee.

JONES, J. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in the court below against the appellant, at the suit of the appellee, for damages resulting to the appellee by reason of the alleged negligence of the appellant, which the narr. charges as follows: "That it [the appellant] is the owner of large wagons or oil tanks, used in the transportation and delivery of its oils and driven by its servants upon the public roads of the county in the prosecution of its business; that on the 21st day of December, 1903, the plaintiff, while driving on the Elkton and Chesapeake City public road to her home, exercising due care, the servant or servants of the defendant [appellant] having in charge one of its said teams, while acting within the scope of his employment, carelessly and negligently drove the same against and over the carriage in which the plaintiff [appellee] was riding," and caused her to be thrown out and injured. To this the defendant pleaded the general issue, and trial was had before a jury, during which no questions arose upon the evidence. Upon the proofs submitted in the cause the plaintiff (appellee) asked three instructions to the jury, and the defendant (appellant) four, and filed special exceptions to the plaintiff's first prayer, alleging absence of proof to support it. The court below granted all the prayers of the plaintiff, overruled the defendant's special exceptions to plaintiff's first prayer, rejected the defendant's first prayer, and granted its others. The defendant excepted to this action of the trial court in respect to the granting of the plaintiff's prayers and the overruling of its special exceptions and the rejection of its first prayer. This exception presents the questions to be determined here.

The defendant's first prayer, as it appears in the record, is too general, and was properly rejected on this ground, if no other. This we understand to be admitted. This is not material, however, because substantially the same question is raised by the special exceptions to the plaintiff's first prayer. If that was properly granted, then the defendant's first prayer, which affirmed the insufficiency of the plaintiff's evidence to support a recovery by the plaintiff, was necessarily to be rejected. The question thus raised will make necessary a reference to the evidence adduced by the plaintiff to sustain the action. As to some of the material parts of this there is no conflict with that of the defendant. Where such conflict occurs a question is presented falling exclusively within the province of the jury.

The plaintiff's first prayer in general terms affirms the right of the plaintiff to recover if the jury should find that the injury complained of was caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants while acting within the scope of their employment and driving its team upon the public highway, and "resulted directly from the want of ordinary care and prudence" on the part of such servants, "and not from the want of ordinary care and prudence on the part of the plaintiff directly contributing to the injury." The second prayer put upon the defendant the burden of proof to show contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff directly contributing to produce the injury complained of, to disentitle the plaintiff to recover on the ground of such negligence; and the third instructed as to the measure of damages in the case of a finding for the plaintiff. There is evidence in the record going to show the following facts: About 6 o'clock in the evening of December 21, 1903, the appellant's (defendant below) servant, in the prosecution of its business as a manufacturer and vender of oil, was driving a wagon belonging to the appellant on the public road in Cecil county running between the town of Elkton and Chesapeake City. The wagon was large and heavy, weighing from 3,000 to 3,200 pounds when empty, and was drawn by three horses driven abreast. It was a 5-foot truck, with the singletrees projecting from 12 to 20 inches past the hub on either side, making it thus to require a space of about 7 feet in passing along the road. The outside horses traveled outside of the tracks of the wheels. The wagon was being driven from Chesapeake City to Elkton. Near the latter place and at the point of the accident there was a down-grade in the road, and the road was there 28 or 29 feet wide. All of it could be used at this point. There was so special traveled way. On the right-hand side of the road going from Elkton, and the left-hand side approaching Elkton from Chesapeake City—the direction in which the wagon was being driven—there was a whitewashed board fence. The wagon, at the point and the time of the accident, was being driven so far to what was the left side of the road, when going from Chesapeake City to Elkton, that it was not possible for a buggy to pass between the wagon and the board fence. There was no reason making it necessary for the wagon to be on that side of the road. It could have been driven in the middle of the road, when there would have been plenty of room for a buggy to have passed on either side. The road from Elkton out beyond the place of accident was much traveled. "It is the main road leading out of Elkton to all points in the lower part of the county. Teams are on it continually"—says one witness. There is more travel on it than on any road leading into Elkton, and this travel continues all day and the early hours of the evening. The servants of the defendant had used the road frequently and for a considerable time and were familiar with it and with the conditions. The night of the accident was unusually dark, and the darkness was increased at the place of the accident by conditions existing there. The wagon had displayed no lights, and no means were provided to give warning of its approach. On the day and at the hour mentioned the appellee (plaintiff below) was driving to her home from Elkton on the road in question. She was in a buggy, and driving a horse that was old and safe to drive, and which could not be urged to much speed. In driving she kept to what was the right side of the road going out from Elkton, the direction she was traveling. At the place of the accident in question she met the wagon of the defendant coming in the opposite direction, and, as has been shown, being driven upon the same side of the road upon which the plaintiff was driving. She was prevented by the darkness from seeing it until too close to it to avoid colliding with it. Immediately upon becoming aware of the approach of the wagon she pulled her horse to the right; but at the same instant the two vehicles came into collision, and the plaintiff was thrown from her buggy and injured, and the buggy was broken and damaged. There was evidence that the plaintiff was familiar with the road from driving over it frequently, and some from which it could be inferred that she kept to the right side of the road in driving over it on the occasion in question because she thought that the safe and proper thing to do. In the foregoing summary of the evidence in the case there is enough appearing to be submitted to the jury on both branches of the inquiry involved in the plaintiff's narr.; that is, as to negligence vel non on the part of the defendant's servants, and as to the exercise of ordinary prudence and care on the part of the plaintiff in the circumstances leading up to and attending the accident in question.

In the briefs in the case and in the oral argument there has been a good deal of discussion as to the effect to be given, in determining the question of negligence, to what is affirmed to be the law of the road—that persons in using the public highways must observe the rule of keeping to the right, with a view to secure to all unobstructed and safe passage over the same; the theory of the plaintiff apparently being that the court can and ought to take judicial notice of such rule and apply the same to the conduct of parties in the given case, while it is contended on behalf of the defendant that the court cannot take notice of nor give effect to the rule, unless it be proved as a custom. It is further contended on behalf of the defendant that, though the rule is to be applied in determining the questions indicated, the road can be used indiscriminately by persons passing over it until confronted with and made aware of the necessity for a change of course or of their position thereon. In other words, it is only when persons proceeding along the road from opposite directions are meeting that it is necessary or required to observe the rule of going to the right, that each may have free passage. Consequently it is argued that it is not to be imputed to the defendant as negligence in this case that its team, at the time of the accident in question, was being driven upon the left, instead of the right, side of the road. We do not deem it necessary in this case to pursue the inquiry thus raised. If it be admitted that the servants of the defendant had the general right, in driving upon the road, to be with its vehicle upon any part of the same that for the time might suit their convenience or pleasure, this right was not an absolute and unqualified one. All other persons having occasion to use the highway would be entitled to the same right, and such right must of necessity be exercised by each and every one with reference to and regard for the rights and safety of every other. It is not consistent with the rights and safety of others using a highway that a vehicle, such as is described as being in charge of the defendant's servants, should be driven over the same, in the conditions mentioned, without so regulating its position upon the road as to give such reasonably convenient opportunity as circumstances permitted for other vehicles to avoid collision therewith, or to have adopted and used some means of giving warning of its presence and approach. The wagon of the defendant was heavy and cumbersome, drawn by large and heavy horses, three abreast. It was necessarily slow in being changed from its course, and could not be so changed, in an emergency, readily and quickly. If it had been kept in the middle of the road, which there is evidence going to show could readily have been done, opportunity would have been afforded to lighter vehicles, susceptible of quick change and movement in their course, to have gone to either side of the road that the situation made most practicable to escape collision with it. It would have been but prudent, too, that a vehicle of that character, occupying the space that it did in proceeding along the highway in the darkness described, and where the frequency of travel was such as it is shown to have been, should have displayed some symbol or warning of its presence.

Our conclusion is that it was entirely proper that the case should be submitted to the jury and that the instructions for their guidance which were made the subject of exception were proper. It has not been thought necessary to extend this opinion by taking up for review the many authorities cited on both sides of the argument and briefs. An examination of them has not developed any peculiar features appropriate to be applied here. In each and all of them there seems to have been only the application of the familiar principles of the law of negligence to the facts of the particular case. The judgment below will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed, with costs to the appellee.

ZELL v. BALTIMORE STOCK EXCH. et al.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 10, 1906.)

EXCHANGES—SEATS OF MEMBERS—SALE—RESULTING TRUST.

The constitution of a stock exchange provided that every member on the day of his admission should sign the constitution of the exchange and pledge himself to abide by the same and all subsequent amendments on penalty of forfeiture of his seat, and also declared that the seat of a member might be sold by the exchange, and the proceeds applied to the member's contracts, debts, or obligations with or to other members of the exchange, to the exclusion of other creditors of the member. Held that, where complainant furnished the money with which to purchase a seat in the exchange in the name of his partner, complainant was not entitled to restrain a sale thereof, for the payment of his partner's individual debts to other members of the exchange in accordance with such provisions of the constitution, on the ground that his partner held the title to the seat in trust for complainant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 21, Cent. Dig. Exchanges, §§ 8-10.]

Appeal from Circuit Court No. 2 of Baltimore City; J. Upshur Dennis, Judge.

Suit by Edwin S. Zell against the Baltimore Stock Exchange and others. From a decree dissolving an injunction restraining the sale of a seat of a member, complainant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, SCHMUCKER, PEARCE, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Frank Gosnell, for appellant. W. Burns Trundle, for appellees.

JONES, J. This case originated in a bill of complaint filed by the appellant here in circuit court No. 2 of Baltimore city, in which he alleged that on or about the 1st day of June, 1899, he purchased from Owen Daly, one of the appellees here and one of the defendants below, a seat or membership in the Baltimore Stock Exchange, and paid therefor the sum of $4,250; that for the sake of convenience the said membership or seat was placed in the name of Frank J. Merceret, with whom, about the time of said purchase, he had formed a partnership for the purpose of carrying on a general brokerage business in stocks and bonds, it being understood and agreed that the said Frank J. Merceret should transact the business of the firm on the Baltimore Stock Exchange; that without the knowledge or consent of the appellant said Merceret speculated in stocks and bonds upon his own account with the other individuals who are named as appellees, and in consequence became indebted to them in the sums specified in the bill; that in January, 1905, the said Merceret received from the said appellees notification by letter that they could no longer carry for him said indebtedness. Payment thereof was requested, and proceedings threatened in case of his failure to make such payment; that at the time the debts mentioned were contracted by Merceret the said appellees and each of them knew that the transactions giving rise to them were had solely on the individual account of the said Merceret and without the knowledge or consent of the appellant; that the said appellees knew that the seat or membership in the said stock exchange was not the property of Merceret, though standing in his name, but was the property of the appellant, and that any dealings that the said appellees or any of them had with Merceret were on his individual credit, and the said debts were not contracted with reference to the said seat or membership; that the appellant had addressed to the said appellees a letter to that effect in which he referred to the letter of the said appellees to said Merceret and called their attention to his claim that, though the seat in question was "colorably" in the name of Merceret, it was the appellant's individual property, having been paid for by him, which he averred had all along been well known to each and all of the said appellees and informing them that he would claim and maintain his rights in the premises; that according to the constitution and by-laws of the Baltimore Stock Exchange, which was made defendant below and is one of the appellees here, "a seat or membership owned, belonging to, and the property of, a member thereof, may be sold by" it, "and the proceeds of said sale applied to the contracts, debts or obligations with or to other members of the exchange to the entire exclusion of the other creditors of such member"; and a copy of the said constitution and by-laws is filed as an exhibit with appellant's bill. The bill then charges that it is the intention of the appellees, who are the creditors of Merceret, to apply to the Baltimore Stock Exchange to make sale of the seat or membership of the same, belonging to the appellant, as he claims, but standing in the name of Merceret, and apply the proceeds thereof to the payment of the debts due to such creditor appellees unless they be restrained, etc. The bill then prays an injunction to so restrain them and the stock exchange from such action. A preliminary injunction was granted. The appellees, except Merceret, promptly filed answers to the bill and moved for a dissolution of the injunction. The appellees, who were creditors of Merceret, as well as the Baltimore Stock Exchange, each and all denied in their answers that they had any personal knowledge of the partnership between the appellant and Merceret or the terms thereof; or that, at the time the debts referred to in the bill of complaint were contracted, they knew that they were so contracted by Merceret without the knowledge and consent of the appellant; and denied that the seat or membership of the said stock exchange referred to in the bill was not the property of Merceret. On the contrary, they averred "that all the right, title, and interest therein, under the constitution and by-laws whereby membership was created, was and could only be in the said" Merceret. Testimony was taken upon the motion to dissolve the injunction, and the testimony of each of the said appellees was practically to the same effect as their answers in respect to their said respective denials. Upon the hearing of the motion, the preliminary injunction was dissolved. The appeal is from the order dissolving the same.

Prior to the dissolution of the injunction, the appellee Merceret had answered the bill under leave of court, but it is not material to refer particularly to such answer. The appellant himself testified as a witness, as follows: "I told Mr. Daly I was going to purchase a seat on the Baltimore Stock Exchange. Had he one for sale? I was so informed by Merceret. He said he had. I asked the price—$4,250. He said it would cost $50 to have the seat transferred. I wanted to pay for that seat then and there, and he said he could not accept the money until Merceret was elected a member; that the seats were sold subject to admission." And again he said in his testimony: "I told Mr. Daly I wanted the seat to be known as my property; that I was buying it. Mr. Daly told me it could not be arranged to be known as my property, that they recognized the board member, the man in whose name the seat was. Mr. Badart was present when I told Mr. Daly, and Mr. Orrick was present." It would seem to be obvious, upon this state of allegation and proof, that the rights of the parties before the court must depend upon the effect to be given to the constitution, by-laws, rules, and regulations of the stock exchange adopted for the government of its membership and defining and fixing the rights, privileges, and obligations attaching to membership therein. The stock exchange is a voluntary association governed by such constitution, by-laws, rules, and regulations as it may choose to adopt, and which, so far as not contrary to law or public policy, will secure to the members thereof exclusive rights and privileges which the courts have fully recognized. The constitution and by-laws of the Baltimore Stock Exchange are in evidence in this case. The one having more particular reference to the controversy here has been substantially set out in the appellant's bill, and is the one against the enforcement of which the injunction is here sought. Only one other will be specially referred to, which is as follows: "Every member shall, on the day of his admission and notification thereof by the secretary, sign the constitution of the exchange, and thereby pledge himself to abide by the same, and all subsequent amendments thereof under penalty of forfeiture of his seat." The conditions under which a seat or membership may be sold by the stock exchange in enforcement of the obligations of its members are provided for in its constitution; and there is no pretense here that the stock exchange is proceeding, or intends to proceed, in respect to enforcing the obligations incurred by Merceret, except in accordance with the provisions of its constitution applicable to the case. Now will the court interfere?

A case very analogous to the case at bar is that of Thompson v. Adams, 93 Pa. 55, in which it appeared that the plaintiff gave to Samuel A. Richards, who was a partner with William E. Thompson in the business of stockbrokers, the sum of $1,000 to purchase a seat in the board of brokers. The seat was purchased by Richards, and he continued to hold it by plaintiff's permission, without knowledge on part of the board of any other ownership or title, until his death in May, 1876. At that time he was indebted to various members of the board in the sum of $5,477.17. Under a section of the constitution of the board of brokers, when a member died, his seat might be sold by the secretary; and, after satisfying the claims of the members of the board, the balance should be paid to the legal representatives. The seat was sold. The question was whether the plaintiff was entitled to the proceeds or any part either in full or pari passu with the creditors of Richards. The court below denied the right of the plaintiff to, or to participate in, the proceeds of the sale. On appeal the judgment below was affirmed, and the court said "The constitution and articles of a voluntary association, such as the Philadelphia Board of Brokers, are law as to the members. The plaintiff was not a member, but had furnished the money by which Richards obtained a seat. His contention is that he was the equitable owner of the seat, and had title to that which was received for it, and that the defendant had no right to apply the proceeds to debts due by Richards to other members in pursuance of the terms of the constitution of the club. But why not? Richards was the member of the board, the legal owner of the seat, and the plaintiff an entire stranger unknown to the association. The members gave credit to each other in part, no doubt, upon the faith of the liability of a member's seat to them for his debts. There is nothing unlawful or unreasonable in the regulation. The seat is not property in the eye of the law. It could not be seized on execution for the debts of the members. It is the mere creature of the board, and, of course, was to be held and enjoyed with all the limitations and regulations which the constitution of the board put upon it." It is sought to distinguish the case at bar from the one just referred to, in that the plaintiff there was a stranger to the exchange and not a partner with the member in whose name the seat stood. It is not perceived how the circumstance of a partnership of a member of the exchange with another who is not a member can make any difference in principle as to his relations to the exchange. Being a partner with an outside party is nothing more than having a contract with such party subsisting at the same time with his contract with the exchange. He is under an obligation to observe his contracts and engagements with each party; and there can be no reason why his contract or obligations with the exchange and its members are to be subordinated to those he may have with others, whether they pertain to a partnership or otherwise. It would be impossible for a voluntary association to maintain its organization and enforce, on behalf of its members, rights pertaining to membership if this were to be so.

It is further argued that there was not, in the case cited, any evidence to show that the other members of the exchange had any knowledge of the plaintiff's equity. It has already been seen what the state of the testimony here is as to the facts upon which the appellant rests his equity; but, be that as it may, it is the exchange—the whole body of the membership—that has control, and the right of enforcement, of its laws and rules in the interest of each and all of its members; and such organization would be shorn of its function if the exercise of such right and control was to be affected by particular equities that might be made to appear in the relations of individual members, as individuals and not as members of the association, with outside parties.

There seems to be no want of harmony in the authorities as to the validity and contractual effect of the rules and regulations of a voluntary association of the character of the one here in question. In another case, very much in point (Hyde v. Woods, 94 U. S. 523, 24 L. Ed. 284), the Supreme Court of the United States had under consideration a rule of a stock exchange which read as follows: "In sales of seats for account of delinquent members, the proceeds shall be applied to the benefit of the members of the board exclusive of outside creditors, unless there shall be a balance after payment of the claims of members in full." And the court, in giving effect to such rule in the particular case, said, speaking through Mr. Justice Miller: "That rule entered into and became an incident of the property when it was created, and remains a part of it, into whose hands soever it may come. As the creators of this right—this property—took nothing from any man's creditors when they created it, no wrong was done to any creditor by the imposition of this condition." The same court, in a later case (Page v. Edmunds, 187 U. S. 596, 23 Sup. Ct. 200, 47 L. Ed. 818) having before it more particularly the question of how far a seat in a brokers' exchange was to be treated as property, while holding in apparent disagreement with the dictum in the Pennsylvania case, to which it referred that the seat was property, said undoubtedly it "was to be held and enjoyed with all the limitations and restrictions which the constitution of the board chooses to put upon it." In the recent case in this court of Baltimore City v. Johnson, 96 Md. 737-744, 54 Atl. 646, 61 L. R. A. 568, a similar view was expressed of the tenure of a seat in a stock exchange, after a review of many authorities—reference being had there more particularly to the taxable quality of such seat—where this court said, through Judge Boyd: "It is thus apparent that, while a membership in the exchange is in a sense property, it is qualified and limited and lacks one of the most valuable and usual characteristics of property—the right of disposing of it as the owner deems proper, so long as he violates no law."

In view of the doctrine and principles thus enunciated and defining the nature of the holding of a seat in a stock exchange, it cannot avail the appellant to say, nor for the court to hold, in the circumstances of this case, that a resulting trust accrued to him, as he claims by the payment of the money which purchased the seat or membership here in question, for, giving him the benefit of the theory which he sets up, what was purchased was not a clear, unfettered title to the seat, but one burdened with the obligations that membership in the exchange put upon the member holding it and subject "to be held and enjoyed with all the limitations and restrictions which the constitution of the board chooses to put upon it." The bill in the case does not allege, nor does he attempt to show, that he will not get this. As in no view can he get any more, there was no error in refusing the relief asked, and the order of the lower court dissolving the injunction will be affirmed.

Order affirmed, with costs to the appellees.

GOTTSCHALK v. MERCANTILE TRUST & DEPOSIT CO.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 10, 1906.)

1. APPEAL—MATTERS REVIEWABLE—DISCRETIONARY ACTION.

While an appeal will not lie from an order or decree passed in the exercise of the discretion of the lower court, yet the question whether the subject-matter of the order or decree is within such discretion is open to examination upon an appeal in the suit in which the decree is passed.

2. TRUSTS—ADMINISTRATION—SUPERVISION BY COURT.

Where trustees administer their trust without seeking the aid and protection of the court, they may exercise the discretion and execute the powers conferred on them without interference from the courts, so long as they act in good faith and with fair discretion; but, if a court of equity by an appropriate decree assumes jurisdiction of the trust and directs the execution thereof under its direction, the trustees must secure the sanction or ratification of the court for the successive steps taken in their administration of the trust.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 47, Cent. Dig. Trusts, §§ 230-232.]

3. SAME—DEPOSIT OF FUNDS.

Where a will creating a trust authorized the designated trustees, or whoever might be a trustee under the will, to sell, lease, exchange, or otherwise dispose of any part of the trust property, and to make any investments and reinvestments of such property that they might think proper, and jurisdiction over the trust was duly assumed by a court of equity, it was within the power of the court to select a depository for the current balance of cash funds.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 47, Cent. Dig. Trusts, §§ 230-232.]

4. SAME—REVIEW.

An order of a court of equity, passed in the exercise of its jurisdiction in supervising the administration of a trust fund, selecting a depository for current cash funds, was discretionary in its nature, and not subject to appellate review.

Appeal from Circuit Court of Baltimore City; Henry D. Harlan, Judge.

Suit by the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company against Joseph Gottschalk. From an order selecting a depository for trust funds, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, SCHMUCKER, and BURKE, JJ.

Wm. Pinkney Whyte, for appellant. Edwin G. Baetjer, for appellee.

SCHMUCKER, J. This is an appeal from an order of the circuit court of Baltimore City designating the banks in which the appellant and appellee, as joint trustees under the will of the late Albert Gottschalk, should deposit the cash funds of the trust estate from time to time in their hands. The appellee insisted that the order of the circuit court is not reviewable on appeal, because it was an interlocutory and discretionary one. It is not necessary at this late day to cite authorities in support of the well-settled doctrine that an appeal will not lie from an order or decree passed in the exercise of an undoubted discretion of the lower court. But the question whether the subject-matter of the order or decree was within the area of the discretion of the court which passed it is open to examination upon an appeal in the same case, for a court cannot improvidently extend the exercise of its discretion to matters which lie beyond its legitimate reach. In re Farmers' Loan Co., Petitioner, 129 U. S. 206, 215, 9 Sup. Ct. 263, 32 L. Ed. 656; Cecil v. Negro Rose, 14 Md. 68, 69.

The appellant does not deny the soundness of these propositions, but contends that the will of Mr. Gottschalk conferred upon the trustees of his own selection the discretionary power of selecting a depository for the trust funds, and that this discretion did not pass from them to the circuit court as an incident of its supervisory jurisdiction over the administration of the trusts in this case. The fundamental question, therefore, presented by the record, is whether the order appealed from was passed in the exercise of an undoubted discretion of the circuit court. Albert Gottschalk, by his last will and codicils, admitted to probate on October 18, 1898, gave the bulk of his estate, valued at more than $1,000,000, to his son Joseph and the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company of Baltimore, in trust for the benefit of his wife and children, as therein set forth. During the continuance of the trusts thus created the trustees were directed to collect the income arising from the trust property, and make disposition thereof in accordance with the terms of the will. One of the codicils to the will provided that in the event of the death of the testator's son Joseph his other son, Levi, should be substituted in Joseph's place as trustee, and in the event of the death of both of them a majority of the devisees and legatees of the will, counting them per stirpes, should have the power to appoint a successor to act with the trust company, and should also have the power from time to time to fill in like manner any vacancy occurring in the trusteeship. By the eighteenth clause of the will the testator conferred upon the trustees powers of management of the estates committed to their charge, as follows: "I further provide that the said trustees or whoever may be trustee or trustees hereunder shall have and they are hereby invested with full powers and authority during the continuance of any of the trusts under this will to sell absolutely and in fee simple on such terms as they may see fit, to demise and lease for ninety-nine years renewable forever or for any other term, to exchange, transfer, convey, assign and dispose of all or any part of the property hereinbefore described and of the property which by increase, substitution or reinvestment, may at any time be held by such trustees so long as the same may be held by them under the provisions of this will, and also to make any investments and reinvestments of said trust property which they may think proper, and also to make, execute and acknowledge any deeds, leases or instruments of writing whatever which may be necessary or proper for the execution of the powers hereby granted." By the same clause of the will the investments and reinvestments of trust funds were required to be made and held under the trusts of the will, and purchasers and other persons are relieved from obligation to see to the application of purchase money or other money that may be paid to the trustees.

While the personal estate of the deceased was in process of administration in the orphans' court the testator's son Levi Gottschalk filed a bill of complaint in the circuit court of Baltimore City against the trustees under the will, and the parties interested in the trust estate as beneficiaries, praying that the court assume jurisdiction of the trusts of the will, and that they be administered under its direction and supervision. Both the trustees and the cestuis que trust acquiesced in the prayer of the bill, and a decree was passed by consent by which the court assumed jurisdiction of the trusts and directed them to be executed under its supervision. Some time thereafter, on the 18th of July, 1894, the Mercantile Trust Company, one of the trustees under the will, filed a petition in the case in which the trusts were being administered, asking the court to designate some depository or depositories for the uninvested current funds of the estate. The trust company, in this petition, after referring to the creation of the trust and the assumption of jurisdiction of its execution by the court, stated that its co-trustee, Joseph Gottschalk, had been depositing to the joint credit of the trustees the cash trust funds from time to time coming to his hands, consisting of principal awaiting investment and income awaiting distribution, and at times amounting to from $50,000 to $100,000, in the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, which allowed 8 per cent. interest on the balance of the account; that the petitioner, believing that so large a current deposit ought not to be maintained except with the authority and under the direction of the court, had applied to its co-trustee to unite with it in a report of such deposit to the court, and an application to it for instructions in reference to the deposit, but he had declined to unite in such an application, saying that there was no occasion to make it. The petition also alleged that the petitioner had deposited to the joint credit of the trustees the cash trust funds, from time to time coming to its hands, in the National Bank of Baltimore, which allowed 2 per cent. interest on the balance of the account, which the petition averred was a fair current rate of interest for such deposits. It further alleged that Joseph Gottschalk, its co-trustee, objected to the deposit in the said National Bank on account of the low rate of interest allowed by it, and had always suggested the deposit of the entire fund in the Fidelity & Deposit Company, and for the purpose of enforcing his objections had recently refused to sign a check on the account in said bank to be used in payment of the distribution of certain income which had been deposited therein. The prayer of the petition was for an order of court (1) instructing the trustees with reference to their deposit in the Fidelity & Deposit Company, and designating some depository or depositories for the funds of the estate, and (2) approving the deposits of trust funds made by the petitioner in the National Bank of Baltimore. Joseph Gottschalk the other trustee, who is the present appellant, answered the petition, admitting the deposit by him, as alleged, of the current funds of the trust estate in the Fidelity & Deposit Company, and his refusal to recognize the deposit of any of the trust estate funds in any National Bank, and asserting, in justification of his action, that the testator in his lifetime had kept his account in the Fidelity & Deposit Company, and that the estate would suffer serious loss by accepting a lower rate than 3 per cent. interest on the large sum which, from the size of the estate and the nature of the trusts, would currently be on hand in cash. He also insisted in his answer that the Fidelity & Deposit Company was a thoroughly reliable corporation, and that by the terms of its charter, guardians, receivers, and others having the custody of bonds, securities, or money were authorized to deposit the same with it for safe-keeping. He further answered that all of the beneficiaries of the estate, save one, who was in Europe, had united in a letter to his co-trustee, protesting against accepting less than 3 per cent. interest on the trust funds while a responsible company was willing to allow that rate for them. The issue made by the petition and answer having come to a hearing, and the parties having failed to act upon a suggestion from the court that they try to agree, subject to its approval, upon depositories for the trust funds, the order appealed from was passed on August 4, 1905, approving the deposits which had been made pendente lite in the National Bank of Baltimore, but directing the trustees to deposit all trust funds, then in, or thereafter to come in, their possession or control, in one or two of the three prominent national banks which were named in the order, but did not include the National Bank of Baltimore.

We think the circuit court, in passing this order, acted within its jurisdiction, and in the exercise of well-recognized discretionary power. If trustees undertake to administer their trust without seeking the aid and protection of any court, they may exercise the discretion and execute the powers conferred on them by the instrument creating the trust, and equity will not generally interfere with them, so long as they act in good faith and with fair discretion. But if, upon their application, or that of their cestuis que trust with their assent, a court of equity, by an appropriate decree, assumes jurisdiction of the trusts, and directs them to be executed under its direction and supervision, the authorities agree that the situation of the trustees is thereby in so far changed that they must thereafter secure the sanction or ratification of the supervising court for the successive steps of their administration of the trusts. Perry on Trusts, § 474; Lewin on Trusts (11th Ed.) p. 753. This court recently had occasion to consider the effect, upon the extensive and important powers conferred by the will of the late Arunah S. Abell on his sons as trustees, of the assumption by a court of equity of jurisdiction of the trusts of that will. It was said in that case: "All apprehension, if any exist, as to the arbitrary exercise of the very large discretionary powers given to the trustees, may now be dismissed. For the trustees themselves, recognizing the great difficulty and delicacy in performing some of the duties imposed upon them, have voluntarily subjected themselves to the jurisdiction of a court of equity. And whatever their powers may be under the will, if the trusts created thereby are before such a court, and a decree has been made, the powers of the trustees are thenceforth so far changed that they must have the sanction of the court for all of their acts.' 2 Perry on Trusts, § 474 and authorities there cited."

The precise area and limits of the jurisdiction acquired by a court of equity over the administration of a trust thus subjected to its supervision have never been fixed, but must necessarily depend to some extent upon the nature of the trusts and the character of the powers conferred upon the trustee. It may, for instance, be doubted if a court of equity would, except under very special circumstances, compel a trustee to execute a power which the instrument conferring it declared should be exercised by him or not, according to his own volition, or at his own discretion. Thus, in Tempest v. Lord Camoys, 21 Ch. Div. 571, the will gave to two trustees power, "in the exercise of their absolute discretion," of selling real estate and investing proceeds in other real estate. It also gave them power, "at their absolute discretion," to raise money by mortgage for the purchase of real estate. The trust being in process of administration, under the supervision of equity, the court refused to compel one of the trustees, against his own judgment, to unite with the other trustee in mortgaging the real estate, and with the proceeds of the mortgage and other trust funds making a proposed purchase of other real estate. Nor does a court of equity ordinarily, in any form of proceeding, control the exercise by a trustee or other fiduciary of a special power strictly personal in its nature, such as the power sometimes given to a parent, who is a life tenant or a trustee for his children, to determine the proportions in which the trust fund is to be divided between them, or at what age they shall receive their respective shares of the estate absolutely, or whether the income shall be paid over to them or expended by their trustee for their support and maintenance. Thus, in Addison v. Bowle, 2 Bl. Ch. 618, the will gave to the testator's son-in-law, William Bowle, an estate for his life, with power to designate in his discretion any one or more of his children by the testator's daughter to take the remainder in fee, stating that this uncertainty of designation among the children was intended as a motive of good conduct in them all. Chancellor Bland held that the discretion was to be exercised arbitrarily by the father because of the nature of the power.

The present case is, however, not, strictly speaking, one of the control by the court of the exercise of a power conferred by the will upon the trustees. The will, although conferring on the trustees general powers of disposition of trust property, contains no express power touching the selection of a place of custody or deposit for funds temporarily in their hands. Furthermore the powers which are granted by the will for the management of the trust are in no sense personal to the trustees named in that instrument, for they are conferred in terms upon "the said trustees or whoever may be trustee or trustees hereunder." The real question in this case is whether the trustees, while administering their trust under the supervision of a court of equity, should procure its sanction or ratification for so material and important a step of that administration as the selection of a depository for their large current balance of cash trust funds. The selection here was not about to be made under any express or personal power vested in the trustees, but it was an act incidental to the administration of the trust, and discretionary in its nature. The theory of the judicial supervision of the administration of trusts certainly contemplates securing the authority or approval of the court for all important transactions requisite to the proper management and custody of the funds of the estate. We are of opinion that the subject-matter covered by the order appealed from was within the jurisdiction of the circuit court.

We also think the order was discretionary in its nature, and it is therefore not subject to be reviewed by us on appeal. It is essential to the successful supervision by courts of equity of the administration of trusts that matters of detail, incident to the administration, which must be regulated by the exigencies of the situation out of which they arise and the circumstances of the particular case, rather than by propositions of law, should be under the discretionary control of the supervising court. The selection of a depository for the trust funds, although an important matter in the present case by reason of the large amount of current funds, is after all a detail of the administration of the estate. It might, for a variety of reasons, be found desirable to promptly make a change in the depository from time to time, and in selecting one the highest rate of interest allowed on deposits should not be the only, nor necessarily the best, criterion by which to make the choice. There was an especial propriety in the passage of the order appealed from, because of the positive conflict of views and action between the two trustees who failed, when afforded an opportunity to do so, to unite in the recommendation of one or more depositories for approval by the court. It is proper to say that there is nothing in the record or the briefs in this case in any manner reflecting on the integrity or financial soundness of any of the institutions mentioned in the proceedings. The order appealed from will be affirmed, and the case remanded.

Order affirmed, with costs, and case remanded.

SHIPLEY v. MERCANTILE TRUST & DEPOSIT CO. et al.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 10, 1906.)

1. WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—RULES.

In construing a will, words and expressions used therein are to be taken in their ordinary grammatical sense, unless, upon so reading them in connection with the entire will or upon applying them to the facts, an ambiguity arises, in which case the primary meaning of the words may be modified, extended, or abridged, and the intention of the testator, as collected from the entire will, with the aid of proper extrinsic evidence, will be effected, even against the literal sense of particular words and expressions.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 974.]

2. WITNESSES—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENTS.

Under Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 85, § 2 as amended by Laws 1904, p. 1168, c. 661, providing that in actions by or against executors, heirs, or devisees of a decedent, in which judgments or decrees may be rendered for or against them, no party shall be allowed to testify as to any transaction with or statement made by the decedent, a wife cannot testify in a suit involving the construction of the will of her deceased husband to conversations with her husband in which he stated what her interest under the will would be.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, § 664.]

3. WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF TESTATOR.

Declarations of testator as to the meaning of the words used in his will are inadmissible on the issue of the proper construction of the will.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 1027.]

4. SAME—EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE—WHEN ADMISSIBLE.

Extrinsic evidence cannot be resorted to in construing a will, in the absence of some ambiguity or difficulty of construction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 1022.]

5. SAME—CONSTRUCTION OF PARTICULAR WORDS—DOWER AND THIRDS.

A will creating a trust provided for the division of the trust estate into shares and the conveyance of the shares to the beneficiaries "free and discharged from the trust, but subject to the dower and thirds of my said wife." A subsequent clause devised a certain share of the trust fund to a trustee, "subject to the dower and thirds aforesaid of my said wife." A codicil provided for the capitalization of the widow's dower and thirds by an agreement between her and the trustee according to the standards and valuations recognized by courts of equity, and a later codicil, in repeating the provision for the widow, stated that the trust fund should be subject to the widow's dower and thirds during her lifetime. Held, that by the widow's dower and thirds was meant a third interest for life in the real property and an absolute third interest in the personal property, and the will could not be so construed as to entitle the widow to an absolute third interest in both real and personal property.

6. DOWER—ASSIGNMENT—RIGHTS OF WIDOW.

Where a husband devises his estates to others subject to his widow's dower, the widow cannot be deprived, by any provision of the husband's will or by any decree of court, of the right to have her dower assigned, if she elects to exercise that right.

7. SAME—WAIVER OF RIGHT.

Where a will devised testator's estates to a trustee subject to the widow's dower, and provided for the disbursement of the trust estate from dower by an agreement between the widow and the trustee, neither the widow's consent to the assumption of jurisdiction by the court over the administration of the trust, nor her declaration in her answer filed in proceedings relating to the trust of a willingness to free the estate from dower, could be regarded as a waiver of her right to have her dower assigned in case no agreement as provided for in the will was arrived at between her and the trustee.

8. SAME—COMPULSORY ASSIGNMENT—PERSONS ENTITLED—TRUSTEES.

Where a will devised an estate in trust subject to the widow's dower, and provided for the disbursement of the trust estate from dower by an agreement between the widow and the trustee, the trustee had the right, in the event of the failure to come to an agreement with the widow, to pray for an assignment of dower.

9. TRUSTS—ADMINISTRATION—DISCRETION OF TRUSTEE.

A will devising an estate in trust, subject to the widow's dower, authorized the trustee to agree with the widow for the capitalization of dower and to set apart property equal to the dower as capitalised, and to assign the same to the widow as her absolute property, or to sell any part of the trust property and pay the widow the capitalized value of her dower, or to average with her by payment of part in money or part by conveyance of property or both as should be deemed advisable. Held, that the disbursement of the estate from the widow's dower in the mode provided by the will was left to the discretion of the trustee, to be exercised to the best interests of the cestui que trust.

Appeal from Circuit Court of Baltimore City; Henry D. Harlan, Judge.

Suit by the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company, as trustee under the will of Charles S. Shipley, deceased, and another, against Ida R. Shipley, individually and as executrix of Charles S. Shipley, deceased, and others. From the decree rendered, defendant Ida R. Shipley appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BOYD, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, and BURKE, JJ.

Wm. Pinkney Whyte, for appellant. D. K. Este Fisher and Thomas G. Hayes, for appellees.

PEARCE, J. The record in this case is accompanied by numerous and elaborate briefs in behalf of the various parties in interest, but the principal question presented is a narrow one. The case originated in a bill filed in the circuit court of Baltimore city by the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company, as trustee under the last will and testament of Charles Shipley, deceased, and by Stephen George Shipley, one of the beneficiaries under said will, against Ida R. Shipley, widow of Charles S. Shipley, in her individual capacity and as executrix of the said Charles Shipley, and also against numerous other parties, beneficiaries under said will, praying the court to assume jurisdiction over the administration of the trusts created by the will and over the exercise of the powers conferred thereby upon the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company of Baltimore, as trustee under said will, and particularly over the division of the rest and residue of the estate of said Charles Shipley, and to direct said trustee in the execution of said trusts and powers. The will and the three codicils thereto are very voluminous, covering 14 pages of the printed record, and disposing of a large estate; but it will be sufficient for the purposes of this case to say that after making certain bequests and devises which are not drawn in question here the testator devised and bequeathed all the rest, residue, and remainder of his estate to the said Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company, in trust to divide the same equally into as many shares as he should have children living at his death, and children deceased leaving issue at his death; such issue to represent per stirpes the shares of their deceased parents, and, to facilitate such division, authorized said trustee to sell such parts of said rest, residue, and remainder as it should deem necessary to effect such division. He further directed that one of these equal shares should be conveyed and transferred by said trustee, "free and discharged from the trust (but subject to the dower and thirds of my said wife in said rest, residue and remainder which said dower and thirds, as also like dower and thirds in all the other shares I hereby give, devise and bequeath unto her) unto each of my children living at my death, other than to my daughter, Mary A. Shiebler, my son, Stephen George Shipley, my daughter Sarah N. Dulaney and my daughter Ruth Peregooy Hood." The testator left surviving him the above-named four children, and also three other children, J. Lester Shipley, Mary A. Choate, and Joseph D. Shipley, but no issue of deceased children, and the three last-named children are provided for in the clause above quoted. By subsequent clauses in said will one other equal share of said rest and residue was devised and bequeathed "subject to the dower and thirds aforesaid of my said wife" to the said Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company, in trust for each of the children first above named. In the first codicil to said will he made the following provision: Whereas the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company of Baltimore, will, as trustee, take the several parts of the residue of my estate, subject to the dower and thirds of my wife; if it shall so happen that she is willing to capitalize and convert her dower and thirds, and receive the value thereof according to the standards and valuations recognized by the courts of equity in Maryland, either before or after the trustee makes the division of the residue of my estate. I authorize the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company of Baltimore, as trustee, to make the division, or as trustee under said several trusts, to agree with her for such capitalization, and to set apart property real or personal, or both, equal at a valuation to be fixed by said company, with her consent, to her capitalized dower and thirds in such portion and to assign, convey and deliver the same to her as her absolute property, or I authorize said company to sell any parts of the trust property, and provide money to pay her the said capitalized value of her dower and thirds, or to average with her by payment of part in money and part by conveyance of real or personal property, or both, as may be deemed advisable." The bill alleged that no agreement had been effected between the trustee and the widow for the capitalization of her dower and thirds as authorized by said codicil, and "that, in order to make any of the rest and residue of the testator's estate marketable, it was necessary to relieve said rest and residue from her claim for dower and thirds by the exercise of said power, or by having the same set off to her in the manner provided by law, which the plaintiffs are advised can be done in these proceedings." The bill then specifically prayed "that the rest and residue of the estate of the testator may be disencumbered of the dower and thirds of his widow, the said Ida R. Shipley, either by the exercise of the power conferred upon the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company of Baltimore for that purpose, or by setting off the same to her as provided by law."

The material part of the answer of Ida R. Shipley to the plaintiffs' bill will appear from the following extracts from said answer: "And in further answer to the said fourth paragraph she says: That it is plain that each share of the rest, residue, and remainder of his estate, when divided, shall be conveyed and transferred by the trustee, free, clear, and discharged of her dower and thirds unto certain of the children in the said will mentioned; but that he gives, devises, and bequeaths by his said will in each and every one of the shares of the rest, residue, and remainder, the dower and thirds of this respondent Ida R. Shipley, wife of the testator. That she claims it is the duty of the trustee, and all interested in the said estate, to have a true construction of the said will, as to the meaning of the words 'dower and thirds' of his estate, which words this respondent affirms are often explained to her by her late husband as meaning one-third of the whole rest, residue, and remainder of his estate, and she invokes the action of this court most respectfully in that regard. Moreover, she insists, before any other administration of the estate, it is the duty of the trustee to value the said several parts of the residue of the testator's estate and to capitalize and convey to her said 'dower and thirds' and to agree with her for such capitalization and to set apart property, real, personal, or both, equal, to a valuation to be fixed by said company and with her consent, to her capitalized 'dower and thirds' in said portion, and to assign, convey, and deliver the same to her, as her absolute property, or to make an agreement with her for such capitalized value of her 'dower and thirds' upon the terms set forth in said will. (5) That in answer to the fifth paragraph no effort has been made to enter into an agreement to pay or satisfy this respondent in regard to the dower and thirds' claimed under the will of her late husband, for the reason that there has been no offer of an agreement between the trustee and herself in regard to the meaning of words 'dower and thirds' in the will, as she understands them. * * * (7) That this respondent believes that the statement of paragraph 7 in regard to persons interested under said will is truly stated in the said bill of complaint. That she assents to the assumption by this court of jurisdiction over the administration of the trust by the said Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company of Baltimore. That she is ready and willing, when a proper construction is made by this court of the words in the will of 'dower and thirds' to this respondent in the rest and residue of his estate, to consent to the disbursement of the rest and residue of the estate of the said testator of the said 'dower and thirds' of this respondent. That she denies the right of the trustee to petition for a sale, free of her dower, of the said lots described in the bill of complaint, because she claims a 'dower and thirds' in the whole rest and residue, meaning one absolute of the whole of said property. And, now, having answered all the allegations in the bill, she prays to be hence dismissed with her reasonable costs, etc. Ida R. Shipley, Defendant."

The court assumed jurisdiction over the administration of the trusts by decree reserving for further consideration all other relief sought by the bill. A subsequent decree was also passed, under an agreement of the parties for the sale of certain portions of the property, and this also reserved for future determination all questions concerning the manner of relieving the testator's estate from the widow's dower and thirds, and all questions raised by her concerning the true interpretation of the expression, 'dower and thirds,' employed in the will and codicils. Testimony was taken in behalf of the widow's contention, and after hearing Judge Harlan passed the following decree, from which this appeal is taken: "Decree, filed 27th September, 1905: This cause, coming on for a further hearing, was argued by counsel for the respective parties, and the pleadings and evidence and the exceptions filed thereto having been read and considered by this court. It is thereupon adjudged, ordered, and decreed by the circuit court of Baltimore city this 27th day of September, 1905, that all the exceptions filed to the admission in evidence of the testimony of Mary O. Burwell and Ida R. Shipley, filed in this cause, be, and the same are hereby, sustained. And it is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that by the true construction of the said last will and testament and codicils the said testator employed the expression 'dower and thirds' in its ordinary technical sense, and that by virtue thereof the said Ida R. Shipley is entitled to an estate for her life, and not absolutely in one-third of all the real estates of inheritance of the testator embraced in the rest and residue of his estate, excepting that described and devised in and by the second item of the third codicil, and the ground, rents, and reversions mentioned and devised in and by the third item of said third codicil to the said trustee, in trust for her for her life; and that she is entitled absolutely to one-third in value of all the personal estate of the testator embraced in the rest and residue of his estate, which shall remain after the payment of his just claims against him, excepting the subversions, stocks, and bonds, bequeathed by the third item of the third codicil to the trustee, in trust for her for her life. And it is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that by the said provision for capitalizing and converting said dower and thirds with the consent of the said Ida R. Shipley it was the intention of the testator if she should consent to the capitalization and conversion thereof, either before or after the division of the rest and residue of the testator's estate (and if the trustee should determine to exercise the powers conferred upon it in connection therewith), that the real and personal estate, respectively, in which she would be entitled to the dower and thirds, to be capitalized and converted, should be valued separately by the said trustee, with her consent, and that she should be entitled to receive as her absolute estate, in lieu of dower in said real estate, not more than one-seventh nor less than one-tenth of the said value of said real estate, according to her age, health, and condition; and that the said trustee should have power to pay to her the capitalized value of her dower, so ascertained, in money or in property, real or personal, or partly in money and partly in property, and, if paid to her in whole or in part in property, that said property should be taken by her at a valuation to be agreed upon between her and said trustee, and that she should be entitled to receive, as her absolute property, in satisfaction of her thirds in said personal estate, one-third in value of said personal property, to be paid to her in like manner, in money or in property, real or personal, or partly in money and partly in property, and that for the purpose of effecting said capitalization and conversion and payment the said trustee should have the power to sell and convey free of dower and thirds any of the real and personal estate of the testator in which the said Ida R. Shipley should be entitled to dower and thirds. Henry D. Harlan."

The cardinal question in the case is the meaning of the words "dower and thirds" as used by the testator in the second clause of the seventh item of the will, and in the first and third codicils; the appellees claiming that they were employed in their ordinary technical sense, and that Mrs. Shipley was entitled under the terms of the will and codicils to a life estate in one-third of the residuary real estate, and to one-third of the residuary personal estate absolutely, excepting the residuary real and personal estate mentioned in the second and third items of the third codicil; while she claims to be entitled to the one-third of each the shares of the residuary estate for division among the seven children. The rule which governs the construction of wills has been well stated as follows in Beach on Wills, § 300: "In construing a will, the words and expressions used are to be taken in their ordinary, proper, and grammatical sense, unless upon so reading them in connection with the entire will, or upon applying them to the facts of the case, an ambiguity or difficulty of construction, in the opinion of the court, arises, in which case the primary meaning of the words may be modified, extended, or abridged. Notwithstanding the foregoing rule, the intention of the testator, which can be collected with reasonable certainty from the entire will, with the aid of extrinsic evidence, of a kind properly admissible, must have effect given it, beyond and even against the literal sense of particular words and expressions." We regard this rule as stating the legal principles applicable to the construction of will as favorably to the agreement of the appellant as any law-writer or judge has done, and she has accordingly sought to introduce evidence to sustain her contention as to the meaning of the words in question as used in this will. Miss Burwell, an intimate friend of Mr. and Mrs. Shipley for many years, testified to conversations with the testator, in which he told her how he had provided by his will for his wife, and that he said "she was to have one-third of everything he possessed, and that he had fixed it so; and, so that I could understand him, he said, 'If my estate was $9,000 she is to get $3,000 in cash, and if it was $30,000 she would get $10,000'—that it was all to be capitalized, and she was to have one-third of everything, and have it in money." Mrs. Shipley also testified that her husband told her: "'One-third of everything I have is yours. I have made my will to that effect. The whole estate is to be capitalized and you are to get one-third of the whole estate.' And he used this illustration to me to explain how I got my one-third of the whole estate: that if it yielded $9,000 when capitalized, I was to get $3,000 in money." Objection was made to the competency of Mrs. Shipley as a witness, and exceptions were filed to the whole of the testimony thus offered from these two witnesses, and these objections were sustained in the decree.

It cannot be doubted since Acts 1904, p. 1168, c. 661, amending section 2 of article 35 of the Code of Public General Laws, that Mrs. Shipley was not a competent witness; the proceeding being one against devisees and distributees of a decedent in which judgment or decree must be rendered for or against them, and she being a party to the cause not called to testify by any party in the opposing interest. Nor do we think the evidence of either of these witnesses, consisting, as it does, solely of the declarations of the testator as to the meaning of the words used in the will, is of a kind properly admissible in any event. In Redfield on Wills, vol. 1, p. 540, it is said: "The declarations of the testator, whether made before, contemporaneously with, or subsequent to the making of the will, cannot be received to affect its construction. This has been repeatedly decided by the American courts. The declarations of the testator after making his will of his purpose and intention therein are not admissible in evidence to control or explain it." In Weston v. Foster (Mass.) 7 Metc. 297, the court said: "This principle is of such universal application and lies so much at the foundation of all rights of property depending upon written evidence that it scarcely seems requisite to multiply cases here." In Shreve v. Shreve, 43 Md. 398, extrinsic testimony had been taken under a commission, and was not excepted to in the court below. This court said: "That testimony consists of parol declarations by the testatrix after she had made the will, as to its effect and her intentions in executing it, and like proof as to what interpretation had been placed upon it by the devisees, the court in the partition case, and the commissioners who divided the estate." It was contended that, as it was not excepted to, it must be allowed its full force as held in respect to evidence not objected to in Gibbs v. Gale, 7 Md. 76. But the court said, through Judge Miller: "All this testimony was clearly inadmissible to affect the construction of the will or the rights of the infant defendants. * * * and, as these do not appear to have been represented by counsel at the taking of the testimony or the hearing of the case when exceptions should have been filed, it would be an unreasonable extension of the doctrine in Gibbs v. Gale to apply it to this case, and we must therefore construe this will by the light afforded by the paper itself." In adhering to this rule, we have no reference to that class of cases described in the Walston's Lessee v. White, 5 Md. 305, in which it was said extrinsic evidence may be resorted to for the purpose of determining the object of a testator's bounty, or the subject of disposition, or the physical quantity of interest intended to be given by the will.

But it must be remembered that in no event can extrinsic evidence be resorted to in construing a will, except where upon reading the words questioned in connection with the entire will, or upon applying them to the facts in the case, there arises in the opinion of the court an ambiguity or difficulty of construction, and we cannot perceive that any such exists here. The words "dower and thirds" in themselves have each a uniform, established meaning, both in law and in common usage; the former meaning a widow's life estate in one-third of the inheritable real estate of which the husband was seised during coverture, and the latter meaning her absolute estate in one-third of her husband's personal property remaining after payment of his debts. It is needless to cite authorities for these definitions. In Underhill & Strahan on Interpretation of Wills, p. 5, it is laid down "that a testator who uses words which have an intelligible, conventional meaning is not to be held as having used the words with any other meaning, unless the context of the instrument shows that he intended to do so." We have carefully examined this entire will with a view to discovering any provision or expression sustaining Mrs. Shipley's contention that the testator used these words as convertible terms, and meant thereby one-third absolutely of all the residuary real and personal estate, but we can discover nothing. On the contrary, the natural and ordinary meaning of these words appears to harmonize with the whole context. In disposing of the rest and residue of his estate, he was disposing of both real and personal estate, in the former of which she was entitled to dower, and in the latter to thirds. He devises and bequeaths equal shares of this residue to his seven children, to some directly, and to trustees for others, but in all cases subject to the dower and thirds of his wife; that is, subject to her dower in the real estate, and to her thirds in the personal estate. If he had designed to give her one-third absolutely of all his real and personal estate, would he not naturally and inevitably have devised and bequeathed to her one-third of his whole estate, and then have devised and bequeathed the remaining two-thirds to his children? Would any lawyer, or would any layman even, with such a design, have resorted to such a circuitous and clumsy device for effecting so simple and plain a purpose? Looking to the will alone, we think there can be no doubt that he used the words "dower and thirds" in their ordinary technical sense. Coming to the provision made in the first codicil for the capitalizing and converting of her dower and thirds so as to receive the value thereof according to the standards recognized by courts of equity in Maryland, the view which we have expressed is strengthened and confirmed. If she was to have one-third absolutely of both real and personal, there would be nothing to capitalize or convert, nothing to which the standards of valuation recognized by courts of equity could be applied, or upon which any agreement as to valuation, between herself and the trustee, could operate. But, if she was to have the technical dower and thirds, the will and codicil are in harmony in these provisions; and there is opportunity for capitalizing, for the application of equity standards of valuation of dower, and for the conversion of a larger limited, into a smaller, absolute estate. Finally, in the third codicil, in repeating the provision for his wife, the testator says: "The shares of the said residue to be divided after my death, during the life time of my wife shall all be subject to her dower and thirds as stated in said will." This is the last declaration of the testator upon that subject, and there can be no mistake as to its import. We therefore fully agree with the lower court as to the meaning of the words "dower and thirds" and as to the estate taken by Mrs. Shipley under the will.

There remains for consideration that part of the decree which directs "that for the purpose of effecting said capitalization and conversion and payment, the said trustee should have the power to sell and convey free of dower and thirds any of the real and personal estate of the testator in which Mrs. Shipley should be entitled to dower and thirds." In her answer to the bill she assents to assumption by the court of jurisdiction over the administration of the trusts by the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company. She also declares her readiness and willingness, when a proper construction is made by the court of the words "dower and thirds," to consent to the disbursement of the residue of the estate from her dower and thirds, though she alleges no effort has been made to enter into any agreement to pay or satisfy her in regard thereto, and she expressly denies the right of the trustee to petition for a sale free of her dower in the lots described in the bill of complaint.

The argument for the appellant upon this branch of the case we think is founded upon the assumption that the bill prays for a sale free of dower, without her consent, and that the decree authorizes such a sale; but this we think is not the true construction of the bill or of the decree. If it were, we could not hesitate to hold that a widow cannot be deprived, by any direction of the testator who has devised his estates to others, subject to her dower, nor by any decree of court, of the right to have her dower assigned, if she elects to exercise her right. Neither her consent to the assumption of jurisdiction over the administration of the trusts, nor her declaration of her willingness to free the residue from her dower after the construction of the words "dower and thirds," can be regarded as a waiver of her right to have her dower assigned, if no agreement is in fact made so to free said residue from her dower. She must be presumed to have referred to the mode provided by the testator for so doing, which requires an agreement by her with the trustee for the valuation of said residue as a basis for capitalization of her dower. If no such valuation is agreed upon, there can be no capitalization. A compulsory sale clear of dower might determine the actual market value at the time of sale of the property sold, but that would not be the equivalent of a valuation by her agreement with the trustee. But it will be seen that the bill does not pray for a sale clear of dower with her consent.

The prayer is "that the rest and residue of the estate of the said testator may be disencumbered of the dower and thirds of his widow, the said Ida R. Shipley, either by the exercise of the power conferred upon your orator, the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company of Baltimore for that purpose, or by setting off the same to her as provided by law."

We think the trustee had a right, in event of a failure to free the residue from dower by agreement in the mode provided in the will, to pray that it be done by the assignment of dower. It is stated in Park on Dower, 285, that the propositions are indeed convertible that against whomsoever a writ of dower will lie that person is competent to make a valid assignment, or, in other words, whoever is compellable by writ to assign dower may do it without writ." We are also of the opinion that the testator left the disencumbrance of the estate from his widow's dower in the mode provided by his will to the discretion of the trustee as to the best interests of its cestuarius trust, and that there was no error in that portion of the decree which refers to its discretion to exercise the powers conferred upon it in that connection. Finding no error in any part of the decree it will be affirmed.

Decree affirmed; costs to be paid out of the trust estate.

SAFE DEPOSIT & TRUST CO. v. CAHN et al.

SAME v. ROBERTS et al. (two cases).

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 10, 1906.)

1. TRUSTS — MISAPPROPRIATION OF TRUST FUNDS—ACTIONS—JURISDICTION.

Defendant sold corporate stock, which showed on its face that the same was the corpus of a trust estate, for the individual benefit of the trustee, and paid the proceeds by check to the trustee individually. Defendant also knew from information received from the trustee that the stock belonged to a trust estate. The trustee converted the proceeds to his own use. Held, that equity, in a suit by a substituted trustee, clothed with the powers conferred on the original trustee and in equity as the assignee of rights of action of the beneficiaries, had power to compel defendant to make restoration to the trust estate.

2. SAME.

The fact that the substituted trustee holds the legal title to the trust estate and that he seeks to recover money due to the trust estate does not deprive equity of jurisdiction to compel restoration, for the primary interest to be maintained is essentially equitable.

3. SAME.

A person abetting a defaulting trustee becomes, by participation in the breach of trust, a trustee and amenable to the jurisdiction of a court of equity in a suit by a substituted trustee.

4. DISMISSAL—GROUNDS—ERROR AS TO FORM OF ACTION—TRANSFER TO PROPER COURT.

Where it is apparent that plaintiff is entitled to some relief, the mere fact that he has invoked the aid of the wrong tribunal is not a sufficient cause for the dismissal of the suit; but the court, in obedience to the express provisions of Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 28, § 44, and article 75, § 113, should remove the cause to the proper court.

5. PARTNERSHIP — LIMITED PARTNERSHIP — STATUTES—BUSINESS AUTHORIZED.

The business of a stockbroker may be carried on by a limited partnership, within Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 73, § 1, authorizing the formation of limited partnerships for the transaction of any "mercantile, mechanical, manufacturing or banking business," and declaring that the provision shall not authorize any such partnership for the purpose of making insurance; for sales and purchases of bonds, stocks, and other securities are mercantile transactions.

6. SAME—CONVERSION INTO GENERAL PARTNERSHIP.

Code Gen. Pub. Laws, art. 73, § 4, requires that the certificate of a limited partnership shall be recorded in the county in which the principal place of business shall be. The certificate of a limited partnership declared that its principal place of business was in a city in the state. The bill in a suit against the partners alleged that the principal place of business of the concern was outside of the state. Held, that the limited partnership could not be deemed converted into a general one.

7. SAME—LIABILITY OF SPECIAL PARTNER.

Where all the requirements of the statutes relating to limited partnerships have been complied with, no personal liability attaches to the special partner, except as expressly declared by Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 73, § 2, to the extent of the fund contributed by him, for the object of the provision declaring that the special partner's contribution shall be made in actual cash is to provide a fund subject to firm losses.

8. SAME—SUITS AGAINST PARTNERS IN LIMITED PARTNERSHIP — JOINDER OF SPECIAL PARTNER.

Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 73, § 18, declaring that suits respecting the business of a limited partnership shall be against the general partners only, except as otherwise provided, applies to suits respecting the business of the partnership while the firm is a going concern and to suits after its dissolution while the special partner's cash contribution forms a part of the assets or has been absorbed in liquidating debts, but does not apply to a case where the partnership has been dissolved and the special partner has been repaid his cash contribution, leaving firm debts unpaid.

9. SAME.

Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 73, § 18, declares that no part of the sum contributed by a special partner shall be withdrawn during the continuance of the limited partnership. Section 19 provides that suits against limited partnerships shall be against the general partners only, except as otherwise provided. Section 20 enacts that, if in any suit against general and special partners it shall appear that the special partners are not liable, the court may proceed to judgment against the partners liable. A partnership aided a trustee in converting corporate stock belonging to the trust estate by selling the same for the trustee and paying the proceeds by check to the trustee individually. Subsequently a limited partnership was formed, which took over the assets and assumed the liabilities of the partnership. The limited partnership aided the trustee in converting stock of the trust estate in the same manner. The limited partnership was dissolved, though formed to continue longer, and the cash paid by the special partner was returned to him, with the liabilities resulting from the transactions remaining unpaid. Held, that the substituted trustee, in a suit to compel restitution, properly made the general and special partners parties defendant.

10. SAME—ASSUMPTION BY FIRM OF FORMER FIRM LIABILITIES—LIABILITIES INCLUDED.

A general partnership wrongfully aided a trustee in misappropriating trust funds. It was then dissolved, and a limited partnership took its assets and assumed its liabilities. Held, that the liability of the general partnership to make restitution to the trust estate was included in the liability assumed by the limited partnership.

11. SAME — MISAPPROPRIATION OF TRUST FUNDS—RECOVERY—ACTIONS—PARTIES.

The limited partnership was dissolved, leaving the liability outstanding. The members of the general partnership were the members of the limited partnership. The substituted trustee, in a suit to compel restitution to the trust estate, filed a bill against the individual members of the two partnerships. Held, that the individuals were liable, whether as members of the first or second firm.

12. TRUSTS — CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS—WRONGFUL PURCHASE OF TRUST PROPERTY.

A purchaser at a private sale of corporate stock belonging to a trust estate, with knowledge of the order of the court directing the sale of the stock at the highest market price obtainable on a public stock board, holds the stock subject to the trust to which it was subject in the hands of the original trustee.

Appeals from Circuit Court of Baltimore City.

Consolidated suits—one by the Safe Deposit & Trust Company against Frank B. Cahn and others and two by the same plaintiff against William C. Roberts and others. From a decree dismissing the bills, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Frank Gosnell and Bernard Carter, for appellant. Edgar H. Gans and Robert W. Honeyman, for appellees.

McSHERRY, C. J. There are three appeals in this record. Two of the questions brought up for decision are involved in all of the cases, whilst there are separate, subordinate inquiries which are confined to the first and third appeals, respectively. Before stating any of the questions which are to be considered, a brief narration of the facts must be given, in so far as they affect the first contention which is common to all the cases; and subsequently the facts bearing on the other general question will be stated, and when the subsidiary inquiries are later on dealt with the facts pertaining to them will be mentioned, if not incidentally alluded to earlier.

Three bills in equity were filed in the circuit court of Baltimore City by the appellant, the Safe Deposit & Trust Company of Baltimore City, against the several appellees. To each bill demurrers were interposed, the demurrers were sustained, and the bills were dismissed upon the sole ground that a court of equity was without jurisdiction to grant the relief prayed. It appears from the face of the bills and exhibits: That in the year 1895 a certain Wesley A. Tucker departed this life, leaving a last will and testament in and by which his widow, Rebecca J. Tucker, and his son, William Trump Tucker, were appointed executrix and executor, and were named and constituted trustees of the property therein disposed of on the trusts and conditions therein mentioned and set forth. That the executrix and executor after administering on the estate of the decedent, conveyed and transferred that portion thereof falling within and covered by the trusts created by the will, to themselves as trustees. That the circuit court, upon appropriate proceedings taken, assumed jurisdiction over the administration of the trusts named and described in the will, and over the trust property and estate subject thereto. That a portion of the trust estate was invested in 328 shares of the capital stock of the Merchants' & Miners' Transportation Company, and in 211 shares of the capital stock of the Northern Central Railway Company; and that the certificates representing all of those shares stood in the names of Rebecca J. Tucker and William Trump Tucker, trustees of Wesley A. Tucker, deceased. That by certain orders passed at different times by the circuit court in the trust estate proceedings the trustees were authorized to sell the above-named shares of stock with a view to the reinvestment of the proceeds in other securities. That as to 100 shares of the Merchants' & Miners' Transportation Company's stock, the sale was directed by the court to be made at the Public Stock Board of Baltimore City, and as to the entire 211 shares of the Northern Central Railway Company's stock, the sales were directed by the court's orders to be made at the highest market price obtainable on the Public Stock Board of Baltimore City; and as to the remaining 228 shares of the Merchants' & Miners' Transportation Company's stock the order instructed the trustees to sell at the highest market price obtainable at the Public Stock Board of Baltimore City, "or otherwise, provided the same shall not be sold at less than one hundred and seventy (170) dollars per share"; and as to the remaining 128 shares of the same stock the court's order permitted the sale to be made at the "market price upon the Public Stock Board of Baltimore City, or at private sale at not less than $175 per share." That all of the above-mentioned certificates, thus plainly earmarked and distinctly identified as forming parts of the corpus of the trust estate of Wesley A. Tucker, deceased, and clearly showing that they did not belong to Rebecca J. Tucker or William Trump Tucker individually, were sold by the appellees, who are bankers and stockbrokers, under circumstances, some of which need not be mentioned just here because having no relation to the branch of the case now being considered, but which will be stated later on when the liability of the several firms separately proceeded against comes to be discussed. That the appellees sold all the shares for the individual benefit and account of William Trump Tucker, and credited the proceeds of the sales to the individual account of William Trump Tucker, and paid the proceeds by check to him individually, without indicating in any way on the face of the checks that they represented the proceeds of the sale of stock belonging to a trust estate, and without naming Rebecca J. Tucker as trustee or payee, and without describing William Trump Tucker, the person named as payee therein, as trustee, although the appellee firms knew full well, both from information gathered from previous dealings with William Trump Tucker and from the fact that the certificates all showed on their face that they represented stock standing on the books of the two corporations above mentioned in the names of Rebecca J. Tucker and William Trump Tucker, trustees of Wesley A. Tucker, deceased, that said stock in fact belonged to and formed part of the trust estate of the decedent. That William Trump Tucker took the proceeds of said sales, thus paid to him individually, and converted them to his own private use without accounting to his co-trustee or to the trust estate therefor. That after wasting and despoiling the trust estate to a large amount he departed to, and is now residing in, some place unknown, and that he is utterly insolvent. That both Rebecca J. Tucker and William Trump Tucker were subsequently removed from the trusteeship, and that the Safe Deposit & Trust Company was duly appointed in their stead. The three bills contained in the record were filed by the Safe Deposit & Trust Company, the substituted trustee. In the first, certain individuals who formerly traded as Frank B. Cahn & Co. and later in conjunction with a special partner as Roberts, Cahn & Co., were proceeded against to recover from them the sum of about $17,000, representing the proceeds of the sale of 100 shares of the capital stock of the Merchants' & Miners' Transportation Company; in the second, certain individuals constituting the same firm of Roberts, Cahn & Co. were proceeded against to recover from them the sum of $42,138.39, being the amount of the proceeds of the sale of the remaining 228 shares of the Merchants' & Miners' Transportation Company's stock; and in the third, certain individuals constituting a still later firm of Roberts, Cahn & Co. were proceeded against to recover from them something more than $20,000, being the amount of the proceeds of the sales of the 211 shares of the capital stock, of the Northern Central Railway Company. The liability of all the appellees is based upon their participation in Tucker's breach of trust.

Upon the facts admitted by the demurrers, the first question presented is this: Has a court of equity jurisdiction to decree that the defendants—the appellees here—shall restore to the trust estate the amounts which by their participation in Tucker's malversations they enabled him to abstract therefrom and to convert to his own use? Or must the substituted trustee proceed by an action at law against these participants in Tucker's conceded breach of trust to recover the amounts lost by his defalcations?

It cannot be doubted at this day that on the facts alleged in the bills of complaint the appellees are answerable in some forum, either in a court of equity or in a court of law, for their participation in the defaulting trustee's breach of trust. It is a general principle that all persons who knowingly take part or aid in committing a breach of trust are responsible for the money thus withdrawn from the trust estate, and they may be compelled to replace the fund which they have been instrumental in diverting. Every violation by a trustee of a duty which equity lays upon him, whether willful and fraudulent, or done through negligence, or arising through mere oversight or forgetfulness, is a breach of trust. There is in such instances no primary or secondary liability as respects the parties guilty of or participating in the breach of trust, because all are equally amenable. That a breach of trust was committed by William Trump Tucker does not admit of a doubt. He and his co-trustee were removed because he was a defaulter. He received the proceeds of the sales of all of the shares of stock which have been hereinbefore mentioned, and those proceeds formed part of the corpus of the trust estate which it was his imperative duty to preserve intact. Instead of performing that duty, he spent the funds or appropriated them to his own use. Whoever knowingly aided him, or knowingly participated with him, in misapplying those funds, became, by reason of so aiding and so participating, equally liable with him to make the fund good by restoring the proceeds of the sales or an equivalent in cash to the trust estate. If the appellees aided and participated in Tucker's breach of trust in the manner and to the extent alleged in the pleadings as hereinbefore stated, then they are, beyond dispute, as responsible and answerable to the substituted trustee as is the defaulting trustee himself.

But in what tribunal must that responsibility of the appellees be enforced? The appellant says in a court of equity; the appellees assert in a court of law, because an adequate remedy exists there. If this were a proceeding against the defaulting trustee alone, can it be questioned that a court of equity would have ample jurisdiction to require the spoliator to make good to the trust estate the funds belonging thereto which he had unlawfully converted to his own use? A court of equity which has assumed charge of the administration of a trust estate has jurisdiction over the trust property and over the trustee; and if the trustee misappropriates the trust funds, and squanders and misapplies them, whilst a court of equity has supervision over them and him, that court would be lame and impotent indeed if it were powerless to compel, by its own process, the delinquent trustee to restore the abstracted funds, and if it were, in consequence of its own want of jurisdiction, driven to seek the aid of a court of law to accomplish that result. "The trustee's personal liability to make compensation for the loss occasioned by a breach of trust is a simple contract equitable debt. It may be enforced by a suit in equity against the trustee himself, or against his estate after his death, and the statute of limitations will not be admitted as a defense, unless the statutory language is express and mandatory upon the court." 2 Pom. Eq. § 1080. If the jurisdiction of a court of equity is broad enough to enable that court to decree that a defaulting trustee shall make compensation to the extent which he has wrongfully depleted a trust estate, upon what principle can it be maintained that the same jurisdiction will not extend to and bring within its scope the individuals who may knowingly aid and assist the trustee in his spoliation of the fund? If the one is answerable in a court of equity, why should not the other be also? Both the defaulting trustee and his confederates, those who aided and abetted him, occupy precisely the same relation to the trust estate. Each is primarily liable. Why, then, cannot the same tribunal be invoked to enforce against both an identical liability? The participants in the defalcation—the persons who aid, and by their conduct knowingly assist, the trustee to squander the trust funds—are chargeable with the loss, because, as stated by Sir John Leach, Master of the Rolls, "in the consideration of a court of equity, they, by being parties to a breach of trust, have themselves become trustees for the purposes of the testator's will." Wilson v. Moore, 1 Myl. & Keene, 126. By their own wrongful act they have, in the consideration of a court of equity, constituted themselves trustees of the fund they have aided the trustee in misapplying, and they may be treated as trustees of the misapplied fund for the purposes of the testator's will. As the original trustee is answerable in a court of equity to the trust estate for his diversion of its funds, because that court has jurisdiction over the estate and over him it must of necessity follow that those who aid the trustee in his misappropriations of the funds, and who, by so aiding him, become themselves trustees of the diverted assets, are also liable in a court of equity, because by becoming trustees ex delicto they have brought themselves within the jurisdiction to which the testamentary trustee is amenable. The forms and varieties of the trusts which are termed ex maleficio or ex delicto are practically without limit. "The principle is applied wherever it is necessary for the obtaining of complete justice, although the law may also give the remedy of damages against the wrongdoer." 2 Pom. Eq. § 1053.

The jurisdiction of a court of equity to grant the relief prayed for in these proceedings has been distinctly and unequivocally upheld by this court. The substituted trustee clearly became in equity the assignee of any rights of action possessed by the cestui que trust for injuries done to the trust property before the substituted trustee's appointment, and it was clothed by the order appointing it with all the powers conferred by the will of Wesley A. Tucker upon the original trustees. This court had before it a precisely similar situation in Stewart & Duffy, Trustees, v. Firemen's Ins. Co., 53 Md. 564. It appeared in that case that a testator bequeathed the residuum of his estate to two trustees upon certain trusts which need not be stated here. The circuit court of Baltimore City assumed jurisdiction over the administration of the trusts, and thereafter the trustees, with the consent and permission of the Firemen's Insurance Company, transferred a portion of that company's stock, which belonged to the trust estate, and appropriated the proceeds to their own use. Subsequently the trustees were removed, and Messrs. Stewart and Duffy were appointed trustees in their stead. The decree which effected this removal and appointment clothed the new trustees "with all the power and authority conferred upon or vested in" the removed trustees. The substituted trustees then filed a bill in equity against the insurance company to recover the stock thus lost to the trust estate, or its value; and the insurance company specially denied the right of the complainants to institute the suit, and also denied that the circuit court had any jurisdiction to confer such a right. It was held, in a carefully considered judgment delivered by the late Judge Miller, that a court of equity has jurisdiction to enforce the liability incurred by a participant in a breach of trust by a trustee, and it was said: "In case of a trust like the one before us we cannot doubt the power of a court of equity, at the instance of the cestui que trust, to supervise the trustees in its management, to remove them for misconduct and appoint others in their place, clothed with all the power and authority over the trust estate which the original trustees had under the instrument creating the trust. Why, then, is it not competent for the complainants to maintain this bill to recover the portion of the trust property which they aver has been lost through the misconduct of their predecessors and the negligence of the defendant corporation? It is true the question has never been expressly decided in this state, but in Thruston v. Blackiston, 86 Md. 501, a similar bill was sustained without any such objection being interposed." After citing with approval the case of Loring v. Salisbury Mills, 125 Mass. 138, this court proceeded to say: "But apart from authority, and assuming the question is one of first impression, we have no difficulty in sustaining the right of the trustees appointed, as in the present case, to maintain suits against the proper parties for breaches of trust committed by, or injuries done to, the trust property while in the hands and under the management of their predecessors." The insurance company was accordingly held responsible in equity at the suit of the substituted trustees for the loss sustained by the trust estate as the result of a breach of trust committed by the former trustees with the aid and co-operation of the company. Precisely the same relief was granted upon analogous facts in Swift v. Williams & Moore, Trustees, 68 Md. 286, 11 Atl. 835. In Duckett v. National Bank of Baltimore, 88 Md. 8, 41 Atl. 161, 1002, the jurisdiction of a court of equity to compel a participant in a breach of trust to make compensation at the suit of a substituted trustee was distinctly challenged, and was in express terms upheld. In Duckett v. National Mechanics' Bank, 86 Md. 400, 38 Atl. 983, 39 L. R. A. 84, 63 Am. St. Rep. 513, the jurisdiction was not questioned or doubted. The allusion in the last-named case to Third Nat. Bk. v. Lange, 51 Md. 138, 34 Am. Rep. 304, Marbury v. Ehlen, 72 Md. 206, 19 Atl. 648, 20 Am. St. Rep. 467, and Stewart v. Fire Ins. Co., 53 Md. 564, was to distinguish them from the situation presented by the check which was payable to Scott, cashier, for deposit to the credit of Clagett personally, as the context plainly shows.

It has been vigorously and ingeniously contended in behalf of the appellees that none of the cases above cited is applicable here, because the proceedings now before us are in reality suits in equity for the recovery of damages, and should have, therefore, been instituted in a court of law. The fundamental proposition upon which the contention is based is that the substituted trustee is the holder of a legal title; that as such holder it is not seeking to have the stock itself restored, because the shares were rightfully sold under an order of court, and it is not endeavoring to have restored the proceeds of the stock in their identity as trust funds, because those proceeds, according to the averments of the bills, are no longer in the hands of the appellees, having been paid over to William Trump Tucker; but as the holder of the legal title the substituted trustee is attempting to recover from the appellees damages for the negligence of which they were guilty in the method of payment pursued by them, whereby they made it possible for William Trump Tucker to appropriate the proceeds to his own use. There are several fallacies lurking in this contention. It does not follow, because the substituted trustee holds a legal title to the trust estate, that therefore the trustee cannot, in the circumstances of these cases, invoke the remedial aid of a court of equity to compel a deposed trustee or his confederates to reimburse the depleted trust estate. Conceding that the trustee does hold the legal title, yet "the primary right, estate, or interest to be maintained, or the violation of which furnishes the cause of action" (1 Pom. Eq. § 130), is essentially equitable. "In all cases of equitable estates * * * they are in equity what legal estates are in law.

The ownership of the equitable estate is regarded by equity as the real ownership, and the legal estate is * * * no more than the shadow, always following the equitable estate, which is the substance, except where there is a purchaser for value and without notice who has acquired the legal estate." 1 Pom. Eq. § 147. But equity jurisdiction embraces not only cases for the maintenance or protection of primary rights, estates, and interests purely equitable, "but cases for the maintenance and protection of primary rights, estates, and interests purely legal; and in the latter class of cases the remedies granted may be of a kind which are peculiar to equity courts, * * * or may be of a kind which are administered by courts of law, as the recovery of money, or of the possession of specific things." 1 Pom. Eq. § 136. Hence it is obvious that the mere circumstances that the trustee is clothed with a legal title and seeks to recover money due to the trust estate are not sufficient to indicate that equity has no jurisdiction to grant relief. Again, the implied assumption that there is no fiduciary relation between the substituted trustee and the appellees is equally fallacious. It directly conflicts with the doctrine laid down by the Master of the Rolls in Wilson v. Moore, supra, pursuant to which the abettor of a defaulting trustee becomes, by participating in a breach of trust, a trustee for the purposes of the testator's will, and therefore amenable to the jurisdiction of a court of equity.

The case of White v. White, 1 Md. Ch. 53, has been strongly pressed upon us as flatly deciding that a court of equity is without jurisdiction in such cases as these. In that case the bill of complaint averred that 46 shares of the stock of the Manhattan Company of New York were transferred to the defendant Joseph White, in trust for the complainants, and that Joseph White, by letter of attorney, empowered Campbell P. White to sell and transfer the shares to the defendant John C. White, which was accordingly done; that said defendant John C. White knew the stock was trust property, but made no returns of the proceeds to the complainant, though payment was duly demanded. The bill then prayed that John C. White account for the sale of the stock, and pay over the proceeds thereof. The defendants relied by way of defense (1) upon a want of jurisdiction in a court of equity over the case made by the bill, and (2) on limitations. The chancellor decided that he had no jurisdiction in the premises and he observed: "The bill presents the case of a single transaction of the sale of stock, the particulars of which seem to have been known to the complainants or of which the proof was entirely within their reach, without having recourse to the conscience of the defendant. As between him and them there was unquestionably no such trust as would bring the case within the exclusive jurisdiction of a court of equity." This dictum of the chancellor has never been followed in Maryland, and though the case of White v. White, supra, has been referred to in three later cases, viz., Abbott v. Balto., etc., Packet Co., 4 Md. Ch. 313; Nelson v. Bank, etc., 27 Md. 75, and Mason v. Union Mills Co., 81 Md. 452, 32 Atl. 313, 29 L. R. A. 273, 48 Am. St. Rep. 524, it never has been followed or even alluded to on the question of jurisdiction. As it is flatly at variance with all the later decisions of this court on this subject, it must be regarded as overruled in this particular. We hold, for the reasons we have given, that the demurrers raising the question of jurisdiction should have been overruled.

There is one other suggestion to be made before leaving this branch of the case. The bills of complaint were all dismissed, as we have already observed, on the sole ground that a court of equity had no jurisdiction over the cases stated therein. Acts 1896, c. 229, now section 44, art. 26, and section 113, art. 75, of the Code of Public General Laws of 1904, provides that in every case at law or in equity in which it shall appear that the plaintiff is entitled to some relief or to some remedy, but not in the particular court in which the relief is prayed, "the plaintiff shall not on that account be nonsuited or the case dismissed"; but the case may, in the discretion of the judge, be removed to the proper court. Whilst a failure to remove the case from one court to another is not a ground for appeal, being a matter within the discretion of the judge in the court below (Summer-son v. Schilling, 94 Md. 607, 51 Atl. 612), yet the statute shows it is the declared policy of the law that where it is apparent the plaintiff is entitled to some remedy, the mere fact that he has invoked the aid of the wrong tribunal shall not be a sufficient cause for the dismissal of his bill of complaint.

We come next to the second general question, which relates to all three of the cases. The facts which need to be stated in considering this question are as follows: Prior to the month of August, 1902, Frank B. Cahn, Henry L. Straus, and Henry Landon Davies composed the firm of Frank B. Cahn & Co., which carried on a general banking and stock brokerage business in the city of Baltimore. That firm sold, on August 11, 1902, the 100 shares of the capital stock of the Merchants' & Miners' Transportation Company mentioned in the first of the three bills of complaint, and carried the proceeds to the individual credit of William Trump Tucker, as has been stated in an earlier part of this judgment. On September 9, 1902, the firm was dissolved by mutual consent, and on the same day a new firm, known as Roberts, Cahn & Co., was formed, wherein William C. Roberts, Frank B. Cahn, and Henry F. Straus were named as general partners, and Bernard Cahn as a special partner who had contributed $150,000 as capital to the common stock of the concern. This latter was a limited partnership. Two days later an amended certificate, bringing in Henry Landon Davies as a general partner, was filed. These certificates were framed under article 73 of the Code of Public General Laws, relating to limited partnerships. In the bill of complaint in the first case, it is alleged that the firm of Roberts, Cahn & Co. took over all the assets and assumed all the liabilities of the firm of Frank B. Cahn & Co. As the liability incurred by Frank B. Cahn & Co. in August, 1902, by their participation in Tucker's breach of trust was an outstanding liability at the time Roberts, Cahn & Co. took over the former's assets and assumed all of its liabilities, the contention is that Roberts, Cahn & Co. are accountable to the substituted trustee and answerable for that liability. Whether the members of these two firms, both of which have been dissolved, can be held liable for the same claim is the subordinate inquiry confined to the first case. It will be considered later on. The two sales of stock which are described in the second bill of complaint were made by the firm of Roberts, Cahn & Co., of which Bernard Cahn was a special partner; and the firm was dissolved thereafter by mutual consent on February 10, 1903, and thereupon the special partner received from the general partners, in either cash or securities, the amount of the capital contributed by him, and now has the same in his possession. On February 2, 1903, a new firm composed of William C. Roberts, Frank B. Cahn, and Henry Landon Davies, general partners, and Bernard Cahn, special partner, was formed under the name and style of Roberts, Cahn & Co. To the common capital of this firm Bernard Cahn contributed $150,000 in cash. On May 19, 1903, this firm sold the 211 shares of Northern Central Railway stock to themselves, notwithstanding the order of the circuit court directed the shares to be sold at the highest market price obtainable on the Public Stock Board of Baltimore City, and the proceeds were disposed of in the manner hereinbefore mentioned. On January 18, 1904, the firm was dissolved by mutual consent, and Bernard Cahn received from Roberts, Cahn & Co. in either cash or securities, the amount of the capital contributed by him as special partner, and now has the same in his possession. Bernard Cahn demurred to the three bills, and one ground assigned was that, being a special partner, he cannot be made liable in personam. The questions which these facts raise are: (1) Is Bernard Cahn liable to be treated as a general partner? (2) Can he, if he was a special partner, be joined as a codefendant with general partners? And the subordinate inquiry which arises under the first bill as previously indicated is: Can the firm of Frank B. Cahn & Co., and the firm of Roberts, Cahn & Co. be sued jointly on account of the transaction concerning the 100 shares of stock named in the first bill of complaint? And the subordinate inquiry which arises under the third bill of complaint grows out of the circumstance that the firm of Roberts, Cahn & Co. themselves purchased the shares of Northern Central Railway stock.

It is insisted that Bernard Cahn is not a special partner because (1) the business of a stockbroker is not within the terms of the statute permitting limited partnerships to be formed; and because (2) the firm is alleged in the bill to have had its general or principal office in the city of New York. Under section 1, art. 73, of the Code of Public General Laws of 1904, limited partnerships may be formed for the transaction of any mercantile, mechanical, manufacturing, or banking business within this state. The certificates of limited partnership executed by the appellees all declared that "the general nature of the business intended to be transacted is a general banking, commission and brokerage business in stocks, bonds and other securities." Section 1 of article 73 expressly declares that the provisions of that article shall not be construed to authorize any such partnership for the purpose of making insurance. The certificates, in so far as they refer to the business of banking, bring the partnership within the express words of the Code; and the prohibition against construing the other terms employed in the section so as to include under them the business of making insurance, plainly indicates that those terms are to have a liberal and not a narrow meaning ascribed to them. Upon that principle the Court of Queen's Bench in Bowers v. Holland, 14 U. C. Q. B. 322, held that the buying and building of steamboats and employing them to carry on the business of transportation of passengers and freight was a mercantile business within the meaning of the limited partnership statute. Sales and purchases of bonds, stocks, and other securities are equally mercantile transactions; and hence the objects for which the limited partnerships now before us were formed are, in our judgment, such as the Code has designated and allowed. Next, as to whether the special partner is to be treated as a general partner merely because the bills aver that the firms did not have their "general or principal office" in the city of Baltimore. Section 4 of article 73 requires the certificate, when acknowledged, to be recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court, if the principal place of business of the partnership be in that city. We cannot put upon that section a construction which would convert a limited partnership into a general one, merely because the principal office of the concern is alleged to be out of the state, though its duly executed certificate declares that its principal place of business, within the state of Maryland, is located in Baltimore City.

This brings us to the question respecting the right of the substituted trustee to join the special partner as a codefendant in these proceedings. Limited partnerships were wholly unknown to the common law, and as they exist in the United States they are entirely statutory. "No such thing as a limited partnership can exist unless authorized by statute." 19 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 337. Limited partnership statutes must be construed with reference to the common law, and, except as otherwise provided by the statute, the rights and liabilities of the partners and their creditors are governed by the rules of the common law applicable to ordinary partnerships. Id. 341. The fundamental difference between the liability of the general and the special partners is to be found in the fact that the former are responsible in solido for the debts and obligations of the firm, as in the case of ordinary partnerships, without regard to the amounts contributed by them to the social capital, whilst the latter is not personally liable if the statute has been complied with, because his cash contribution is substituted for a personal liability. In the language of section 2, art. 73, of the Code of Public General Laws, the special partner "shall not be liable for the debts of the partnership beyond the fund so contributed by him . . . to the capital." Obviously, then, when all the requirements of the statute have been complied with no personal liability attaches to the special partner, but the cash contribution made by him does become liable for the debts of the partnership. The object of the provision which declares that the special partner's contribution to the capital shall be made "in actual cash" is "to provide a fund on the day the company is formed, to be thereafter subject to no contingencies or losses, except those which come from the proper business of the partnership." Lineweaver v. Slagle, 64 Md. 483, 2 Atl. 693, 54 Am. Rep. 775. Whilst, therefore, the limited partnership is a going concern, in which the cash contributed by the special partner stands for and takes the place of a personal liability on his part, it is entirely appropriate that section 19 of article 73 should enact that "all suits respecting the business of the partnership shall be brought by and against the general partners only," except in cases mentioned in the section. And even after the dissolution, whilst the cash contribution still forms part of the social assets, it is also proper that the liabilities due by the firm should be enforced by suits against only the general partners; because in both instances there is no individual liability attaching to the special partner, since his cash contribution itself measures the limit of his responsibility. Looking to the object which the Legislature had in view when it required the special partner to contribute his proportion of the capital in actual cash, and bearing in mind the principle that except as otherwise provided by the statute, the rights and liabilities of the partners and the creditors are governed by the rules of the common law applicable to ordinary partnerships, the provision of section 19 requiring all suits respecting the business of the partnership to be brought against the general partners only must be construed to apply to suits brought whilst the firm is a going concern, and to suits brought after its dissolution, but whilst the special partner's cash contribution still forms part of the assets, or has been wholly absorbed in the liquidation of debts due by the firm. His cash contribution to the capital must make good or be answerable for precisely the same debts and obligations for which, to the extent of that contribution, but no farther, he would have been personally responsible except for the restriction of that responsibility and the imposition of it on the cash contribution, by the limited partnership statute. If this were not so, the simple process of dissolving the firm by mutual agreement in anticipation of the date fixed in its certificate and the repayment to the special partner of his contributed cash capital, would relieve him and his cash capital from any liability for debts due by the firm at the time of its accelerated dissolution, though the cash capital was designed by the statute to be answerable for those debts, and was intended to be "subject to no contingencies or losses, except those which come from the proper business of the partnership." The withdrawal of the cash capital by the special partner, and his subsequent release from all responsibility, in such circumstances, whilst there are outstanding debts due by the firm, is not a contingency contemplated by, or provided for in, the statute, and, if permitted, would subvert the whole intent of the legislation on this subject.

Upon turning to the record it will be found, as already stated, that the first sale of the trust estate stock was made by the firm of Frank B. Cahn & Co. on August 11, 1902; that on September 10th following the limited partnership was formed, which took over the assets and assumed the liabilities of the former concern. Then on November 2, 1902, and on January 6, 1903, the limited partnership made the next sales. If the limited partnership is liable at all, it was liable to the trust estate on account of its participation in diverting from that estate the proceeds of the two last named sales, when the diversions actually occurred—that is, not later than January 6, 1903—and for its assumption of the prior firm's liability on account of the first sale. Now, on the 10th day of February, 1903, the limited partnership was dissolved by mutual consent, though it had been formed to continue until December 31, 1904, and upon its dissolution, the cash capital paid in by Bernard Cahn was returned to him in full, notwithstanding the above-mentioned liabilities to the trust estate were then outstanding and still are unpaid. The second limited partnership was formed February 2, 1903. On May 19, 1903, the transaction in regard to the Northern Central Railway stock took place. The liability of the second limited partnership then accrued. On January 18, 1904, that firm was dissolved by mutual consent, though it had been formed to continue until February, 1905, and upon its dissolution the cash capital paid in by Bernard Cahn was returned to him in full, notwithstanding the liability growing out of the railway stock sale was then outstanding and still is unpaid. Here, then, we have the admitted fact that liabilities existed against the two limited partnerships; that each of those partnerships was dissolved before the times fixed in their certificates and after the liabilities had been incurred, and the further fact that the special partner has withdrawn his entire contributed capital, though under the Code that capital stood in the place of, and as a substitute for, his personal liability; and yet it is insisted that only the general partners can be sued, and that the special partner, who has in his pocket the fund which the law declares shall be responsible, cannot be sued at all, whereby he will escape a personal liability altogether and will, in addition, retain his returned cash capital unimpaired. A court of equity can scarcely be expected to place upon article 78 of the Code a construction which will, in such circumstances as we have in this record, work out a result so wholly at variance with the spirit and design of the statute. Section 13 of article 73 declares that "no part of the sum which any special partner shall have contributed to the capital stock shall be withdrawn by him * * * during the continuance of the partnership." What becomes of the security which this provision was intended to afford, if, before the expiration of the period during which the partnership was formed to continue, the firm can be dissolved by mutual consent, and if the special partner can then with immunity withdraw his capital? A succession of dissolutions and withdrawals of capital would be quite a simple and effective expedient to shield the special partner from any liability whatever, if the theory of the appellees were sanctioned. But section 20 of article 73 expressly makes provision for a suit against both general and special partners, and thereby indicates that section 19 ought to be so limited in its application as to include and refer to only such suits as are instituted during the existence of the co-partnership or during the time, after its dissolution, that the special partner's cash capital still forms part of the firm's assets in the hands of the general partners. Section 20 enacts: "If in any case a suit shall be brought against general and special partners and at the trial of the cause it shall appear that the special partners or any of them are not liable to the suit of the plaintiff the court may proceed to judgment or decree against the partners who may appear to be liable, in the same manner as if such partners were the only parties defendants to the writ, excepting that the partners who may be deemed not liable shall recover their legal costs against the plaintiff and such additional costs as the court may deem reasonable." The situation disclosed by the record does not bring article 78 into force, and as to the withdrawn cash capital, the rules of the common law must prevail. We hold, then, upon this branch of the case, that the demurrer filed by Bernard Cahn, and which is founded on the assumption that because he was a special partner he cannot be in any event sued conjointly with the general partners, should have been overruled in view of the facts alleged in the bills of complaint.

We now come to the subordinate inquiries, and but a few words will be needed to dispose of them. It is objected that the two firms should not have been sued jointly in the first case, because (1) the liability incurred by Frank B. Cahn & Co. in the transaction connected with the first sale of the trust estate stock is not such a liability as the second firm assumed, and because (2) both firms cannot be held. The liability of the first firm was a liability to restore a certain sum of money to the trust estate, it was an obligation which it owed, and we can see no reason why it should not be included in the liabilities assumed by the second firm, inasmuch as the latter assumed all the liabilities of the former. But, apart from this, both firms have been dissolved, and the bill in the first case was filed against the individual members of the two firms, and as all the members of the firm of Frank B. Cahn & Co. were also members of the firm of Roberts, Cahn & Co., they are responsible to the substituted trustee, whether as members of the first or the second firm. The exact nature of their liability will in the end depend on the evidence.

Finally, it will be remembered that the appellees purchased the railway company's stock themselves at private sale, in spite of the court's order that the shares should be sold "at the highest market price obtainable on the Public Stock Board of Baltimore City." In addition to the reasons hereinbefore given in support of the liability of the appellees, the fact that they themselves bought the shares at private sale with a full knowledge that they were shares belonging to the trust estate impresses upon the shares in their hands the same trusts to which the shares were subject in the hands of the trustee (Abell v. Brown, 55 Md. 221; Wormley v. Wormley, 8 Wheat. 419, 5 L. Ed. 651), in view of the fact that the appellees aided and assisted the defaulting trustee to deplete the trust estate.

Upon a review of the whole case we are of the opinion that there was an error committed in sustaining the demurrers and in dismissing the bills. The decree of the circuit court will therefore be reversed, and the causes will be remanded.

Decree reversed, with costs above and below, and causes remanded.

BOND et al. v. GRAY IMP. CO. et al.
(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 9, 1906.)
CORPORATIONS—FORECLOSURE SALE—RIGHTS OF MINORITY STOCKHOLDERS.

Minority stockholders of a corporation, the property of which has been sold in a suit to foreclose its mortgage thereon, may not intervene to maintain exceptions to ratification of the sale, where the other stockholders are satisfied that everything was done to realize the best price, and refuse to oppose the sale; no act which is ultra vires, fraudulent, or illegal being shown.

Appeal from Circuit Court of Baltimore City; Henry D. Harlan, Judge.

Suit by Letitia E. Hanna and others against the Gray Improvement Company to foreclose a mortgage. Petition of G. Morris Bond and another to be allowed to intervene to maintain exceptions to ratification of the sale was denied, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Morris A. Soper, for appellants. Richard Bernard, for appellees.

BRISCOE, J. The questions in this case arise upon exceptions to the sale of certain mortgaged premises situate in Baltimore City, under a decree of court. The appellee the Gray Improvement Company of Baltimore City is a corporation, duly incorporated under the laws of the state and on the 8th of April, 1897, executed a mortgage upon 10 acres of unimproved land, situate near Druid Hill Park, Baltimore, to secure the payment of the sum of $54,000, authorized by a resolution of its board of directors to be borrowed from Letitia E. Hanna and others, mortgagees. This mortgage being in default, a decree for the sale of the property, was passed on the 23d of May, 1904, by the circuit court of Baltimore City, and Mr. Richard Bernard, a member of the Baltimore bar, was appointed trustee to make the sale. The property was advertised for sale in accordance with the terms of the decree, and was sold on the 20th day of June, 1904, to John Waters of Baltimore county, for the sum of $76,500. It appears from the report of the trustee, that "the lot of ground is composed of parts of three tracts, which are together embraced in one description," and contains 10 acres of land more or less. The trustee first offered the property in four separate parcels, but the amount aggregating only $24,500 from a sale in that manner, it was afterwards offered as an entirety, and thus sold to the purchaser. Subsequently, on the 16th of July, 1904, the appellants, who are minority stockholders of the mortgagor corporation filed exceptions to the ratification of the sale, asking that the sale as thus made, be vacated and set aside.

The grounds relied upon and briefly stated, are substantially these: (1) That the property was insufficiently advertised; (2) that the trustee improperly advertised the property to be sold "as an entirety"; (3) that the price was grossly inadequate; (4) that the property should have been sold as building lots; (5) that the trustee sold more of said property than was absolutely necessary for the satisfaction of the mortgage debt and proper expenses of the sale. On the 27th of January, 1905, the appellees, the mortgagees, filed a motion to overrule and dismiss the exceptions to the sale, because the exceptants are minority stockholders, owning only one-eighth of the capital stock of the corporation, and have no standing to attack the sale as made by the trustee. It further appears that on the 28th of January the appellants, two of the stockholders of the mortgagor company, petitioned the court to intervene as party defendants and maintain their exceptions, averring that the president of the company had refused to take such action as would protect the interests of the stockholders. The appellees, mortgagees, demurred to this petition, and the mortgagor company filed an answer thereto. The answer states "that all the stockholders except the appellants believe that the trustee, who, besides representing the mortgagee, represents about three-eighths of the capital stock of the company, did all in his power to realize the best price, and that his conduct met the approval of seven-eighths of the stockholders of the company; that the petitioners are the holders of the remaining one-eighth, and are largely interested in the contiguous vacant land, which has been for some time on the market; that their effort to control the management of the company is unjust, inequitable, and vexatious, and the majority of the stockholders are acting for the interest of the company. The case was heard on the petition, answer, and the demurrer, and from a decree sustaining the demurrer, refusing the application to be made parties, overruling the exceptions and ratifying the sale, an appeal has been taken.

The principal question in dispute, and the one upon which the decision of the case must turn, is whether the appellants, who are minority stockholders of the mortgagor corporation, have presented such a case as gives them a standing in court, to defend apart from the corporation itself, a contest or litigation involving the corporate rights and duties of the company. The law involving the rights of individual or minority stockholders to sue or defend independent of the corporation itself, has been firmly established by adjudications of both the federal and state courts. In Shaw v. Davis et al., 78 Md. 316, 28 Atl. 619, 23 L. R. A. 294, Judge McSherry, in speaking for this court, said: "It may be stated, as the result of all the authorities, that whenever any action of either directors or stockholders is relied on in a suit by a minority stockholder for the purpose of invoking the interposition of a court of equity, if the act complained of be neither ultra vires, fraudulent nor illegal, the court will refuse its intervention, because powerless to grant it, and will leave all such matters to be disposed of by the majority of the stockholders in such manner as their interest may dictate, and their action will be binding on all, whether approved of by the minority or not." And Mr. Justice Miller, in Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U. S. 450, 26 L. Ed. 827, said: "While the cases admit the right of a stockholder to sue in cases where the corporation is the proper party to bring the suit, they limit this right to cases where the directors are guilty of a fraud or a breach of trust, or are proceeding ultra vires." And it will be found that the English cases are to the same effect.

It is needless, then, for us to prolong this opinion by a further citation from decided cases, or to enlarge upon the obvious and manifest reason for the rule. The case at bar presents no fact that would invoke the jurisdiction of the court, under the well-settled rule of law above stated. According to the record, the appellants who own one-eighth of the capital stock of the company are the only stockholders who desire the sale vacated. It is further shown that all of the stockholders of the company were present, or were represented at the sale made by the trustee, and are satisfied with the mode and manner of the sale. In the answer of the company, it is stated "that all the stockholders except the appellants believe that the trustee who, besides representing the mortgagee, represents about three-eighths of the capital stock of the company, did all in his power to realize the best price possible, and his conduct met the approval of the company backed up by seven-eighths of its stockholders."

We find nothing under the facts of the case that would justify a reversal of the order appealed from, and it will be affirmed.

Order affirmed, with costs.

BRYAN et al. v. DOUDS et al.
(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)
FRAUDS, STATUTE OF — AGREEMENT AS TO LAND.

A parol agreement to buy lands at execution sale and resell them, and, after deducting the purchase price and expenses, pay over the balance to defendant in execution, is not enforceable, because within the statute of frauds.

Appeal from Orphans' Court, Beaver County.

Bill by Henry A. Bryan and Aaron Boone Bryan against Oliver A. Douds and others. From a decree dismissing the bill, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of the court below:

"The bill alleged that the defendant entered into an agreement with the plaintiffs to purchase the lands of plaintiffs at sheriff's sale, and pay off certain judgments and mortgages against the same, and hold the said lands for the plaintiffs until the same could be sold, at which time he was to pay himself whatever moneys he had advanced for the purpose aforesaid, and to pay the balance to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs further alleged that the lands were sold by the defendant for $22,000; that this is very largely in excess of the amount advanced by him in the purchase of the judgments and mortgages against the same, and the costs incurred by sheriff's sale thereof; that the mortgage of $10,000, payable July 1, 1905, with 5 per cent., from William J. Mellon and others, is part of the purchase money of a part of the lands. The plaintiffs pray that a preliminary injunction be issued against Oliver A. Douds to restrain him from in any way assigning or transferring the said mortgage to any one else than the said plaintiffs, and restraining the defendants from paying the said mortgage or any sum becoming due thereon to Oliver A. Douds, until this matter is finally adjusted and an accounting by Oliver A. Douds to plaintiffs for such sums of money as he has received from the sales of said real estate over and above his advancements and expenses therein; and that he be required to assign to plaintiffs so much of said mortgage as shall be found upon hearing is due under the terms of the agreement aforesaid. To this bill the defendants demurred, and alleged that the contract mentioned in the bill was void, for the reason that the bill does not show that the same was manifested by writing, and signed by the defendant Oliver A. Douds; and that the bill does not allege such facts as show a resulting trust in favor of the plaintiffs, for the reason that no fraud in obtaining the title is shown, or that the plaintiffs paid or furnished any part of the purchase money or the consideration of the lands, or any of them mentioned in the bill of complaint when the title thereto was acquired by the said Oliver A. Douds.

"The substance of plaintiff's bill is found in the fourth paragraph, in this language: 'The said Oliver A. Douds undertook and agreed, being a cousin of your orators, to buy in said lands at a sheriff's sale which would be made thereof, and hold the said lands for your orators until the same could be sold, at which time he would pay to himself whatever moneys he had advanced for the purpose aforesaid, and to pay the balance to your orators.' It is not alleged in the bill that the contract was reduced to writing and signed by Oliver A. Douds. The Supreme Court, in interpreting the act of 1858 in Barnet v. Dougherty, 32 Pa. 371, said: 'The plain meaning of this enactment is that a trust in land can now be proved in no other way than by writing. The proviso, indeed, excepts from its operation resulting trusts, such as the law implies. A resulting trust, however, is raised only from fraud in obtaining the title, or from payment of the purchase money when the title is acquired. Payment of the purchase money subsequently is not sufficient to raise a legal implication of a trust, as all the authorities show.' In Kellum v. Smith, 83 Pa. 158, the Supreme Court said: 'When the purchaser at a sheriff's sale promises to hold for the debtor, and afterwards refuses to comply with his engagement, the fraud, if any, is not at the sale, not in the promise, but in its subsequent breach. That is too late. It is abundantly settled that equity will not decree such a purchaser to be a trustee, unless there is something more in the transaction than the mere violation of a parol agreement.' In unmistakable language, in the case of Phillips v. Hull, 101 Pa. 567, the Supreme Court says: 'The plaintiff owned and was interested in judgments against the defendant in error aggregating about $11,000. The latter seeks to recover on a parol agreement made with the plaintiff in error, by which he was to sell the land at sheriff's sale, buy it, and hold it until a private sale thereof could be made, and after the amount due to him was paid, the defendant in error was to have the residue. The latter was to advance nothing, to pay nothing. Without his assent the plaintiff could have sold. The defendant made no agreement that he would afterwards purchase the land at any price. If this were the whole case, it is very clear the defendant in error could not recover. As the purchase was made and the money paid by the same person, a refusal to fulfill the agreement is no more than the violation of a parol agreement, and equity will not decree the purchaser to be a trustee.' In the case of Dollar Savings Bank v. Bennett, 76 Pa. 402, the Supreme Court also said: 'It is essential to maintain this action that the promise or undertaking of the defendant should be founded upon a sufficient legal consideration—either some benefit to the promisor or some injury to the promisee. Nothing is clearer in principle or better settled by authority than that a mere naked verbal agreement by a purchaser at a sheriff's sale, with his own money, that he will hold the premises in trust for the defendant, neither vests any equitable estate in the defendant under the statute which prohibits parol declarations of trust, so that no claim to the money could exist to him under the common count, nor does it give any ground for an action, being a mere nudum pactum. The mortgagees had a legal right to proceed on their judgment bond and to become the purchasers at the sale, if they were the highest and the best bidders.'

"There is no allegation in this bill that there was any fraud practiced by the defendant at any time, except in withholding the residue after payment of the amount advanced by him and his expenses. He being the owner of the judgment of Margaret A. Holt, and also the Gally mortgage, purchased the property at sheriff's sale, the plaintiffs allege, under this agreement to hold it for them; and, there being no fraud at the time the purchase was made by the defendant of the properties in question at sheriff's sale, his agreement to hold the same for them until it was sold, and give them the residue, was clearly a nudum pactum, and the plaintiffs have no ground of action. In the case of McCloskey v. McCloskey, 205 Pa. 491, 55 Atl. 180, the Supreme Court has further said: 'Though the trust is set forth as an express one, created by parol, the applicants seek to avoid the act of 1856, on the ground that a trust has resulted to them from the fraud of the appellees, and is therefore within the exception of the act. But the only misconduct charged is that the appellees now refuse to recognize the trust, and that, notwithstanding their promise to be bound by it, they now declare they will not regard it. This is not enough to take the case out of the plain words of the statute. If no valid trust was created in the first instance by William McCloskey, because he did not declare it in writing, there are no trustees to be bound by their promises, nor any cestuis que trustent to be protected. The statute of frauds would soon become a dead letter, if the mere broken promises of a trustee under a trust created by parol, who had agreed to carry it out, should, without more, be held sufficient to create a trust by implication within the exception of the act. It is only when a trustee refuses to perform or recognize a trust that courts are asked to declare its existence as against him, and, if a trust, which has no legal existence under the statute, can be brought into being as within the exception simply because a trustee breaks his promise to perform, no case will be without the exception. The statute of frauds would be worse than waste paper, if a breach of the promise created a trust in the promisor, which the contract itself was insufficient to raise.' And now, December 5, 1904, the demurrer is sustained, and the bill dismissed at the costs of the plaintiffs."

PER CURIAM. Decree affirmed, on the opinion of the court below.

T. W. PHILLIPS GAS & OIL CO. v. PITTSBURG PLATE GLASS CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. EVIDENCE—PAROL EVIDENCE—CONTEMPORANEOUS AGREEMENT.

Where a lessee attempts to use an oil and gas lease in direct violation of a contemporaneous parol agreement, parol evidence is admissible to establish the agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 2037.]

2. WITNESSES—CORROBORATION—EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY.

Where testimony is introduced to show a contemporaneous parol agreement made at the time of the execution of a lease, evidence of prior conversations and transactions is admissible in corroboration.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Armstrong County.

Action by the T. W. Phillips Gas & Oil Company against the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

At the trial the evidence of J. B. Barker was, inter alia, as follows: "Q. When did Mr. Woll first come to your house? A. He came there the evening of March 15, 1904. Q. Who were present? A. Why, my family. Q. What did Mr. Woll say? Give us the total conversation there as it took place. (Plaintiff's counsel objects to the question because it is not set up in the pleadings. The Court: We will hear the testimony and decide it afterwards. The objection is overruled, and a bill of exceptions is sealed to the plaintiff.)"

Defendant offered the following: "Know all men by these presents, that I, Joseph B. Barker, grantor and lessor in a certain article of agreement entered into with Samuel Runyon of the second part, dated January 19, 1900, covering all oil and gas rights in a certain tract of land in Valley township, Armstrong county, Pa., bounded on the north by James Schaeffer, on the east by D. J. Zimmerman, on the south by Charles Colwell and R. Adams, and on the west by W. W. Egley, containing sixty-three acres, more or less, which agreement has since been assigned to the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company, and the term of which lease as provided herein, to wit: Three years and as much longer as oil and gas is found in paying quantities or the rental is paid thereon, do hereby agree to and with the said Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company, assignee as aforesaid, who have heretofore and at the present time are paying the said rental, that the term of said lease shall be fixed as of twenty years from the date of said lease, and shall not exceed said twenty years, all provisions, stipulations, rights to surrender, rentals, royalties and times of payments to continue as fixed in said lease. The purpose of this agreement is to fix a definite term to said lease and to provide for the time of the expiration of said lease or agreement, subject to all rights of said lessee to surrender as aforesaid. Witness my hand and seal this 8th day of April, A. D. 1904. J. B. Barker. [Seal.] J. G. Shearer." (Plaintiff's counsel object; it purporting to be an extension of the lease dated April 18, 1904, when plaintiff's lease is dated March 16, 1904. The Court: We will receive it for the present. The objection is overruled, and a bill of exceptions is sealed to plaintiff.)

The testimony of B. J. Barker was, inter alia, as follows: "Q. You are a son of J. B. Barker? A. Yes, sir. Q. Were you at home this night Mr. Woll called there? A. Yes, sir. Q. Give the jury the conversation that occurred there. Begin with what Mr. Woll said; give the full conversation. (Plaintiff's counsel objects to this as something which took place, not at the making of the lease, but before the making of the lease. The Court: We will hear that conversation. For the present the objection is overruled, and a bill of exceptions is sealed to plaintiff.) A. Mr. Woll came there on the evening of March 15, 1904, and he wanted to get a lease for that 15 acres. My father told him that he could not lease it, that the Pittsburg Plate Glass Company had a lease on it. He asked him then to see the lease with the Pittsburg Plate Glass Company. I went and got a copy of that lease, and I showed it to him and he read it."

The court charged in part as follows: "But if you believe that in obtaining that written lease Mr. Woll perpetrated a fraud on Mr. Barker—that is, if he made a contemporaneous parol agreement, and on the faith of such agreement Mr. Barker acted, and would not have acted unless it had been made, if by that kind of a declaration on the part of Mr. Woll, and the agreement of Mr. Woll, that if the Pittsburg Plate Glass Company would go into possession of this property that then he would return the lease, Mr. Barker was induced to sign this lease—then Mr. Woll had no right to put that lease on record."

Plaintiff presented these points: "(2) That the pleadings in this case on the part of the defendants are not such as would authorize them to offer proof of a contemporaneous parol contract, changing and varying the written contract, under which plaintiff claims title, nor is the proof in the case such as would justify a chancellor, or justify a jury, in setting aside or varying or changing the written contract. Answer: Refused. The facts are for the jury. (3) Under all the pleadings and evidence in this case the verdict of the jury should be for the plaintiff. Answer: Refused, with leave to renew this question under Act No. 198, p. 286, of 1905."

Defendant presented this point: "(2) If the jury find that the plaintiff procured the lease offered by them under a parol contemporaneous agreement that it would be returned to Barker in case the defendant claimed the premises in suit under its lease, and that the defendant claimed the premises, then the refusal of the plaintiff to return the lease and the attempt to use it for the purpose of maintaining title is a fraud upon the defendant, and the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover. Answer: Affirmed."

Verdict and judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Clarence Walker, J. W. Lee, Eugene Mackey, and Ross Reynolds, for appellant. Orr Buffington, S. F. Bowser, O. W. Gilpin, and Rush Fullerton, for appellees.

MESTREZAT, J. This is an action of ejectment to recover possession of a tract of land in Armstrong county for oil and gas purposes. Both defendants filed an answer and abstract of title under the act of May 8, 1901 (P. L. 142). The answer of the defendant company, and in this respect the answer of the defendant Barker, is substantially the same, avers, inter alia, as follows: "That contemporaneously with the execution and delivery of the alleged lease of Barker to plaintiff's alleged assignor and as part of the alleged contract T. W. Phillips Sons & Co. entered into a parol contract with said Barker, whereby said partnership accepted the said alleged lease, subject to the existence and continuance of respondent's lease, and whereby said partnership agreed to at once return said alleged lease to Barker and cancel the same, and that the same should thereupon and ipso facto be and become null and void in the event of the respondent claiming or continuing to claim title under its said lease or upon its proceeding to operate the same. Respondent avers that immediately thereafter it claimed exclusive title to the premises for oil and gas purposes and immediately proceeded to and did drill a well producing natural gas in paying quantities, and that the said firm thereupon violated said parol contract, refused to return said alleged lease, refused to cancel the same and treat it as null and void as they had obligated themselves so to do." The correctness of this averment was the issue in the case.

If it was true, and the jury so found, the plaintiff company's lease had no validity and the company was not entitled to the possession of the premises in controversy. Whether the plate glass company's lease, assigned to it by Runyon, was still legally in force and effective against Barker, was immaterial in this issue. It would be important in a contest between that company and Barker for the possession of the premises, but not here, where the plaintiff company relies upon a lease from Barker to sustain its right to drill and operate for oil and gas on the land. If Barker chose to continue the Runyon lease, as his receipts of the rentals conclusively show he did, although it may, by its terms, have expired, he could do so, and, if the Phillips Company took a subsequent lease, which was, by a contemporaneous agreement, to be null and void in the event of the plate glass company "claiming or continuing to claim title under its said lease or upon its proceeding to operate the same," then the attempt of the Phillips Company to assert the validity of its lease in direct opposition to this agreement is a fraud upon Barker which he and those claiming under him with his consent may successfully resist.

That the defendants could set up as a defense to this action the parol agreement made contemporaneously with the plaintiff's written lease of March 16, 1904, is clear under all our cases. If the plaintiff company refused to surrender the lease for cancellation, in violation of its parol agreement, and asserted its right to the possession of the premises by virtue of the instrument, it was a fraud upon Barker, the lessor, and an attempt to make a fraudulent use of the lease. Parol evidence will be received in such cases to defeat the fraud. In Rearich v. Swinehart, 11 Pa. 233, 51 Am. Dec. 540, it was held that when an attempt is made to use a written instrument in violation of an agreement accompanying its execution, to which attempt no moral guilt can be imputed, a legal delinquency attaches to the attempted abuse of the writing, sufficient to subject it to the influence of oral evidence. The case of Davidson v. Young, 167 Pa. 265, 81 Atl. 557, was an issue between the obligee and obligor of a bond in which a contemporaneous parol agreement was set up as a defense. It was there held that the trial court committed no error in charging the jury that if the parties entered into that arrangement, although there was no fraud, accident, or mistake, and the obligee afterwards undertook to use the bond for a purpose that was not contemplated, and contrary to the agreement of the parties at the time the bond was executed, the obligor would be entitled to recover, for such use of the bond would be a fraud. In Honesdale Glass Co. v. Storms, 125 Pa. 268, 17 Atl. 847, Mr. Justice Green, delivering the opinion of the court, says (page 278 of 125 Pa., page 348 of 17 Atl.): "In that aspect of the case [setting up a written contract in violation of a parol promise] it comes within the very numerous decisions of this court which hold substantially that when the execution of an instrument has been obtained by means of a fraud, or where there has been an attempt to make a fraudulent use of the instrument, in violation of a promise or agreement made at the time the instrument was signed and without which it would not have been executed, parol evidence may be given to prove the fraud, though it contradict the written instrument." Many decisions of this court are cited in the opinion to sustain the principle.

The assignments alleging error in admitting the testimony of certain witnesses cannot be sustained. The testimony was not received for the purpose of establishing an agreement prior to the date of the execution of the Phillips lease, but as corroborative of the testimony adduced to show the parol agreement between the parties made contemporaneously with the written lease. For this purpose it was competent. Rinesmith v. Peoples' Freight Railway Company, 90 Pa. 262; Pyroleum Appliance Co. v. Williamsport Hardware, etc., Co., 169 Pa. 440, 32 Atl. 458; Hinchcliffe v. Koontz (Ind.) 23 N. E. 271, 16 Am. St. Rep. 403.

The judgment is affirmed.

SILVER et al. v. BUSH et al.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

MINES AND MINERALS—CONVEYANCES—RESERVATION OF MINERALS.

A deed granted certain parcels of land, together with all the hereditaments and appurtenances thereunto belonging and all the interest of the parties of the first part. The habendum clause stated that said land was conveyed to the second parties, "except the mineral underlying the same and a right of way to and from said mineral, which the first parties reserved." Held, that the mineral in the deed did not include natural gas, and that the grantee under the deed took the same.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Armstrong County.

Action by Mary Silver and others against U. G. Bush and the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company. From an order refusing to take off the nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

At the trial it appeared that Stephen A. Forrester conveyed to Ulysses G. Bush a certain tract of land in South Buffalo township, Armstrong county, containing 45 acres and 17 perches, to have and to hold the same, "except the mineral underlying the same and the right of way to and from said mineral, which the said parties reserve." The plaintiffs are the successors in title to Stephen A. Forrester, and under the above-quoted reservation claimed the right to take the natural gas from under the land of the defendants. The defendants are the grantee in said deed and those claiming under him, and deny that under the above reservation natural gas is excepted. The court refused plaintiffs' offer to prove that natural gas was being drilled for in the surrounding territory at and prior to the date of the deed. The court entered a compulsory nonsuit, which it subsequently refused to take off.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

W. J. Christy and James H. McCain, for appellants. Orr Buffington, O. W. Gilpin, and Rush Fullerton, for appellees.

MITCHELL, C. J. The conveyances to the defendants were of certain "pieces or parcels of land, * * * together with all and singular the improvements, ways, waters, water courses, rights, liberties, privileges, hereditaments and appurtenances whatsoever thereunto belonging, or in any wise appertaining, and the reversions and remainders, rents, issues and profits thereof, and all the estate, right, title, interest, property, claim and demand whatsoever, of the said parties of the first part," and the habendum in each deed is "to have and to hold the said piece or parcel of land except the mineral underlying the same, and the right of way to and from said mineral, which the first parties reserve." It is argued that the grantees took only an estate in the surface for agricultural and other strictly surface purposes, and that all minerals of every kind underlying the surface were excepted from the grant. But it is manifest that no such narrow construction can be sustained. The grant is of the land, and the additional words used are of the most comprehensive character, including all estates, interests, and rights in the land. Nothing whatever would have been left in the grantors, were it not for the reservation in the habendum, and that is of "the minerals underlying the same, and the right of way to and from" the same. The reservation must be read in its connection, and cannot be given a construction as extensive as the grant, for then it would be void for repugnancy. Even in a case where the grant was in terms only of the surface of the land, reserving "all coal and other minerals," it was held that the grantee took the entire fee to use for all purposes except mining, or taking the excepted minerals, or interfering with the grantor's reserved right to do so. Hendler v. Lehigh Valley R. R. Co., 209 Pa. 256, 58 Atl. 486, 103 Am. St. Rep. 1005. This court has had rather frequent occasion to consider the word "mineral," and to define its meaning in different connections. A number of cases are cited by appellant in which it has been decided that petroleum and natural gas are minerals. Of the fact that, under the broad division of all matter into the three classes of animal, vegetable, and mineral, petroleum and gas are minerals, there has never been any room for question, and even under some more restricted classifications the same result may be reached. But, on the other hand, it has also been held that in other connections they are not included under that term. There is no discrepancy in the cases. The variations in the scope of the word arise from the connection and application in which it is used.

The crucial question here, as in all contracts, is, what was the sense in which the parties used the word? Mineral is not per se a term of art or of trade, but of general language, and presumably is intended in the ordinary popular sense which it bears among English speaking people. It may in any particular case have a different meaning, more extensive or more restricted, but such different meaning should clearly appear as intended by the parties. A very recent discussion of the subject was had in Hendler v. Lehigh Valley R. R. Co., 209 Pa. 256, 58 Atl. 486, 103 Am. St. Rep. 1005, where it was shown that while the word "mineral" has a very broad meaning, already alluded to, and also a more restricted scientific use, it has also a commercial sense, in which it is most commonly used in conveyances and leases of land, and in which it may be presumed to be used in such instruments. In that sense it may include any inorganic substance found in nature having sufficient value separated from its situs as part of the earth to be mined, quarried, or dug for its own sake or its own specific uses. But, though it may include all such substances, it does not necessarily do so. Appellant cites the case as authority for the view that whatever comes within the terms of that description must necessarily be included under the word "mineral." But this is an untenable inference. That decision announced no new principle, nor any departure from the line of previous decisions. As already said, there is no discrepancy in the cases. The cardinal test of the meaning of any word in any particular case is the intent of the parties using it, and all that Hendler v. R. R. Co. did was to apply that test to the word "mineral" in the deeds on which the case turned. The substance there in question was sand, and it was shown that it might or might not be within the definition of mineral in the commercial sense, according to the circumstances and the intent of the parties.

In the present case the question arises in respect to natural gas; the plaintiff claiming that it was included in the reservation of "the mineral underlying" the land conveyed. Certainly such gas is a mineral in the broadest sense of the term, but no evidence was given or offered to show that the parties so understood or intended the word "mineral," or even that it had acquired a usage in conveyancing which would include gas. In Dunham v. Kirkpatrick, 101 Pa. 36, 47 Am. Rep. 696, it was expressly held that petroleum was not included in a reservation of "all minerals"; the court saying: "In popular estimation petroleum is not regarded as a mineral substance, and can only be so classified in the most general or scientific sense. How, then, did the parties to the contract think and write? As scientists, or as business men, using the language and governed by the ideas of everyday life?" It was held, therefore, that petroleum was not within the intent of the parties in reserving the minerals. And, a fortiori, natural gas would not be so included. This decision was part of the law of the state when the deeds in question were made, and to some extent at least, as was said by the learned judge below, it had become a rule of property on which many titles in Western Pennsylvania rested. To take any case out of its operation the evidence should be clear and convincing that the parties used the words in a different sense. The only effort of the appellants in that direction was apparently based on the view of Hendler v. R. R. Co., already referred to, that any substance mined or extracted from the land for its own sake is necessarily included in the word "mineral." Under this view offers were made to show that at the date of the deeds the land in that vicinity was already being developed for natural gas, which was known as a marketable commodity. These offers, however, even if proved, were not evidence that the parties used the term "mineral" in the sense contended for. They could only be ground for inference that the parties might have so intended, while, on the other hand, the offers themselves implied that the including of gas under the term "mineral" would be a new use of the term, and the inference would be strong that, if the parties intended to include gas, they would have said so expressly. The offers, therefore, were properly excluded.

Judgment affirmed.

SMITH v. HIBBS et al.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

QUIETING TITLE—RIGHT TO SUE—JUDGMENT.

Where, under a contract based on a valuable consideration passing to the owner of land, a person enters into possession thereof, the contract providing that the owner shall will it to the occupant, and the owner conveys the land to another for life, with remainder over to other parties on his death, the occupant may bring proceedings to quiet title under Act June 10, 1893 (P. L. 415), and may obtain judgment against both the life tenant and the remainderman, if they are made parties to the proceeding, which judgment will bar both parties and vest a good title in the occupant.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Greene County.

Action by William D. Smith against George L. Hibbs and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Thomas S. Crago, for appellants. J. B. Donley and D. S. Walton, for appellee.

STEWART, J. This is an action for the purchase money of real estate. The defense set up is that the title tendered is not marketable. The following facts appear in the case stated, and they are all that need be repeated here: The appellee, William D. Smith, being in possession, and claiming to be the owner, of the tract of land which is the subject of the contract of purchase. In September, 1903, began a proceeding under the act of June 10, 1893 (P. L. 415), to quiet his title to this land, in which proceeding the grantees, in a recorded deed of conveyance for the same premises from David Shoyer, under date of November 4, 1897, were made respondents. Smith's claim of ownership of the land was as follows: David Shoyer, Smith's grandfather, in 1884 had agreed with Smith that, if the latter would abandon his trade and live with and care for Shoyer and his wife, he (Shoyer) would buy a farm on which they would live together, and, "when Shoyer and his wife were gone or deceased," the farm should belong to Smith, Shoyer to make a will devising said farm to Smith in fulfillment of the contract. Pursuant to this agreement Shoyer bought this tract of land, the parties named moved thereon, and continued to reside there together until the death of Shoyer's wife in September, 1897. Shoyer, according to his agreement, on March 16, 1887, executed a will devising the farm to Smith. Shortly after he went to reside with his son, George, and, while there, on November 4, 1897, he executed and delivered a conveyance of this same land "to his son, George B. Shoyer, for life, and at his death to his wife, Elizabeth Shoyer, if she survive him, and remain his widow, to her for life, and at her death or upon remarriage, then the reversion and remainder to the use of Edward C. Shoyer and John Shoyer, children of the said George B. Shoyer and Elizabeth Shoyer, in equal shares, in fee simple, to them, their heirs and assigns forever," which conveyance was recorded on November 26, 1897, in the recorder's office of Greene county. Pursuant to the prayer in Smith's petition a rule was granted on the grantees under said conveyance to answer said petition within 20 days from service of the rule; and said parties, to wit, George B. Shoyer, Elizabeth Shoyer, Edward C. Shoyer, and John Shoyer, were duly served with said rule, and with notice to appear and answer at a day named in the notice. There was no appearance to this rule, and Smith, on April 18, 1904, prayed the court to award an issue to determine the title to said tract of land, and on the same day an issue was awarded as prayed for, the said George B. Shoyer, Elizabeth Shoyer, Edward C. Shoyer and John Shoyer being made the plaintiffs, and William D. Smith defendant, in the action, which was the same day entered as an action of ejectment in the court of common pleas of Greene county to No. 134, May term, 1904. The plaintiffs entered no appearance in said action, and no answer was filed by them or either of them. On November 22, 1904, the case was called, the jury sworn, and verdict rendered for the defendant for the premises described. Judgment was duly entered on the verdict on December 6, 1904, and no appeal has been taken therefrom. Title to the land in question is admitted in David Shoyer, subject to the equities of the said William D. Smith; and it is admitted that William D. Smith fully complied with all the terms of his contract with the said David Shoyer.

The question here presented, and the only one, is, does the verdict obtained by William

D. Smith, in the issue to No. 134, May term, 1904, in common pleas of Greene county, conclude the plaintiffs therein, the grantees named in the deed from David Shoyer, under date of November 4, 1897, from asserting their title to the land under said deed? No reason is suggested, and none is apparent, why it should not have this effect. We do not understand that its conclusiveness upon George Shoyer, the present life tenant, is questioned, since, were his title good, his right of possession would follow, and he could maintain ejectment to enforce it. The suggestion is made that inasmuch as the other parties defendant in the issue were remaindermen, and not in position to assert their title as against the party in possession, the case might be different as to them. This suggestion springs from the supposed analogy between the proceedings contemplated by the act of June 10, 1893 (P. L. 415), and an equitable ejectment action. True, in Ullom v. Hughes, 204 Pa. 305, 54 Atl. 23, it is said, referring to this act to quiet title, that the act expressly assimilates the proceeding to an equitable ejectment; but it does not result from this, that the scope and purposes of the act are to be narrowed by the application of the principles and rules which govern in ejectments. Indeed, in the case just cited it is expressly said that the act does not give a new right enforceable only in the prescribed way, but merely a new remedy for a right always existing, to defend title and possession. It is further held that the old remedies were not done away with by the act, but that the remedy provided was added for still greater convenience in certain cases to which it could be applied. The purpose of the act, as expressed in the enactment, is to quiet title. Before its passage the remedy, in such cases, was by bill in equity, and that a court of equity had jurisdiction to give the same relief that is contemplated by the act cannot be questioned. In Stewart's Appeal, 78 Pa. 88, discussing the rule in equity in such matters, Chief Justice Sharswood says: "The best expression of the rule, it seems to me, is to be found in the opinion of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in Martin v. Graves, 5 Allen, (Mass.) 601, by Merrick, J.: 'Whenever a deed or other instrument exists, which may be vexatiously or injuriously used against a party after the evidence to impeach or invalidate it is lost, or which may throw a cloud or suspicion over his title or interest, and he cannot immediately protect or maintain his right by any course of proceedings at law, a court of equity will afford relief by directing the instrument to be delivered up and canceled, or by making any other decree which justice or the rights of the parties may require.'" The equitable proceeding was available, not to quiet possession, but title; and it was never suggested that such remedy could be employed only as against those having a right of entry. It was directed against the adverse title by whomsoever asserted, and its object was to remove such title in some manner appropriate to the end sought.

While, as remarked in Ullom v. Hughes, 204 Pa. 305, 54 Atl. 23, equity thus came to the aid of the party in possession, who was threatened by an adverse title, the assistance was limited and not always adequate. Here we find as well the occasion for, and purpose of, the act of 1893. In Delaware & Hudson Canal Company v. Genet, 160 Pa. 343, 32 Atl. 559, both were considered, and it is there said of the act: "It was intended to give a party in possession the right and opportunity to institute a proceeding to test his title as against an adverse claimant. At common law the adversary might lie by concealed or quiet, and choose his own time for the contest, subject only to the risk that the statute of limitations might shut him out. The party in possession could do nothing but await the attack. Equity came to his aid by "bills to perpetuate testimony, to quiet title, etc., but this assistance was limited and not always adequate. In this state the act of May 21, 1881 (P. L. 24), gave the party in possession the further right, as against an adversary who had once asserted his claim in an ejectment, to rule him to bring his further action or be barred. The party in possession is no longer bound to await the attack, but may act on the offensive and bring on the battle at once." The general words employed in the act indicate a purpose to provide a remedy for the speedy settlement and determination of all cases where the right of any person in possession of lands "shall be disputed or denied by any person or persons aforesaid." Just what restriction, if any, can be derived from the use of the word "aforesaid," is not apparent; but it is very certain that nothing that precedes it in the text gives any warrant for the restriction here suggested. Accepting the purpose of the act to be what this court, in every case in which it has been considered, has held it to be, the word "aforesaid" as it occurs, can only be considered surplusage, and nothing more. If, then, in the issue tried, the court had jurisdiction of the parties—and upon the facts, as they appear in the case stated, we are of opinion that it had—it necessarily results that the parties who were plaintiffs therein and defeated are concluded with respect to the claim in that issue adjudicated, since the act provides that "the verdict of the jury in such issue shall have the same force and effect upon the right and title, and right of possession of the respective parties in and to the said land as a verdict in ejectment upon an equitable title."

Judgment affirmed.

COVER v. HOFFMAN.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. TRIAL—RESERVED QUESTIONS.

In order that a question of law may be reserved at the trial, the question reserved must be one of law purely, unmixed with any question of fact, it must be one that rules the case so completely that its decision will warrant a binding instruction, and it must be clearly stated, and the facts under which it arises must be admitted by the record or found by the jury; otherwise, the reservation will be incurably bad.

2. APPEAL—RESERVED QUESTION—NECESSITY OF EXCEPTIONS.

A judgment entered in pursuance of a question of law improperly reserved will be reversed, whether an exception was taken thereto or not.

3. TRIAL—RESERVED POINTS.

A reserved question, presented by points for a charge asking for binding instructions because plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict, and because a particular fact had not been established by a preponderance of the testimony, fails to present a pure question of law controlling the decision of the case, and is incurably bad.

4. CONTRACTS—BREACH—EFFECT—REMEDY.

Plaintiff sold defendant the real estate and stock of goods of a store, receiving a judgment note in part payment. At the time of the sale he agreed in writing that at the end of three years he would purchase the real estate and stock of goods then on hand on the same terms and conditions as those on which he had sold the same in case defendant then desired to sell. Defendant at the proper time gave due notice of his desire to sell and tendered a deed for the real estate which plaintiff refused to accept. Held that, notwithstanding his noncompliance with the agreement, plaintiff was entitled to recover on the judgment note; defendant being entitled merely to set off the damages which he had sustained by reason of plaintiff's breach of agreement.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Somerset County.

Action by J. M. Cover, to the use of B. S. Fleck, against Sarah J. Hoffman, administratrix of Jacob Hoffman, deceased. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

W. H. Koontz and J. G. Ogle, for appellant. W. H. Ruppel and A. H. Coffroth, for appellee.

FELL, J. The rules relating to the reservation of questions of law at the trial have been so fully considered in the recent cases of Fisher v. Scharadin, 186 Pa. 565, 40 Atl. 1091, and Casey v. Paving Co., 198 Pa. 848, 47 Atl. 1128, that a discussion of them is needless. They are: (1) The question reserved must be one of law purely, unmixed with any question of fact. (2) It must be one that rules the case so completely that its decision will warrant a binding instruction. (3) The question must be clearly stated and the facts upon which it arises must be admitted on the record or found by the jury. A reservation that violates any of these rules is incurably bad, and a judgment entered in pursuance of it will be reversed, whether an exception has been taken or not. The question reserved at the trial in this case was raised by points for charge presented by the defendant, one of which asked for binding instructions because on all the evidence the plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict, and another because a particular fact had not been established by a preponderance of the testimony. No one of these points presented a pure question of law, arising from undisputed or admitted facts and controlling the decision of the case. The reservation was bad and the judgment must be reversed.

Since the case goes back for trial, we now express our opinion on the main question involved, whether the failure of the plaintiff to comply with his agreement to purchase the real estate sold to the defendant and the stock of goods in his possession would preclude him from recovering any part of the consideration named in the note. The issue was to determine what was due on a confessed judgment which had been opened without terms. The plaintiff owned and conducted a country store. He was elected to a county office for the term of three years, and sold the defendant the real estate for $3,000 and the stock of goods and fixtures at a price to be determined by an appraisal, and he received a judgment note in part payment. At the same time he agreed in writing that at the end of three years, if the defendant at that time desired to sell, he would purchase the real estate and the stock of goods the defendant then might have in hand on the same terms and conditions on which he had sold. The defendant agreed that he would keep up the stock of goods, and, in the event of a sale to the plaintiff, that he would pay a reasonable rental for the real estate for the time he had occupied it. The defendant gave due notice of his desire to sell, as provided by the agreement, and tendered a deed for the real estate. The plaintiff failed to purchase, and the defendant's heirs afterwards sold the real estate at private sale for $1,500. If it should be established to the satisfaction of a jury that the plaintiff's failure to comply with his agreement was without adequate reason, he is not thereby precluded from recovering anything on the judgment. The defendant's obligation was, not to pay the purchase money if he elected to retain the store, but to pay in any event and at fixed times. The plaintiff's obligation was, not to take back what he had sold at the option of the defendant and in discharge of his debt, but to repurchase the real estate and to purchase a stock of goods which was not then in existence, but might be on hand at the end of three years. If by reason of the plaintiff's breach of the agreement the defendant has sustained damages, he may set off his loss against any balance due on the judgment. The case is one in which it will be difficult to work out the equities of the parties by a jury trial, and it will be well if they act on the suggestion of the learned trial judge and agree upon a form of reference by which their respective rights can be better determined.

The judgment is reversed, with a venire facias de novo.

EICHBAUM v. SAMPLE.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. CORPORATIONS — STOCK — SALE — PLEDGE — REDEMPTION.

Where plaintiff assigns certain bank stock on an agreement that the stock should be transferred back to him on payment of certain money advanced, with a right to redeem the stock at any time by such payment, the owner, whether such transaction was considered as a pledge or as a sale with an option, had a right to redeem on proper tender.

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—CONTRACT AS TO PERSONALITY.

Where the owner of stock sells it with an option to repurchase it, or pledges it, he may sue for a retransfer to himself, where the stock was not purchasable in the market, had no ascertainable market value, and it had a peculiar value to plaintiff, greater than the market price at the time of transfer.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Lawrence County.

Bill by William W. Eichbaum against Luther H. Sample. Decree for complainant, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Aaron L. Hazen and Richard F. Dana, for appellant. James A. Gardner and John M. Gardner, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The court below found as a fact that "about March 7, 1898, the plaintiff obtained from the defendant the sum of $6,390, being the then book value of the stock, which money was paid over to the Citizens' National Bank to apply on its indebtedness, and thereupon the said stock certificates were released by said bank and were by the plaintiff transferred, assigned, and set over in blank to the defendant, upon an agreement then and there made, as a consideration for said transfer, that the said stock certificates should and would be retransferred back and returned to the plaintiff upon payment by the latter of the said $6,390 with 6 per cent. interest thereon, less the dividends received by the said defendant on said stock during the time he held the same, with right in the plaintiff to redeem the said stock at any time he could raise moneys sufficient to pay the loan."

The court regarded the transaction as a pledge of the stock for a loan by defendant to plaintiff, and this is probably the correct view of what the parties intended, though no agreement of plaintiff to pay is specifically found, and some doubt therefore might have arisen as to his obligation for the balance of the debt, had the stock been sold without bringing enough to pay the advance in full. But this question is not material, as the transaction, if not a pledge of collateral for a debt, was clearly a conditional sale of the stock, i. e., a sale with an option in the vendor to repurchase on specified terms. The fact that the time was left indefinite was not fatal. In either view of the transaction, the defendant, whether pledgee or vendee, could bring it to a close by notice to pay or redeem in a reasonable time or be barred. Sitgreaves v. Farmers', etc., Bank, 49 Pa. 359, quoting 2 Kent's Com. *582.

The court also found as facts that the stock of the Citizens' National Bank is limited in amount; that 50 shares, or any part thereof, are not purchasable in the market; that they have no quoted or ascertainable market value; and that plaintiff held them as an investment having a peculiar value to him, greater than the market price at the time of the transfer. Under these circumstances the jurisdiction of equity to enforce a retransfer is well settled. Goodwin Co.'s Appeal, 117 Pa. 514, 534, 535, 12 Atl. 736, 2 Am. St. Rep. 696; Northern Central Ry. Co. v. Walworth, 193 Pa. 207, 44 Atl. 253, 74 Am. St. Rep. 683.

Decree affirmed.

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS — LICENSE BOND — SUFFICIENCY.

Where a petition is filed for a liquor license and a bond regular in all respects, except that the space left for the names of the proposed sureties is not filled in, is attached, the defect is not substantial, and will not defeat the application.

2. SAME—PETITION—AMENDMENT.

Where an application is filed for a liquor license, and the bond is defective, in that the space for the names of the proposed sureties is not filled in, an amendment allowing their insertion is improper, as it would introduce into the petition facts other than those stated therein when the petition was verified.

Mestrezat and Potter, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court.

In re Benjamin H. Matthew's license. From a judgment reversing an order refusing a liquor license on the application of Benjamin H. Matthew, an appeal is taken. Affirmed.

The petition, certificate, and bond filed in the court of quarter sessions were as follows:

"This petition respectfully represents that your petitioner is a citizen of the United States, of good moral character and temperate habits, and desires to keep a hotel, inn, or tavern, and prays your honorable court to grant him a license under the laws of this commonwealth, to sell liquors in quantities not exceeding one quart. Your petitioner further represents: (1) That his name is Benjamin H. Matthew, and that his present residence is Rockwood borough, Somerset county, Pennsylvania, and that he has resided there for more than one year last past. (2) The particular place for which license is desired is the 'Haines House' situate on the southeast corner at the intersection of Main and Market streets, Rockwood borough, Somerset county, Pennsylvania. (3) That your petitioner was born in Hazleton, Preston county, West Virginia, A. D. 1881. (4) The names of the owners of the premises where said business is to be conducted are Fred W. Biesecker and J. A. Berkey. (5) That the place to be licensed is necessary for the accommodation of the public, and is suitable, as well as necessary, for the entertainment of strangers and travelers. That he has for their exclusive use at least twenty-three bedrooms and twenty-three beds. (6) That your petitioner is not in any manner interested in the profits of the business conducted at any other place in said county, where any of said liquors are sold or kept for sale. (7) That your petitioner is the only person in any manner peculiarly interested in the business so asked to be licensed, and that no other person shall be in any manner peculiarly interested therein during the continuance of said license. (8) Your petitioner has not had a license for the sale of liquor in this commonwealth revoked during any portion of the year preceding this application. (9) The names of the persons who will be his sureties on the bond which is by law required are (1) ———, (2) ———, who are reputable freeholders of Somerset county, Pennsylvania, where the said liquors are to be sold; and your applicant further sets forth that each of the said sureties is a bona fide owner of real estate in the said county, worth over and above all encumbrances, the sum of $2,000, and that it would sell for that much at public sale, and that neither of said sureties is engaged in the manufacture of vinous, spirituous, malt, or brewed liquors.

Bond:

"Know all men by these presents, that we, Benjamin H. Matthew, principal, and (1) H. S. Swarner, (2) A. C. Sterner, sureties, are held and firmly bound unto the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in the penal sum of two thousand dollars, lawful money of the United States of America, to be paid to the said commonwealth, her certain attorney or assigns, to which payment well and truly to be made, we and each of us, do bind ourselves. and each of us, our and each of our heirs, executors and administrators, firmly by these presents. Sealed with our seals, and dated the 14th day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and five. Now the condition of this obligation is such that if the above bounden Benjamin H. Matthew, principal, and (1) ——— (2) ——— shall faithfully observe all the laws of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania relating to the selling or furnishing of vinous, spirituous, malt, or brewed liquors, or any admixture thereof, and shall pay all damages which may be recovered in any action which may be instituted against us under the provisions of any act of assembly, and shall pay all costs, fines and penalties which may be imposed upon us under any indictment for violating the act of May 18, 1887, and supplements, entitled 'An act to restrain and regulate the sale of vinous, and spirituous, malt or brewed liquors, or any admixture thereof,' or any other act of assembly relating to selling or furnishing liquors as aforesaid, then this obligation shall be void and of no effect, or else shall be and remain in full force and virtue. And further, we do by these presents empower the district attorney of Somerset county or any other attorney of any court of record of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to appear for us therein and confess judgment against us for the said penal sum, with costs of suit and release of all errors, and do hereby waive the right of inquisition on real estate, and all laws exempting real or personal property from levy and sale on execution.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

W. H. Ruppel, A. H. Coffroth, and J. C. Lowry, for appellant. J. A. Berkey, for appellee.

STEWART, J. In refusing the amendment asked for, the court below was entirely right, but for another and quite different reason than that given in the opinion filed by the presiding judge. Conceding the power of the court to allow a proper and adequate amendment, under the facts presented, the amendment proposed fell short of these conditions. What was asked for was leave to amend by inserting in the original petition the names of the sureties who were expected to join in the required bond. The inadequacy of the offer is apparent, when it is considered that, being made, the averment that each of the sureties "is a bona fide owner of real estate in said county, worth over and above all incumbrances the sum of $2,000, that it would sell for that much at public sale, and that the applicant is not engaged in the manufacture of vinous, spirituous, malt or brewed liquors," would stand unverified by the affidavit of petitioner, since, while this statement appeared in the original petition, the names of the sureties not being given, it was without meaning and had no place in the jurat of the applicant. Not only so, but, for like reason, the certificate of the 12 reputable, qualified electors "that they have reason to believe that each and all the statements contained in the petition are true," would be lacking as well; no such statement of fact appearing in the petition when they certified thereto. The effect of the proposed amendment being to introduce in the petition other facts than those stated therein, when the jurat and certificate were made, the impropriety of allowing such change need not be discussed.

The case turns on whether any amendment was necessary; or, in other words, whether the application as made was sufficient. In his opinion filed the learned judge says: "We would permit this amendment and grant the license, if we believed we had the power to do so." His conclusion that he had not the power rests entirely upon the omission of the names of the sureties from the petition, notwithstanding the fact that the applicant, in the judgment of the court, had complied with every requirement of the law, with the single exception referred to. The language of the court admits of no other meaning. The applicant then had satisfied the court, and in the way pointed out by the statute, that he was free from all legal disability in this connection, that the place to be licensed was necessary for the accommodation of the public, and that the sureties on his bond were sufficient. The inquiry here is, did the omission of the names of the sureties from the petition in any way defeat or interfere with the purpose of the statute? If it did, such omission would necessarily be fatal to the proceeding. The purpose of the several requirements as to what shall appear in the petition for a license to sell intoxicating liquors is not the same as to each. Some are manifestly intended to acquaint the public with certain facts with respect to the pending application in advance of the hearing. The publication of these is required to be made in two newspapers, to be designated by the court. The fact that publication of the names of the sureties is not required suggests that the chief, if not the only, purpose in requiring the names of the sureties to appear in the petition, was to aid the court in finally passing upon the adequacy of the bond that is necessary in all cases, since it is expressly provided that the license shall not issue until the applicant shall have executed a bond in the penal sum of $2,000, with two sufficient sureties to be approved by the court. With the names of the sureties appearing, and their sufficiency attested by the oath of the applicant, and the certificate of the required number of reputable electors, in the absence of anything to excite doubt or suspicion or contest, the court ordinarily can feel satisfied in approving the bond without inquiring further. The importance of such requirement, in aid of the court, will be readily understood by those whose duty it is to pass upon such questions. If it be said that the sufficiency of the bond being proper matter for exception, as much as any other fact set out in the petition, that the requirement in this particular can be none the less for public information, the answer is, it may be, but that information was not to be gained by publication, but by inspection of the papers filed. The law must so contemplate, otherwise, it would have required publication of the names of the sureties. Now, an inspection of the papers filed in this case could not have failed to disclose the names of the sureties. The bond was filed with the application, perfected by the signatures of the sureties. Under such circumstances, how can it be said that any essential requirement of the statute was omitted? It results that the omission of the names of the sureties from the petition, under the peculiar facts in this case, was not a substantial defect, and therefore ought not to have defeated the application.

The appeal is therefore dismissed, and for the reasons above stated the order of the Superior Court is affirmed.

MESTREZAT, J. (dissenting). It will be observed that the majority of the court agrees with the court of quarter sessions in refusing the application for an amendment of the petition for the license, and thereby reverses the judgment of the Superior Court on that question. This result accords with all the prior decisions of this court, and of the well-considered cases of the quarter sessions throughout the state. This court, however affirms the judgment of the Superior Court on the ground that no amendment of the petition was necessary, and that the application in its incomplete form was sufficient to warrant the quarter sessions in granting the license. In other words, the majority of the court holds that a license may be granted on a petition which omits the averment of some of the facts which the statute declares it "shall contain." This position of the court, in my judgment, cannot be sustained, either on principle or by precedent. It is at variance with the settled practice of every license court of the state. It also violates that provision of section 13 of the act of March 21, 1806 (4 Smith's Laws, p. 332; 1 Purd. Dig. 77), which provides that "in all cases where * * * anything is directed to be done by any act or acts of assembly of this commonwealth, the directions of the said acts shall be strictly pursued."

The act of May 13, 1887 (P. L. 108; 1 Purd. Dig. 1226), requires the applicant to file a petition and the facts which it shall contain are required by section 5 (page 109) to be set out in 10 separate and distinct paragraphs. The section provides in its ninth paragraph, inter alia, as follows: "Said petition shall contain * * *. Ninth. The names of no less than two reputable freeholders of the county where the liquor is to be sold, who will be his, her or their sureties on the bond which is required, and a statement that each of said sureties is a bona fide owner of real estate in said county worth, over and above all incumbrances, the sum of two thousand dollars, and that it would sell for that much at public sale, and that he is not engaged in the manufacture of spirituous, vinous, malt or brewed liquors." The petition presented to the quarter sessions to obtain this license omitted to state the names of two reputable freeholders of the county who would become sureties on the bond which the licensee is required to give. The effect of this omission, as correctly held by the majority of the court, was to leave out of the petition all the facts which the ninth paragraph of section 5 declares it shall contain. Ten days after the day fixed by rule of court for the hearing of the application the applicant asked leave to amend his petition "by writing therein in paragraph 9, the names of his sureties, to wit, H. S. Swarner and A. C. Sterner." This was refused by the quarter sessions, and its action is approved by this court. But this court holds that the license should have been granted on the petition as it was filed, notwithstanding it failed to set forth the facts required by the ninth paragraph of section 5 of the act of 1887. It will be observed that it is the positive mandate of the statute that the names of the bondsmen and the other facts stated in paragraph 9 shall be set forth in the petition. These are facts which the statute imperatively requires the applicant to include in his petition. They are, therefore, jurisdictional facts, and their omission from the petition is fatal to the application. If an applicant may neglect or refuse to include in his petition the facts required by the ninth paragraph of the fifth section of the act, he may omit any other facts which the statute requires he shall state in order to confer authority on the quarter sessions to grant the license. So far as it affects the question here involved, it is wholly immaterial what purpose actuated the Legislature in requiring the names of the bondsmen and the other facts mentioned in the paragraph to be inserted in the petition. It would not be difficult to show, if necessary, that it is a wise provision, and that there are abundant reasons why they should be included in the petition. But it is sufficient to say that the law which authorizes the court to grant the license—and in the absence of a statutory provision no license can be granted in this state—requires the applicant to file a petition, and positively and unequivocally says that "said petition shall contain" the facts set out in paragraph 9 of section 5 of the act of 1887.

I regard this decision of the court as most unfortunate. It strikes down the plain requirements of the statute which the Legislature, in obedience to the sentiment of the state, enacted, as its title shows, "to restrain and regulate the sale" of intoxicating liquors. Step by step the people of the commonwealth, through their representatives, have imposed greater restrictions upon the sale of liquors, and the settled policy of the state, as shown by the legislative enactments upon the subject, has ever been "to restrain" the liquor traffic. The present law is the most stringent legislation enacted since we became a commonwealth. Recognizing the unquestioned evils of intemperance, and desiring to abate them as far as possible, the act provides certain specific and stringent regulations, deemed necessary to carry out the purpose in view, with which the applicant must comply before he can be authorized by the court to engage in the traffic. It also imposes severe penalties upon those who sell or furnish liquors contrary to its provisions. In the face of this legislation and its obvious purpose, this court by its decision annuls the imperative command of the statute and thereby defeats the clearly expressed will of the people of the commonwealth. This is not judicial interpretation. It is the assumption by the court of legislative authority which has been conferred by the Constitution solely upon another and co-ordinate branch of the government. It in effect repeals one of the most wholesome provisions of a statute ordained for the purpose of regulating a traffic which, uncontrolled, is subversive of the morals of the people and endangers the peace and good order of the commonwealth.

I would reverse the judgment of the Superior Court, and affirm the order of the court of quarter sessions refusing to grant the license.

Appeal from Superior Court.

In the matter of the applications of Regan, McIntyre, Tressler, Kyle, Straub, Falknor, and Bloom for liquor licenses. From a judgment of the Superior Court reversing an order refusing a liquor license, appeals were taken. Affirmed.

STEWART, J. In the appeal to the Superior Court it was argued by counsel that the same judgment should be here entered as in Re Application of Benjamin H. Matthew, entered in that court to No. 262, of April term, 1905. The Superior Court passed upon no questions not presented in the former case; nor do we. For reasons stated in opinion this day filed in appeal of Benjamin H. Matthew (No. 143; Oct. term, 1905) 213 Pa. 269, 62 Atl. 837, the order of the Superior Court is affirmed.

DUPLEX PRINTING PRESS CO. v. CLIPPER PUB. CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. REPLEVIN — TRIAL — RESERVED POINTS — FORM OF RESERVATION.

Where, in an action of replevin, the real issue is one of title, the reservation of a point whether there is any evidence on which plaintiff can recover is improper in form, but is not fatally bad, where the court treats the reservation as if it were based on a request to direct a verdict for defendant, in which form the reservation should have been made.

2. EXECUTION — PROPERTY SUBJECT TO LEVY — PROPERTY SOLD CONDITIONALLY.

Goods in the hands of a vendee in a conditional sale are subject to levy by a creditor of the vendee, regardless of the rights reserved by the vendor as between himself and the vendee.

3. RECEIVERS — SALES — RIGHTS OF PURCHASER.

Where goods sold conditionally, with a reservation of title in the vendor, are taken into the possession of a receiver, appointed in a creditors' suit against the vendee who has become insolvent, the purchaser at a receiver's sale takes a good title, regardless of notice to him of the asserted rights of the vendor.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Westmoreland County.

Action by the Duplex Printing Press Company against the Clipper Publishing Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Following is the finding of facts of the court below:

"The property involved in controversy in this case was delivered to the Clipper Publishing Company on the footing of a conditional sale. The plaintiff proposed to build for that company and have delivered in running order at Greensburg, Pa., November 13, 1901, a printing press of defined mechanism and construction for the price of $8,500, $500 of which was payable on acceptance of the proposal, and $1,500 when the press was set up in good running order. It was further stipulated in the plaintiff's proposal that the Clipper Publishing Company 'shall give to us your notes for the balance of the purchase price, dated and drawing interest payable annually at six per cent. per annum from the date of the shipment of the press,' as therein set out in detail. The terms of the proposal were accepted and agreed to by the Clipper Publishing Company, and delivery was made on that basis. There was no attempt made to hire or lease the press on any defined terms. Only terms of barter and sale are employed by the parties. Nothing that could constitute the transaction a bailment, as distinguished from a conditional sale, appears in the contract, unless it is to be found in the following concluding paragraphs of the proposal, viz.:

"'You shall immediately, upon its receipt, insure and keep the press insured for our benefit, as our interest may appear, for $8,500, and send the policy to us, and the right, title and ownership to and of this press does not, and shall not, pass from us until all of the above payments have been fully paid. If you shall fail or neglect to pay any of the foregoing payments or notes for the space of thirty days after any of the above payments, interest or notes become due, then we or our representative may enter the premises wheresoever the press may be, and take the same into our possession, and remove it therefrom, at our discretion, and all the payments that may have been made previous to the time of such default in payment shall be held by us, under the legal principles applicable thereto, as a just compensation for the use of said press to the time of such default in payment, and for our loss and trouble in the matter.

"The delivery by you to us of any collateral, promissory note or commercial paper, either your own or of any third person, shall not be deemed a payment of any of the aforesaid sum until such is paid, and shall not prevent us from enforcing the foregoing agreement. When all payments hereunder shall have been made, then we will execute and deliver a bill of sale of said press.

"It is to be understood that if this proposal be accepted both parties shall be governed solely by the terms and conditions herein expressed, and not by any verbal agreement."

"The defendant became insolvent, and a receiver was appointed. The receiver, under order of court, sold the press to James K. Clarke. In a replevin brought by the Duplex Printing Press Company against the Clipper Publishing Company, Clarke was allowed to intervene to protect his title."

At the trial the court reserved the point whether there was any evidence on which the plaintiff could recover. The court entered judgment for defendant non obstante veredicto.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

V. E. Williams, A. M. Sloan, and W. F. Wegley, for appellant. A. H. Bell, for appellee.

MITCHELL, C. J. This is an action of replevin to try the title to a perfecting press manufactured and delivered by plaintiff to defendant under agreement that the title should not pass until the press was fully paid for. The purchaser (defendant) became insolvent, but before plaintiff had retaken possession under its retained title a creditor of the purchaser filed a bill, under which a receiver was appointed, who, under direction of the court, sold the press to one Clarke. By leave of the court this suit was brought, and Clarke allowed to intervene for the protection of his title.

At the trial the judge reserved the point whether there was any evidence on which the plaintiff could recover. While this is a permissible form of reservation in appropriate cases, it was not a good or convenient one here. The real issue was whether the receiver's sale gave Clarke a better title than that of plaintiff under its agreement, and it would have been much better to have reserved the question explicitly in that form. The facts not being disputed, this was a question of law. Or the point could have been raised, though less explicitly, by a request to the court to direct a verdict for the defendant. This being reserved, and the verdict taken for plaintiff, the whole case would have been under control of the court on the exact issue. The learned judge, however, in his opinion treated it on this basis; and, this being correct in substance, the error in form was not fatal. Williams v. Crystal Lake Water Co., 191 Pa. 98, 43 Atl. 208.

The contract between the original parties here was clearly one of conditional sale, and not of bailment. Ott v. Sweetman, 166 Pa. 217, 31 Atl. 102. This, indeed, is practically conceded by the course of appellant's argument. The references to decisions in other states upon the rights of the vendor as against creditors of the conditional vendee are therefore irrelevant. The law of Pennsylvania is settled that whatever rights the vendee may reserve as between himself and the conditional vendee the goods in the hands of the latter are subject to levy by his creditors. Brunswick, etc., Co. v. Hoover, 95 Pa. 508, 40 Am. Rep. 674; Forrest v. Nelson, 108 Pa. 481. Nor is it material that Clarke, the intervening purchaser, had notice of the vendor's continuing title, which is the main ground of appellant's argument. Clarke's title does not depend on his status as a bona fide purchaser without notice, but on the powers of the receiver who made the sale.

We come, therefore, to the real point of the case, which is the title that passed to the purchaser by the sale. The authority of a receiver and the effect of his action depend almost entirely on the purpose of his appointment and the extent of his powers conferred by the decree appointing him. The paper book of the appellant is quite defective in failing to print the bill on which the receiver was appointed, the decree appointing him, or even the order of the court authorizing the sale, and, as the appellee furnished no paper book, we get no assistance from that quarter. The learned judge below, however, has stated the facts very clearly, that the proceeding in which the receiver was appointed was made part of the evidence in this case, and "the bill and answer show that complainants therein proceeded in behalf of themselves as creditors, and on behalf of the other creditors of the Clipper Publishing Company, on account of the alleged insolvency of the defendant, which allegation of insolvency was admitted by the defendant corporation. The appointment of a receiver was, therefore, professedly made for the protection of creditors of an insolvent corporation, and the order of sale by the receiver was made to subserve their rights. The authority conferred on the receiver came, not from the creditor or from the debtor, but from the law itself." From this it must be assumed that the receiver in this case represented the creditors in whose interest he was appointed, and was clothed with all the powers the creditors would have had in acting for themselves.

Tams v. Bullitt, 35 Pa. 308, was an action by trustees under the insolvent law to recover money received by a third party for the use of the insolvent. The trustees were apparently appointed under the insolvent act of June 16, 1836 (P. L. 731), though the act is not mentioned in the report. By that act the insolvent, before his discharge, was obliged to make an assignment to trustees, and (section 84, p. 737) such trustees were thereupon deemed to be vested with all the estate, rights, etc., of the assignor, and capable of suing in their own names for all such estate, etc. In sustaining the action this court, per Strong, J., said: "The right of plaintiffs to recover might well depend upon the question whether the transactions between William Tams and John Tams were honest or in fraud of creditors. As between the two brothers, there may have been no right in John to recover money received by William, but, if the money came to William's hands in pursuance of a fraudulent arrangement, the plaintiffs who were clothed with the rights of creditors could disregard that arrangement and recover when John Tams himself could not." And again: "If, by virtue of a fraudulent arrangement between John Tams and William Tams, the money of the former came to the hands of the latter, assignees acting under a compulsory assignment could recover it."

A voluntary assignee for the benefit of creditors is a mere representative of the debtor, and is bound where he would be bound (Wright v. Wigton, 84 Pa. 163); but Tams v. Bullitt establishes the distinction that when the assignee, trustee, or whatever he may be called derives his authority, not from the mere voluntary act of the assignor, but from the mandate of the law, even when enforced in the language of that case, through a "compulsory assignment" from the debtor in the interest of the creditors, he represents the latter, and is vested with their powers. The same principle applies a fortiori to a receiver deriving his authority, not at all from the debtor, but altogether from the court acting in the interest and for the enforcement of the rights of creditors. When, therefore, on a creditors' bill, a receiver is appointed for an insolvent corporation, he is not limited, like an assignee for the benefit of creditors, by the rights of the debtor corporation as to property held by it under a conditional sale, but has the rights of a levying creditor, and a sale by him passes a good title against the vendor, irrespective of the purchaser's status as a creditor either with or without notice. Judgment affirmed.

IN RE LOGAN & MOULDS' ASSIGNED ESTATE.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

A departure of the court from the form of a rule is immaterial, where the matter is within the court's discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 3808.]

2. SAME—REVIEW—FINDINGS OF AUDITOR.

A finding by an auditor based on competent evidence and confirmed by the court below will not be reversed, in the absence of manifest error.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 4015-4018.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Beaver County.

In the matter of the estate of Logan & Moulds. From an order dismissing exceptions to auditor's report, Hannah I. Moulds appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

J. H. Cunningham, for appellant. W. A. McConnell, Alfred P. Marshall, David A. Nelson, and Winfield S. Moore, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The appellant's claim was presented at the audit of the first account of the receiver, testimony taken in regard to it, and the auditor passed upon it adversely, but before his report was confirmed the claim and the evidence upon it were withdrawn by leave of the court. Upon the audit of the receiver's second account the claim was again presented, and after testimony had been taken in regard to it, the claimant demanded an issue. This the auditor refused, on the grounds that, all facts being before him, there was no occasion for an issue, and, further, that the demand was too late. This raises the first question in the case.

The rule of the court below on the subject of auditor's reports, provides for a hearing on exceptions to confirmation, etc., and that "if the court think that a question of fact ought to be tried by a jury, it may order an issue or issues for the purpose." It would have been more regular for the auditor to have followed the rule strictly and instead of refusing the issue himself, to have reported the demand and the evidence to the court. Whether or not the demand was too late was not clear, as it might depend largely on the court's view of its previous order allowing the withdrawal of the claim from the first audit. But this error of the auditor, whether material or not, was cured by the subsequent action of the court which reviewed the whole matter and confirmed the result arrived at by the auditor. Where a matter is within the discretion of the court, as this clearly was, and the substance of the rule is observed, a departure by the court from the form of the rule is immaterial.

The second question is upon the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the claim. The only testimony was by the appellant herself, her husband and their son, who testified that the policy was taken out by the husband for the wife, in pursuance of a previous agreement between them; that when it was delivered to him he took it home and gave it to his wife saying it was hers; that she put it in a box they had "for keeping papers in," and she retained that possession until it matured; that she "looked after the payment of the premiums," though they were paid with his money, because he "had the money lying with the firm, and drew on the firm and gave her the money"; and that he was not in debt at that time. Against this the evidence, as summed up by the auditor, was that the policy was taken out by the husband on his life, to mature in 15 years, payable in case of his death before maturity to his wife, and at maturity to himself. He lived until the policy matured. It was paid to him, in a check to his order, deposited in his name in the bank, though the deposit was claimed to have been actually made by the wife, and shortly thereafter a part of it checked out by him and given to the firm of which he was a member. Furthermore, part of the proceeds of the policy was given by Mr. Moulds to his son, a part used by him to pay a debt of his to the bank, and a part used for payment of the household expenses of the Moulds' home. The auditor therefore found that the title to the money had never passed out of the husband, and accordingly rejected the claim.

On exceptions, the court reviewed the whole case, and, though taking a somewhat more lenient view of the appellant's testimony, yet came to the same conclusion as the auditor. "The claim is contradicted," he said, "by every record in the case," and, conceding that every word of the appellant's testimony and her husband's might be true, yet as a whole it is not clear and convincing, and falls short of the standard required to establish such a claim against creditors. This conclusion was irresistible.

Decree affirmed.

BEAVER VALLEY WATER CO. v. CONWAY BOROUGH.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. WATERS — WATER COMPANIES — USE OF STREETS.

Where a water company is required to obtain a permit from the town council, under a borough ordinance, before laying its mains in the streets, the application must be made to the council, and not to the burgess.

2. SAME—REASONABLE REGULATIONS.

A borough ordinance, requiring a water company to apply for permission to lay mains in the streets to the town council, is a reasonable regulation.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Beaver County.

Suit by the Beaver Valley Water Company against the borough of Conway. From a decree continuing preliminary injunction, defendant appeals. Reversed.

The court below (Wilson, P. J.) found the following facts:

"(1) The plaintiff, the Beaver Valley Water Company, is a corporation of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, organized and existing under an act of assembly approved April 29, 1874 (P. L. 78), and the defendants are a municipal corporation in the county of Beaver.

"(2) The plaintiff company has a right to lay its water mains in the streets and alleys of the borough of Conway for the purpose of supplying water to the inhabitants, subject to only such regulations as may be lawfully imposed by the proper authorities of said borough.

"(3) On March 14, 1903, Ordinance No. 6, was approved by the burgess, after it was enacted by the town council and provides as follows:

"An ordinance regulating the opening of streets in the borough of Conway and providing a penalty for the violation thereof.

"Be it enacted and ordained by the town council of the borough of Conway, and it is hereby enacted and ordained by the authority of the same, that it shall be unlawful for any person or persons, corporation or corporations, to enter upon any of the streets and excavate same for the purpose of laying pipe or pipes for the transportation of gas or water or any other substance without first obtaining a permit from the town council of said borough granting them permission so to do.

"Any person or persons, corporation or corporations violating the provisions of the foregoing ordinance, shall upon conviction thereof before the burgess or any justice of the peace of said borough, forfeit and pay for the use of said borough a fine of not less than $25.00 nor more than $50.00, and in case of failure to pay said fine so imposed, shall be committed to the county jail for a period of not more than one day for each dollar of fine so imposed and not paid."

"(4) At No. 13, June term, 1903, in the matter of a bill in equity filed by the borough of Conway against the Beaver Valley Water Company, this court adjudicated and determined the rights of the plaintiff in the premises, and therein held and decreed that the plaintiff company had the right to enter upon the streets and alleys of the borough of Conway without the consent of the town council, subject only to such reasonable regulations as the proper authorities of said borough should impose.

"(5) On April 12, 1905, John T. Taylor, general manager of the plaintiff company, desiring to open certain streets in said borough for the purpose of laying water pipes to supply the inhabitants of said borough, at their request, with water, applied to the chief burgess for a permit, and was refused, being informed at that time that the town council had directed him (the burgess) not to grant the permit, and further stated that the plaintiff company had no rights upon the streets of the borough."

The court entered a decree continuing the preliminary injunction.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Forest G. Moorhead and Edwin S. Weyand, for appellant. William A. McConnell and Lyon, McKee & Mitchell, for appellee.

ELKIN, J. The only question arising on this appeal is whether the ordinance requiring the water company to obtain a permit from the town council before proceeding to lay its mains through the streets of the borough is a reasonable regulation within the meaning of the act of assembly. The defendant borough, through its town council, passed an ordinance which in substance provides that before any gas or water company shall enter upon the streets or alleys thereof, for the purpose of laying mains or pipes, a permit must be obtained from the town council. It is contended here, and the court below so held, that this is an unreasonable regulation, and therefore void and of no effect. The plaintiff averred in the bill filed that the ordinance in question was unreasonable and was passed with the expectation and intention of depriving plaintiff from exercising its right to enter upon the streets and alleys of the borough. The learned court below granted a preliminary injunction on the ground that the ordinance was unreasonable, because uncertain, and made the right of the plaintiff to enter upon the streets for the purpose of laying its water mains dependent upon the humor or caprice of the town council.

The facts do not justify the conclusions reached in these respects. The town council cannot act arbitrarily or capriciously in such matters, and, if any such attempt be made, the courts, if applied to, would promptly and effectively grant the necessary relief. In this case, however, defendant disavows any such intention, and there is nothing in the evidence to show that it is not acting in good faith. The borough has a right to know what streets are to be occupied, how long they are to be torn up while excavating and laying pipes, and at what place and in what manner the mains are to be laid. It is proper and reasonable that these things should be considered when a permit is granted. What more reasonable regulation could be made than that a water company, about to enjoy the privilege and exercise the franchise of laying its mains on the streets of a borough, should first apply to the town council for a permit, which must issue as of course upon compliance with such reasonable regulations as may be imposed by that official body.

It is argued that the provisions of the ordinance were complied with by making application for a permit to the burgess, which was refused. The answer to this contention is, an application to the burgess is not a compliance with the ordinance. The application should have been made to the town council, and this was not done. The ordinance was a reasonable regulation imposed by the proper authorities, and therefore valid. It was not complied with in the matter of obtaining a permit from the town council, and the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief prayed for.

Order and decree of the court reversed, at the cost of the appellee.

BURNS v. PENNSYLVANIA R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. TRIAL—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE—PURPOSE OF OFFER.

Where plaintiff offers evidence without showing the purpose, and defendant objects, assuming that it is inadmissible for a certain purpose, the court cannot assume that another and legitimate purpose was intended.

2. SAME.

In an action for an accident at a crossing, plaintiff offered evidence that no gates or watchmen were at the crossing, and defendant objected, on the ground that it was not required to erect gates or place watchmen at such crossing. Held error to overrule an objection on the ground that the evidence was admissible to show the speed reasonably consistent with public safety at the crossing, where plaintiff did not claim to introduce it for that purpose.

3. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS—IGNORING EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action by a wife to recover for the death of her husband, two witnesses testified as to the wages received by the decedent, and the timekeeper of the company in whose employ he was at the time of his death testified that he only received one-half of such amount, it was error in charge to refer only to the testimony of the two witnesses, without reference to the testimony of the timekeeper.

4. SAME—APPLICATION TO EVIDENCE.

Where the evidence shows that an accident was caused by a person getting into a position of danger, and not in attempting to get out of such position, it was error to instruct as to the law where one is lawfully in a position of danger and is injured in attempting to escape.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Cambria County.

Action by Catherine Burns against the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

At the trial plaintiff was asked this question: "Q. Please state whether there were any gates or watchmen stationed at that crossing. A. No, sir. (Objected to as being incompetent and immaterial and improper, because it is not required of the company that it shall erect safety gates or place watchmen at crossings of this character. The Court: The objection is overruled, exception noted, and bill sealed for the defendant company. We do not hold by this ruling of the court that the company is obliged to station watchmen or to erect gates at the crossings, but we believe it to be a fact which the plaintiff is permitted to prove in the case.)"

The court charged in part as follows:

"Mrs. Burns, his wife, has testified that his check amounted to from $35.00 to $40.00 every two weeks; and the evidence of Mr.

Thelss was that his wages averaged from $75.00 to $80.00 per month."

"In view of the arguments of counsel in the case and the suggestion of counsel for the plaintiff, without having submitted a special point, we instruct you that, where one is lawfully in a position of danger, he is not required to exercise the same cool, deliberate judgment that might be required of him under different circumstances; if in attempting to evade danger he makes a mistake and does not employ the best means of escape, he is not held responsible. As we suggested, we do not see how this question can be seriously considered in the case, but we may not view it as the counsel do, and we will let you pass upon it."

Verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $12,537. Defendant appealed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

H. W. Storey, for appellant. E. T. McNeelis, for appellee.

STEWART, J. This case was before us in 210 Pa. 90, 59 Atl. 687. It is unnecessary to repeat the facts here. Sufficient to say that it is an action brought by a wife to recover damages for the death of her husband, who was killed by a passing train while attempting to pass over the tracks of defendant company, at a public crossing in the suburbs of Johnstown, on the morning of January 9, 1903. In this second appeal we have 31 assignments of error. The number would not be nearly so great, had proper effort been made to avoid unnecessary duplication. It would have been lessened materially, had the distinction in function between court and jury been kept in mind; while several, not otherwise open to criticism, would have been omitted, if what was said by this court in 210 Pa., 59 Atl., supra, had been closely observed. It would, without serving any good purpose, extend this opinion to unreasonable limits, were we to discuss each separate assignment. All have been considered. Those to which we make no special reference may be regarded as dismissed, and the reasons may be gathered from the observation above.

We pass directly to the consideration of the ninth, which complains of error in the ruling that permitted plaintiff to show the absence of safety gates and watchmen at the crossing where the accident occurred. When the witness on the stand was interrogated as to this, nothing was said as to the purpose, nor was any demand made that it be expressed, but an objection was promptly made that indicated very clearly what the objecting counsel supposed the purpose to be; the ground stated in the objection being incompetency and immateriality, "because it is not required of the company that it shall erect safety gates, or place watchmen, at crossings of this character." If the purpose was to ascribe negligence from failure to have gates and watchmen at the crossing—and that is what the objection as stated assumes—the objection should have been sustained, both in view of the law and the pleadings in the case, except as another and competent purpose had then been asserted. The plaintiff failing to disclose any purpose, and failing to disclaim that attributed in the objection, the court should, of its own motion, have required the purpose to be expressed, or have ruled the matter as though the purpose was what the objection said it was. The court adopted neither course, but overruled the objection, with the observation that "we do not hold by this ruling that the company is obliged to station watchmen or to erect gates at the crossing, but we believe it to be a fact which the plaintiff is permitted to prove in the case." This was begging the question. The plaintiff's right to prove the fact depended on the use it was proposed to make of it; and, in the absence of any disclaimer from plaintiff that the purpose was what was expressed in the objection, the court had no right to assume that another and legitimate purpose was intended. The language used by the learned judge shows clearly that he understood the objection to be directed to a particular purpose, which he admitted would make the evidence inadmissible. It was admissible for one purpose only. That flagmen are not stationed at the crossing, and that gates are not maintained there, are matters proper to be considered in connection with other facts in a given case, in determining the rate of speed which is reasonably consistent with public safety. Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. v. Brandtmaier, 118 Pa. 610, 6 Atl. 238. The negligence charged here was the excessive rate of speed, under the condition there existing. Failure to maintain gates or keep watchmen at the crossing was not charged in plaintiff's statement as negligence, except as connected with disregard of a borough ordinance, which we held, when the case was here before, imposed no duty or obligation on the defendant company. The only legitimate purpose for which the evidence could be used was to exhibit to the jury the situation and conditions where the accident occurred, so that they might the more intelligently pass upon the question in issue, viz.: Was the speed of the train reasonably consistent with public safety, or was it not?

We remark further that, while the evidence would have been admissible for the purpose above indicated, yet, because of the danger which must always attend the introduction of such a fact, in a case of this character, of its significance being misapprehended, its admission should always be followed by proper instructions from the court as to how it is to be considered and applied by the jury. Not only was there failure in the court to instruct the jury as to the effect they were to give the evidence, but the observation of the court, "that it was a fact which the plaintiff is permitted to prove in the case," admitted it into the case with unbridled license, to serve any purpose the jury might ask of it. The preceding remark, that by the ruling "the court did not hold that the company was obliged to station watchmen or erect gates at the crossing," did not restrict it, since the inference that the average juror would be likely to derive from the observation would be that, being a question of fact, and not of law, it was for the jury to decide whether the company was guilty of negligence in this particular. They had the fact before them, to make some use of, and were left to guess in what way it should be applied. Apart from this consideration, however, we are of opinion that, as the matter stands on the record, having regard to the question asked, the want of an offer as to purpose, and the objection stated, the objection should have prevailed. In so holding we do not overlook the rule, so repeatedly recognized, that, where evidence is pertinent for any purpose, its admission is not error. This rule applies only where the objection made was general. Here it was specific.

The thirtieth assignment complains that the court's charge was inadequate and unfair on the question of damages, in that, while reference was made to the testimony of each of the plaintiff's witnesses in relation to the earning capacity of plaintiff's husband, no reference whatever was made to the testimony on this point by the defendant's witnesses. The examination of the court's charge shows this statement to be entirely correct. The deceased had been a puddler employed at the Cambria Steel Works, and his employment there had continued 13 or 14 years. The two witnesses called by the plaintiff, neither of whom can be supposed to have any more accurate knowledge on the subject than the witness for defendant, testified that he was accustomed to receive from $70 to $80 per month in wages. The witness called by the defendant was the time officer of the company that employed the deceased. He testified that for the year 1908, the year immediately preceding the accident, the deceased had received in wages the sum of $640.02, and for the year preceding that, the sum of $663.94. Here was a marked difference, not attempted to be explained, yet no reference whatever to it in the charge, but specific reference to the evidence which fixed the yearly earnings at a sum in excess by $300, or nearly so, of the amount testified to by defendant's witness. The general effect of the charge on this branch of the case, in wholly ignoring the testimony for the defendant, and calling attention to the testimony for the plaintiff, would most likely be to create the impression in the minds of the jury that the testimony referred to was conclusive on the subject. Their attention was called to no other. It was not simply an inadequate presentation of the evidence on an important feature of the case, but is fairly open to the criticism that it was one-sided as well. We express no opinion on the amount of the verdict; that was exclusively for the jury. What we do say is that we cannot be made certain that it would have been the same, had the evidence on this point been adequately and fairly commented upon and submitted by the court. This assignment is sustained.

There is nothing in the case that called for the instruction given by the court, as to the law governing cases where one lawfully in position of danger is injured in attempting to escape. Plaintiff's husband was killed in consequence of his getting on the tracks, not as a result of an effort to get off. There were enough questions in the case to engage the serious attention of the jury without importing others that were without relevancy. This of itself might not constitute reversible error; but, when followed by an express direction to the jury, as was the case here, to pass upon it, that is, upon a question of fact absolutely without support in the evidence, the error becomes of too serious import to pass by with simply a word of disapproval. The thirty-first assignment is sustained.

For reasons thus stated, the judgment is reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENT.

Where, in one proceeding, there were included the opening of a part of a street on a new location, the widening of the part that had been opened before, and the grading of the whole, an assessment of damages and costs was not illegal, where the whole improvement was provided for by one ordinance and done under one contract.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Lawrence County.

In the matter of Wilmington avenue. From an order dismissing exceptions to report of viewers, Joseph S. White appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

S. W. Dana, Robert K. Aiken, W. H. Falls, and Richard F. Dana, for appellant. James A. Gardner, City Sol., for appellee.

FELL, J. This appeal is from an order confirming the report of viewers assessing the damages, costs, and expenses of a street improvement. The single question raised by the appeal is whether the assessment against the appellant's land is illegal because there were included in one proceeding the opening of a part of a street on a new location, the widening of the part that had been opened before, and the grading of the whole. Wilmington Road enters New Castle from the north, and formerly connected with Jefferson street at Wallace avenue. The line of the road was a few degrees west of the line of the street, and an obtuse angle was formed at the point of connection. Jefferson street was extended, of its full width of 80 feet, 850 feet north of Boyles avenue, and was opened and graded under a separate ordinance and contract, and the damages were assessed under a separate proceeding. At Boyles avenue the location of the road was changed for a distance of 500 feet, so as to meet Jefferson street as extended. The new part was laid out of the width of 60 feet, and it was provided that the old part should be widened to correspond with this width. The result of the change was that in place of the road 50 feet wide an avenue, partly on new land and partly on the old roadbed, was laid out of the width of 60 feet in a straight line from Jefferson street to the north limit of the city. The opening of the new part, the widening of the old part, and the grading of the whole were provided for by one ordinance and done under one contract.

The appellant's contention is that the extension of Jefferson street and the construction of the new part of Wilmington avenue constituted one improvement, and the widening and grading of the old part of the avenue another distinct improvement, and that in a proceeding to assess costs and expenses there could not be included with the latter the opening and grading on the new location. To this contention it is sufficient answer that the appellant has no just ground of complaint, unless his property at the north end of the avenue was improperly assessed for damages for land taken at the south part, or for costs to which it should not have been subjected. No objection is based on this ground. There were no exceptions to the amount of the assessments made by the viewers, and it appears from their report that the properties at the north end of the avenue were not assessed to pay for the taking of land on which they did not abut. Presumably the costs of widening and grading were properly apportioned and assessed. But the improvement of Wilmington avenue north to the city line was a single improvement, which included the opening and widening to established lines, and the grading for the entire length, including the bed of the old road. It was so treated by the city authorities in directing the work to be done and in contracting for it as a whole.

The order dismissing exceptions and confirming the report is affirmed, at the cost of the appellant.

LITTLE v. CENTRAL DISTRICT & PRINTING TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES—USE OF HIGHWAY—STATUTORY LIMITATIONS.

The right of a telegraph and telephone company conferred by Act April 29, 1874, § 33 (P. L. 92), to place its poles on public highways, must be exercised within the statutory limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Telegraphs and Telephones, § 6.]

2. SAME.

Act April 29, 1874, § 33 (P. L. 92), conferring on telegraph and telephone companies the right to place their poles on public highways, does not deprive the public of the use of the highways for any proper and reasonable means of travel, and the companies must exercise the franchise granted to them in subordination to the rights of the public.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Telegraphs and Telephones, § 6.]

3. SAME—INJURIES FROM CONSTRUCTION OF POLES.

A telephone company which places its poles so near the traveled portion of a highway that a person seated on a wagon, with his feet extending about one foot from the side of the wagon, is injured by coming in contact with the pole, is liable for such injury.

4. HIGHWAYS—PERSONAL INJURIES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Whether a person riding on a wagon was guilty of contributory negligence in permitting his feet to extend beyond the side of the wagon, so that they came in contact with a telephone pole standing near the traveled portion of the highway, was a question for the jury, where the danger was not so apparent that a reasonably prudent person would not have taken the risk.

5. NEGLIGENCE—VICARIOUS NEGLIGENCE.

Where the driver of a private conveyance is not employed by the person riding therein, the negligence of the driver cannot be imputed to such person.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Butler County.

Trespass by Eleanor C. Little against the Central District & Printing Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

At the trial the court, after reading to the jury section 33 of the act of April 29, 1874, (P. L. 92), charged, inter alia, as follows:

"So, gentlemen, you will see under the law the defendant company had the right to place its poles along or upon the public highway, but in so doing it must not so place them as to incommode the public use of the highway. As you all know the public highways are created in the first instance and principally for the use of the travelers upon them, and that public use must not be rendered dangerous or inconvenient by telegraph companies in placing poles upon it. Now, gentlemen, the company had therefore the right to place its poles upon the public highway; it did not have the right and would not have the right to place the poles upon the traveled portion of the road. You understand what is meant by that, the part that customary travel occupies and takes on the public highway. It would not have the right to plant its poles on that portion of the highway, and I would say it would not have the right to place its poles in such near proximity to the traveled track of the highway as to render the highway unsafe or inconvenient. In placing its poles so as to not incommode the use of the highway, therefore, we think it should not place its poles in a position to render inconvenient and unsafe public travel along the highway. If in placing them, they are located upon the traveled portion of the public highway, the traveled track, that, gentlemen, it would go without saying, would be placing them where they would inconvenience, at least, the travel. If placed in such close proximity to the traveled or beaten track as to make probable or natural that a person driving along in the daytime or nighttime would meet with an accident, and receive an injury, such placing of it would be a placing so as to incommode the public use of the highway.

"Now, gentlemen, the company had therefore the right to place its poles upon the public highway; it did not have the right and would not have the right to place the poles upon the traveled portion of the road. You understand what is meant by that, the part that customary travel occupies and takes on the public highway. It would not have the right to plant its poles on that portion of the highway and I would say it would not have the right to place its poles in such near proximity to the traveled track of the highway as to render the highway unsafe and inconvenient. In placing its poles so as to not incommode the use of the highway, therefore, we think it should not place its poles in a position to render inconvenient and unsafe public travel along the highway. If, in placing them, they are located upon the traveled portion of the public highway, the traveled track, that, gentlemen, it would go without saying, would be placing them where they would inconvenience, at least, the travel. If placed in such close proximity to the traveled or beaten track so as to make probable or natural that a person driving along in the daytime or nighttime would meet with an accident and receive an injury, such placing of it would be a placing so as to incommode the public use of the highway.

"The question as to where this pole was placed with reference to the traveled or beaten track of the highway is a matter somewhat in dispute. On part of the plaintiff it is alleged this was placed in 1896 in what was at that time a portion of the traveled track of the highway. You have heard the witnesses who testified to that effect, I believe Mr. Shannon, possibly Mr. Cashdollar and others. They say they have known the road for quite a number of years, and at the time when the pole was placed there it was placed on a portion of the public highway then used for the driving of vehicles over it. If that were true that would, we think, be an encroachment on the highway not authorized or intended by the act of assembly, or, if the company placed it in such near proximity to that traveled or beaten track as to naturally and probably lead to results such as complained of in this case, then we think that, gentlemen, would be placing it so as to incommode the public highway, and such as not warranted by the act of assembly.

"You remember also the testimony of the witnesses for the defendant as to where the pole was located with reference to the traveled track as now and formerly was. Some state there is grass growing on the location now. You will take that fact into consideration in connection with the other testimony, and the time that elapsed since the pole was placed there, and from all the testimony you will conclude whether or not that pole was placed upon the traveled track at that time, in which case we think it would be negligence on their part, or if not placed on was in such close proximity as to render probable such an injury as complained of in this case.

"On the part of the defendant it is argued and contended here that it was negligent of Miss Little to be riding in the nighttime in the manner in which she was. Now, gentlemen, we may say to you that public roads are made for all sorts of proper travel upon them and with all kinds of vehicles such as are usually used by persons traveling upon the roads, and we may say to you that all have a right to travel upon the public highways in parties under conditions such as the parties were traveling under in this case, and have a right to travel if they wish to travel upon hay ladders with hay upon them and also in the nighttime.

"So that in the location of the pole on the highway the defendant may be charged with the knowledge that persons may travel with all manner of vehicles reasonable and proper, and may travel in the nighttime as well as in the daytime, and further charged with the knowledge and fact that the nights sometimes are dark. All those things enter into the question of the determination of the defendant's negligence, and also into the question of the determination of the plaintiff's contributory negligence.

"It has been argued, and the court has been asked to say, that it was negligence on the part of the plaintiff riding on hay ladders with her feet extending out for some little distance over the bow of the wagon. We feel that we could not say this as a matter of law. That is a matter of fact to be passed upon by the jury, and it is for you to say from your knowledge of affairs and your experience as men in the country and passing over the highways, as to whether or not this was a dangerous or negligent position for the plaintiff to assume in riding in that way at that time.

"And I may say to you just here that under the law as it stands in this state at this time it does not seem that the negligence of the driver of a private conveyance can be attributed to those with him. It seems to be settled in this state that the others cannot be held for the negligence of the driver. It was a matter of some controversy for a long time, but now the law seems to be settled in that way. So that even if the driver in this case was negligent that negligence could not be charged up to the plaintiff in this case as contributory negligence on her part because she would not be held for the negligence of the driver."

Verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $4,250. Defendant appealed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

S. F. Bowser and A. L. Bowser, for appellant. Lev. McQuiston and John H. Wilson, for appellee.

MESTREZAT, J. On the evening of July 17, 1903, a party of 27 young ladies and gentlemen drove from Callery to Harmony, a distance of about 8 or 9 miles, in Butler county, to attend a social function at the latter place. The vehicle was a farmer's ordinary hay wagon, and was drawn by two horses. The rack or ladders on the wagon were covered with hay and the members of the party were seated at different places on the hay. Frank Kramer drove the team on this occasion. He was a window glass cutter by trade, but at this time was in the employ of the Ball & Cooper Coal Company, the owner of the horses and wagon which carried the party to Harmony. While he was the driver of the team, the evidence does not show that he was a member of the party, nor does it show all the persons who composed the party. Nor is it disclosed by the evidence whether the owner of the team furnished it gratuitously for the occasion or was compensated for its use, or whether Kramer was paid for his services as driver, or whether they were rendered without compensation. The party left Harmony about midnight to return home. As the wagon was passing along the public road it came in contact with one of the defendant's telephone poles—"slightly, just enough to allow it to slide past"—and Miss Little, the plaintiff, was struck by the pole, knocked from the wagon, and injured. The pole was on the west side of the highway, and she was seated on that side of the wagon with her feet extending about a foot out over the bow of the hayrack, which was over the rear wheel. Kramer sat in front, and was driving in a slow trot. The road where the accident occurred is a public highway and runs north and south along a hillside which descends from east to west. The width of the traveled part of the road east of the pole, exclusive of the gutter on the east side, is about 13 or 14 feet, and is practically level, except possibly a slight descent from the west to the east side with a slight rise in the middle. Brush grows on both sides of the road. The telephone line was constructed at this point in 1896. The plaintiff's statement avers that the road where the accident occurred "is a regularly ordained, laid out, opened, used, and traveled public highway," and that the defendant company negligently and unlawfully placed the pole "in and upon the said public road, and upon the usual traveled portion of the said road, and the said defendant company has negligently, wrongfully and unlawfully maintained the said telegraph or telephone pole in and upon the said public road and the traveled portion thereof for several years last past, and yet continues to so maintain the same." It is claimed that the alleged negligent action of the defendant company in placing its pole on the public highway caused the injury sustained by plaintiff for which this suit was brought.

On the trial of the cause, the court submitted to the jury, with very full instructions, the alleged negligence of the defendant company as well as that of the plaintiff. The result was a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed, claiming that the court erred in the admission of certain testimony, in the charge to the jury, and in the answers to its first, fourth, sixth, and eighth points; the last of which requested binding instructions for the defendant company. We have read very carefully the testimony and cannot see how the case could have been withdrawn from the jury. The credibility of the witnesses was for the jury and there was sufficient testimony, if believed, to warrant the finding that the telephone company had placed its telephone pole on the traveled portion of the highway, or in such close proximity to it as to endanger the safety of persons using the road, or, in the language of the act of 1874, "as to incommode the public use of said road." Section 33 (P. L. 92). Without quoting the testimony it is sufficient to say that several of the witnesses testified to this fact. While these witnesses vary in their estimates of the distance from the west side at which the pole stands within the traveled part of the road, they all say it is on the traveled part of the highway and that it is an obstruction to the use of the road by the public. The question was, therefore, for the jury.

The right of the defendant company to place its poles on the public highways of the state is statutory, and while the act conferring the franchise must not be construed so as to defeat the grant, yet the company must exercise its franchise within the statutory limitations. The authority by which a telegraph or telephone company is empowered to construct its lines on the public highways of this state is conferred by the act of April 29, 1874 (P. L. 92; 2 Purd. Dig. 2001), the 83d section of which provides that "such corporation shall be authorized * * * to construct lines of telegraph along and upon any of the public roads, streets, lands, or highways * * * within the limits of this state, by the erection of the necessary fixtures, including posts * * * for sustaining the cords or wires of such lines, but the same shall not be so constructed as to incommode the public use of said roads, streets or highways." * * * There can be no doubt as to the proper interpretation and the meaning of this legislation. The language is explicit and the purpose of the statute is manifest. The power to construct its lines "along and upon" a public highway is granted to the corporation in plain terms. Such was the evident purpose of the act. But equally clear and explicit is the language employed by the Legislature in the enactment in prescribing a limitation upon the power of such corporation to enter and construct its lines upon the highways of the state. Its right to use the public highways in the construction and maintenance of its lines was qualified and prohibited to the extent that the public should not be inconvenienced in the proper use of the highways. Its line, says the act, "shall not be so constructed as to incommode the public use of said roads, streets or highways." This limitation made the use of highways by a telegraph company secondary and subordinate to that of the public for which the roads of the state were primarily intended. The Legislature did not intend, by this legislation, to deprive the public of the use of the highways for any proper and reasonable means of travel, but intended that the franchise granted telegraph companies by the act should be exercised in subordination to the rights of the public on the roads of the state. Such, we think, was the manifest purpose of the act of 1874.

A like interpretation was put upon a similar statute of Ohio by the Supreme Court of that state in Cincinnati Inclined Plane Railway Company v. Telegraph Association, 27 N. E. 890, 12 L. R. A. 534, 29 Am. St. Rep. 559. In that case Mr. Justice Dickman, delivering the opinion of the court, says (page 896 of 27 N. E., page 567 of 29 Am. St. Rep. [12 L. R. A. 534]): "The authority given by statute to a telephone company to construct its lines from point to point, along and upon any public road, under the continuing prohibition that 'the same shall not incommode the public in the use of such road,' would plainly indicate an intention on the part of the Legislature that the company shall exercise such franchise with reference to the comfort and convenience of the traveling public, and shall not, in any manner, abridge or impair the use, by the public, of the most approved methods of travel and transportation. And a reasonable interpretation of the statute would lead to the conclusion, that to impair the public enjoyment of an approved method of conveyance on the streets, would be in derogation of the statutory prohibition that the public shall not be incommoded in the use of the roads or highways."

The errors assigned to the charge raise the question of the proper interpretation of the act of 1874, but we think the learned judge construed the act substantially in conformity with what is said above. In the case at bar it conclusively appeared from the evidence that there was ample space along the highway for placing the pole in question without planting it in the traveled part of the road, or so near to it that it would inconvenience or interfere with those who might use the highway. The legal width of the road is 33 feet, and but 17 feet were used for the roadway and for the gutter on the east side. The evidence did not disclose on which side of the traveled part was the unused portion of the 33 feet. It is apparent, however, that there was no necessity for placing the pole in a position that would obstruct the use of the road. The plaintiff's negligence was a question for the jury. It is not of itself negligence for a person riding in a wagon on a public highway to permit his feet or arms to extend beyond the side of the vehicle. When one is injured while occupying such position, it is for the jury to determine whether he was at the time exercising the care required by the circumstances, unless the danger was so apparent that a reasonably prudent person would not have taken the risk. In that event, the court may hold him negligent as a matter of law. Here the testimony clearly sent the question to the jury. Nor can the driver's negligence be imputed to the plaintiff under the facts disclosed by the testimony in the case. The evidence shows simply that at the time plaintiff was injured she was being carried in a private conveyance owned by the coal company, which was driven by a person engaged in the company's service. Under such circumstances it is settled by recent decisions of this court that the negligence of the driver is not imputable to one who is injured while being carried in the conveyance. Carlisle Borough v. Brisbane, 113 Pa. 544, 6 Atl. 372, 57 Am. Rep. 483; Dean v. Pennsylvania Railroad Co., 129 Pa. 514, 18 Atl. 718, 6 L. R. A. 143, 15 Am. St. Rep. 733; Jones v. Lehigh & New England Railroad Co., 202 Pa. 81, 51 Atl. 590.

We see no error in the court's answers to the defendant's first, fourth, and sixth points. If there was error in admitting the testimony of John Ficht, a witness for the plaintiff, which is the subject of the first assignment, it was cured by the immediate order of the court striking out the testimony.

The assignments of error are overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.

LILLEY v. PITTSBURG, V. & C. RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN—PROPERTY SUBJECT.

An agreement by a railroad company to pay a certain sum of money to construct cattle guards and make a number of wagon roads over its tracks, in consideration of the grant of a right of way, is severable, so that the right to the wagon roads may be condemned by the railroad company, under Act March 17, 1869 (P. L. 12; 2 Purd. Dig. 1798), for the purpose of widening its roadway.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Eminent Domain, § 104.]

2. RAILROADS—CONTRACTS—PRESUMPTION.

The presumption is that a contract by a railroad company in obtaining a right of way was not intended to barter away its right to make necessary improvements, as contemplated by Act March 17, 1869 (P. L. 12; 2 Purd. Dig. 1798), authorizing the widening of rights of way.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Washington County.

Action by Thomas Lilley against the Pittsburgh, Virginia & Charleston Railway Company. From a decree for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The following are the findings of fact and conclusions of law in the court below:

"Facts found: (1) Thomas Lilley, the plaintiff, is the owner of a tract of land in East Pike Run township, in this county, containing 232 acres more or less, over which the Pittsburgh, Virginia & Charleston Railway Company, the defendant, in the year 1876 (or near that time) constructed its railroad and has ever since operated the same. The ground occupied by the defendant company as a right of way for the track of its road in 1876 over this farm—for a valuable consideration—was 'granted, bargained, sold, and conveyed' to it by the father of the plaintiff, who then owned the farm, and the plaintiff took title to the farm subject to the defendant company's easement thus conveyed to it. The defendant's way, as described in said conveyance, was 60 feet 'in width at grade, and such additional width as may be required and necessary in the construction of said road at cuttings and embankments to make 60 feet wide at grade and extending in length as far as the said road may pass over' said farm. In the writing dated April 12, 1876, in which this grant is made, the then owner of the farm also released any claim for damages, in these words: 'And I hereby for myself, my heirs and assigns release the said Pittsburgh, Virginia & Charleston Railway Company from any and all damages resulting to me by the location and construction of said railway through my said land, provided said railway company pay me before they enter on said land the further sum of $250 (that is in addition to the sum paid for the grant of the right of way) and make cattle guards at each end of my line where it is now inclosed, and do not damage my springs, and give me at least five wagon roads under their track or at grade through my farm and remove any buildings at their own expense.'

(2) There is no complaint in plaintiff's bill that the money consideration of the grant to the railway company of the right of way in question, or for the release of damages, have not been fully paid, nor is there any claim that the cattle guards were not built, nor that any springs have been injured, nor that 'the five wagon roads under their track or at grade' were not given. (3) The defendant company, in the year 1890, and now again in the year 1904, seeks to condemn more land on each side of the 60 feet right of way; and in the petition for approval of the bond tendered in the year 1904, and now on file to No. 156, August term, 1904, on the law side of this court and pending for approval, it avers that it seeks also to condemn four of these wagon roads and the right to change the other. The language is as follows: 'Also all the right, title and interest of said Thomas Lilley in four of the grade crossings as claimed by said Thomas Lilley under the release of Thomas Lilley dated April 12, 1876, which calls for five crossings. For the fifth crossing called for by said release the company are to construct an underground or overhead crossing, whichever may be more suitable for a crossing at the point chosen by Mr. Lilley.' The land sought to be condemned in 1890, and to secure the damages for the condemnation thereof for which a bond was then filed to No. 216, February term, 1890, is on and adjoins the east side of the right of way granted in 1876, and contains in all about $11\frac{1}{4}$ acres. This land has not all yet been actually used by the railroad company, and a view to assess damages has not been held. The land sought to be condemned in 1904, and to secure the damages caused thereby for which the bond was filed for approval to No. 156, August term, 1904, is almost entirely on and adjoins the west side of the right of way granted in 1876, and contains about $6\frac{1}{4}$ acres. (4) The directors of the defendant company have by proper resolution appropriated these additional strips of land on the east and west side of their old right of way, because they believed the land was necessary for the present and future needs of the company, and they intend eventually to cover it all with additional tracks and sidings as a place for the storing and distribution of empty and loaded freight cars, and no more land has been taken than the civil engineer of the company believes is necessary. (5) The plaintiff denies the right of the defendant company to condemn and appropriate the road crossings provided for in contract of April 12, 1876.

"Conclusions of law: (1) That the plaintiff is not entitled to equitable relief, and the restraining orders prayed for should be refused and plaintiff's bill dismissed. (2) That the petition and bond filed to No. 156, August term, 1904, is not an attempt to rescind any part of the agreement of April 12, 1876, executed by it and Thomas Lilley, deceased."

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

W. B. Rodgers, J. W. Kraus, W. S. Parker, Winfield McIlvaine, and Norman E. Clark, for appellant. A. M. Todd and J. A. Wiley, for appellee.

MESTREZAT, J. The learned trial judge has found and clearly stated all the material facts of the case, and in his opinion has fully vindicated the decree which he directed to be entered. The only question in this case is the right of the defendant company to condemn the four grade crossings which the plaintiff claims he is entitled to under the contract of April 12, 1876. It is clear, we think, that this is a severable and not an entire contract. The clause relating to the damages and the wagon roads across the tracks to be given Mr. Lilley may be omitted from the contract, and still the grant of the right of way will have a valuable consideration to support it and be enforceable against the grantor. The conveyance is complete without this clause, and vests in the railroad company the easement through the farm of Mr. Lilley. The only plausible theory, and the correct interpretation of the contract, therefore, is that suggested by the trial judge that the release of damages was intended to release the railway company from any damages which, by the construction of the railroad, might result to that part of the farm outside the right of way. These damages may have been released by the grant of the easement, as has been held in some jurisdictions, but the parties thought the release necessary to relieve the company from damages, and for that reason it was inserted in the conveyance. Following the release is the proviso, the several matters in which clearly constitute the consideration for the execution of the release and not, as claimed by the plaintiff, for the grant of the right of way. The contract did not provide that the $250 should be paid, the cattle guards should be constructed, and the company should give Mr. Lilley the wagon roads over its tracks as a consideration for the conveyance of the right of way, but, on the contrary, it expressly sets forth that the grant of the right of way was made "for and in consideration of the benefits and advantages to me from the construction of its railway through my land." The money to be paid and the acts to be done, as required in the proviso, must therefore be regarded as the consideration for the release of damages for injuries done the plaintiff's farm outside the appropriation for the right of way for the construction of the defendant's road. The right to the wagon roads over the defendant's tracks, acquired as the consideration for the release of damages, was the property of Mr. Lilley, and could be appropriated by the defendant company under the Act of March 17, 1869 (P. L. 12; 2 Purd. Dig. 1798). The crossings were easements or private rights of way, and as such may be taken by the company under the statute. In doing so the defendant is not repudiating or rescinding the contract of April 12, 1876, as contended by the learned counsel for the plaintiff, but simply appropriating for its legitimate use the property of the plaintiff in accordance with the laws of the state. In Jones v. Pittsburg, etc., Railroad Company, 11 Pa. Super. Ct. 202, it was held that a railway company could, under the act of 1869, appropriate a part of a private right of way, which the company had agreed not to interfere with in the contract made with the owner of the land by virtue of which it had acquired its right of way. In that case it is said by Rice, P. J., delivering the opinion: "The right of a railroad company to make the necessary improvements contemplated by the act of 1869 was intended in large measure to be exercised for the public good, and it will not be presumed, in the absence of clear words, that the company intended to barter away that right and thus disable itself wholly or in part to perform those public functions it has undertaken."

We see no error in the record, and therefore the decree of the court below is affirmed.

RABE v. SHOENBERGER COAL CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. DAMAGES—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—INJURY TO REAL PROPERTY.

The measure of damages for permanent injury to real estate is the resulting depreciation in the value of the property.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Damages, §§ 273-278.]

2. TRESPASS — DAMAGES — DESTRUCTION OF SPRINGS.

In trespass against a mining company by the owner of the surface to recover for failure to leave sufficient support for the surface and for the destruction of five springs, the measure of damages is the permanent depreciation in value of the farm caused thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Damages, §§ 273, 276.]

3. SAME.

Where a mining company by its operations had destroyed certain springs belonging to the owner of the surface, his measure of damage, where the loss of one spring was supplied by piping water from another, in so far as that spring was concerned, was the cost of the piping.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Washington County.

Action by William T. Rabe against the Shoenberger Coal Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

On measure of damages the trial court charged as follows: "The measure of damage, gentlemen of the jury, in a case of this kind, as laid down by the Supreme Court and the one which you are to follow, is: 'For the measure of damages for failure to furnish surface support is the actual loss the owners of the surface have sustained to their land'—the surface in this case including the building thereon—'by reason of the cave in.' The actual loss would mean the real loss, if any, that was sustained by the plaintiff by reason of any springs that he may have lost on this portion of the farm, because the farm as yet is not affected as a whole, but the loss here is confined to some 40 or 60 acres, or thereabouts, although I believe the defendant's engineer claimed—the principal engineer in charge of that mine—that the coal was only mined out from 20 or 21 acres of this plaintiff's farm. When you come to the question of loss here and damage, because it is not denied that there is some for which the defendant is liable, and they have told you what that was, you take the elements of actual loss, the actual loss to the plaintiff here; and the cost that it would be to him to restore his buildings or his farm, if possible, to make him as good as he was before, is the measure of damages you will apply in this case. When you come to consider the loss of the spring, you are not bound by any arbitrary estimate that a witness on the one side or the other may place on a spring or the buildings that may be gone or damaged. You take this farm, this portion of the farm that is in controversy here, and, if it would appear to you that there were other springs on this farm that supplied a flow of water that was sufficient to keep up the supply necessary to carry on the farming, when one of these springs disappeared, it would be for you to say whether the plaintiff would be as much damaged if there was no other water on his place that he could get. And if the spring at the house could be supplied from another spring without diminishing appreciably the supply that was necessary for another part of the farm, the flow through that, would not the actual loss be what it would cost to pipe the water to the house, etc.? That is what I mean when I say you are not bound by the arbitrary estimate of loss that the defendant puts on this plaintiff's spring or springs, or that the plaintiff and his witness themselves may put upon them, but you are to use your own good judgment, considering all the facts and circumstances in the case, taking that part of the land that is affected by the loss of the springs here for all of the purposes for which it could be used in the shape it was made, for farming purposes and for the laying out of lots. You are to use your own good judgment, gentlemen of the jury, guarded within the lines at least of what the witnesses say on both sides here as to how many cracks there were and how they interfere with the cultivation of the surface, or whether they are of such a nature as would be dangerous for stock running in the field, whether they could be filled up and made as safe as they were before any cracks appeared. What is the extent of damages, by way of actual loss to the surface, if you find his farm left in that condition."

Verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $6,500. Defendant appealed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

W. H. L. Thomson, James I. Brownson, J. W. & Alvin Donnan, and D. W. Kuhn, for appellant. T. F. Birch and McIlvain, Vance & Gibson, for appellee.

POTTER, J. This was an action of trespass, brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused to plaintiff's property by the defendant company. The plaintiff was the owner of a farm in Washington county, near the town of Donora, and the defendant company owned the underlying coal. During the process of mining, and by reason of its failure to leave proper support for the surface, the defendant company injured a portion of the surface for building purposes, interfered with the use of a private road, damaged the dwelling house, and destroyed certain springs of water. The assignments of error relate solely to the measure of damages. The principal injury of which complaint was made was the destruction of five springs of water. This injury was permanent and irremediable, as was also any damage to the surface which might render it less available for building purposes.

Other injuries, such as the sinking of the dwelling house and the opening of cracks across the private right of way, were remediable. For the latter the cost of repair or restoration is obviously the measure of the damage.

The first assignment of error complains of the admission of testimony as to the value of the springs in themselves. This specification is sustained. The value of the springs was only an element in estimating the value of the realty. If the trespass resulted in permanent injury to the realty, the measure of damages is the diminution in the market value of the land. This principle is laid down in Schuylkill Nav. Co. v. Farr, 4 Watts & S. 362, where it was held that the measure of damages is (p. 375) "the difference between what the property would have sold for as affected by the injury and what it would have brought unaffected by such injury." And in McKnight v. Ratcliff, 44 Pa. 156, an action for flooding the shaft of a coal mine, the measure of damages was held to be the actual injury sustained in delay, loss of time, damage to machinery, etc., and, if the mine was irreclaimable, then the value of the estate and property. In Hanover Water Co. v. Iron Co., 84 Pa. 279, it was held that the measure of damages for the diversion of a stream, whereby a farm with an ore bank thereon is injured, was the difference in the market value of the property, as a farm and ore bank, immediately before the diversion of the stream and immediately afterwards as affected thereby. In Vanderslice v. Phila., 103 Pa. 102, an action for injuries through the bursting of a negligently constructed sewer, Mr. Justice Trunkley said (page 109): "Compensation for loss is the measure of damages. Permanent injury done to the buildings, cost of repairs, and the loss of rent for the time necessary to make the repairs, are elements affecting the market value, and the difference between that value in their injured condition and such value, if uninjured, is compensation." The sound clear rule is stated in Seely v. Alden, 61 Pa. 302, 100 Am. Dec. 642, Fulmer v. Williams, 122 Pa. 191, 15 Atl. 726, 1 L. R. A. 603, 9 Am. St. Rep. 88, Williams v. Fulmer, 151 Pa. 405, 25 Atl. 103, 31 Am. St. Rep. 767, and Thompson v. Traction Co., 181 Pa. 181, 37 Atl. 205, and is in substance that, when the injury is permanent, the measure of damages is the difference in market value before and after the injury, or the cost of removing the obstruction, whichever is the lower amount.

In the present case the plaintiff had a dairy farm, which was unusually well supplied with water. It had no less than 12 springs on it, with water in every field. Plaintiff claimed that five of the springs were destroyed by the cracks in the land. The question was, how much was the farm depreciated in value by the loss of the springs? Yet the plaintiff was allowed to estimate the value of the springs as such, and placed one of them at a valuation of $10,000, and the aggregate loss of the springs at $20,000. There was evidence showing that the loss of one spring was supplied by piping water from another. If so, then the damage, in so far as that one was concerned, was the cost of piping. But, in so far as the taking of the springs could not be remedied or made good, the springs should have been valued, not as independent pieces of property, but as elements going to make up the value of the farm as a whole. The farm was not wholly deprived of water. The number of springs had only been lessened. In just so far as any of them were destroyed, their value would be one of the elements of depreciation to be considered in ascertaining the loss in the selling value of the whole property, caused by the injury inflicted by the defendant company. Kossler v. Pittsburgh, etc., Railway Co., 208 Pa. 50, 57 Atl. 66. Counsel for appellant admits that the portion of the charge dealing with the measure of damages for the temporary or remediable injuries was substantially correct. But it is contended that no adequate rule was given to the jury by which they were to arrive at the damages for permanent injury, and that they were merely told to allow the actual loss. Counsel would have been in better position to complain if specific requests for instructions upon the measure of damages had been presented to the court below at the trial. We feel, however, that the charge was not sufficiently specific upon this point. The jury were told that the plaintiff had the right to recover his "actual loss," but were not told how that actual loss was to be estimated in considering the result of the permanent injuries. For all such injuries the rule should have been given to the jury that the measure of damages is the diminution in the market value of the property. Authority for this statement is ample. "The general principle upon which compensation for injuries to real property is given is that the plaintiff should be reimbursed to the extent of the injury to the property. The injury caused by the defendant may be of a permanent nature. In such a case the measure of damages is the diminution in the market value of the property. If the injury caused a total or partial loss of the land for a limited time, the diminution in rental value is the measure. One of these two measures is always applicable. If the injury is easily repairable, the cost of repairing may be recovered. But it must be shown that the repairs were reasonable, and, if the cost of repairing the injury is greater than the diminution in market value, the latter is always the true measure of damages." 8 Sedgwick on Damages, § 932, quoting Seely v. Alden, 61 Pa. 302, 100 Am. Dec. 642. This principle was followed in Fulmer v. Williams, 122 Pa. 191, 15 Atl. 726, 1 L. R. A. 603, 9 Am. St. Rep. 88, where a riparian owner on a navigable river brought an action against a neighboring riparian owner for injury to his property by reason of loss of water power and diversion of the stream from its natural channel in front of his land by deposit of rubbish and other obstructions. The trial judge permitted the jury to find damages for loss of water power and diversion of the stream from its natural course. The measure of damages, if the injury was permanent, was said to be the difference in the market value before and after the injury, thus applying the rule of Seely v. Alden, 61 Pa. 302, 100 Am. Dec. 642. On appeal the case was reversed on the ground that, in the absence of a grant from the commonwealth, plaintiff had no right to water power; but it was said he could recover as riparian owner for diversion of water. The measure of damages was not discussed in this opinion, but in Williams v. Fulmer, 151 Pa. 405, 25 Atl. 103, 31 Am. St. Rep. 767, the same questions came up again. On the measure of damages the trial judge charged that, if the injury was permanent, the damages would be the depreciation in value of the property, or the cost of removing the obstructions, whichever was the lower amount. This was assigned for error. The judgment was affirmed; this court saying: "The learned trial judge followed the rule laid down in Fulmer v. Williams, 122 Pa. 191, 15 Atl. 726, 1 L. R. A. 603, 9 Am. St. Rep. 88, and tried the cause with discrimination and ability."

It is suggested in the argument here that the trial court considered the decisions of this court in Robb v. Carnegie, 145 Pa. 324, 22 Atl. 649, 14 L. R. A. 329, 27 Am. St. Rep. 694, and McGettigan v. Potts, 149 Pa. 155, 24 Atl. 198, as establishing the doctrine that in no instance, and under no circumstances, is depreciation of market value the measure of damages for any injury to real estate in an action between private parties. That these decisions are not to be so understood was pointed out in Thompson v. Traction Co., 181 Pa. 131, 37 Atl. 205, which was an action of trespass against a street railway company which had constructed its railway on a public road in front of plaintiff's property without their consent. Justice McCollum said (page 136): "The right of the plaintiffs to compensation for the injury done to their property by the change of grade of the highway in front of it, and the construction thereon of the railway, is not disputed. The defendant, however, contends that the court adopted a wrong method of ascertaining the compensation they were entitled to receive for the injury thus inflicted. All the specifications of error relate to this contention, and the cases cited as sustaining it are Lentz v. Carnegie, 145 Pa. 612, 23 Atl. 219, 27 Am. St. Rep. 717; McGettigan v. Potts, 149 Pa. 155, 24 Atl. 198; and Eshleman v. Martic Township, 152 Pa. 68, 25 Atl. 178. The rulings and instructions complained of were to the effect that the depreciation in the value of the property, as the result of the change of grade and the construction and maintenance of the railway, furnished the measure of compensation. * * * No good reason appears for holding that the rulings and instructions in regard to the measure of compensation were erroneous. The mere fact that the defendant was not invested with the power or right of eminent domain is not a sufficient warrant for condemning them. It is true that they were in accord with the settled rule for the ascertainment of compensation in a case where a corporation, invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use, has, in the construction or enlargement of its works, taken, injured, or destroyed the property of another. But this rule is not necessarily limited to such cases. It may be applied in a case of permanent injury to real estate, when the issue is between private persons. An illustration of this may be found in Williams v. Fulmer, 151 Pa. 405, 25 Atl. 103, 31 Am. St. Rep. 767. In that case the plaintiff sought to recover from the defendant compensation for an injury to his property by reason of the diversion of the water of a navigable river from its natural channel in front of his land, and it was held that 'compensatory damages in such case would be the depreciation in value of the property, if the injury were permanent, or the cost of removing the obstruction, whichever was the lower amount.'

We do not think it is necessary to enlarge further upon this point. It is sufficient to say that the sound rule is that, where there is a permanent injury to real estate, the extent of the damage caused thereby is to be measured by the resulting depreciation in the value of the property. Permanency of injury is the proper test for the application of this rule. In so far as the property of the plaintiff in this case was permanently injured, the rule should have been applied.

The judgment is reversed, and a venire facias de novo is awarded.

In re GREGG'S ESTATE.

Appeal of WASHINGTON HOSPITAL.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. WILLS—CHARITIES—VALIDITY OF BEQUEST—TIME OF MAKING.

Under Act April 26, 1855 (P. L. 328), providing that no charitable bequest shall be valid if made within one calendar month from the death of the testator, a will containing a charitable bequest, executed October 8, 1899, between the hours of 3 and 5 o'clock in the afternoon, where the testator died November 8, 1903, between the hours of 7 and 8 p. m., was within one calendar month from the death and void.

2. TIME—CALENDAR MONTHS.

A calendar month is not one of any given number of days throughout the entire year, but varies in length according to the Gregorian calendar.

Appeal from Orphans' Court, Washington County.

In the matter of the estate of Mary A. Gregg. From a decree refusing petition to sell real estate, the Washington Hospital appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Andrew M. Linn and William A. Way, for appellant. John H. Murdoch and Edgar B. Murdoch, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The will of Mary A. Gregg, under which the Washington Hospital claims a charitable bequest, was executed on October 8, 1899, between the hours of 3 and 5 o'clock p. m. She died on November 8th of the same year, between the hours of 7 and 8 o'clock p. m., and the single question raised on this appeal is whether the bequest to the appellant is defeated by the act of April 26, 1855 (P. L. 328).

By the eleventh section of the act (page 332) it is declared "that no estate, real or personal, shall hereafter be bequeathed, devised, or conveyed to any body politic, or to any person in trust for religious or charitable uses, except the same be done by deed or will, attested by two credible, and, at the time, disinterested witnesses, at least one calendar month before the decease of the testator or alienor; and all dispositions of property contrary hereto, shall be void and go to the residuary legatee or devisee, next of kin, or heirs, according to law." A calendar month is not one of any given number of days throughout the entire year, but varies in length according to the Gregorian calendar. A calendar month beginning in February, except in leap year, is of 28 days' duration; one beginning in April, June, September, or November is of 30 days; and one beginning in either of the other seven months, of 31 days. As the calendar month to elapse between the date of the execution of this will and the death of the testatrix was one of 31 days, the bequest made to the appellant is void, unless, after the will was executed in the manner directed by the statute, "at least" that number of days intervened before her death. In the elaborate brief submitted by counsel for the appellant, decisions by courts in this country and in England have been cited upon the general principles regulating the computation of time, and, in the light of some of them, we are asked to disturb the decree below and declare the bequest operative. We are not, however, dealing with general principles or rules of construction, but with the express words of a statute, which cannot be over-ridden, even in the furtherance of what may seem to be justice. The fiction of the law that a day has no fractions yields at times, when equity requires that hours be counted, or that the exact time a thing is done be noted, but never when the duration of time, as fixed by a statute, is free from all doubt. "At least one calendar month" must elapse between the execution of a will containing a charitable bequest and the death of the testator, if the bequest is to be valid. The meaning of the words "at least" is "in the smallest or lowest degree; at the lowest estimate, or at the smallest concession or claim; at the smallest number." 4 Cyc. 368. In declaring that "at least one calendar month" must elapse between the execution of a will containing a charitable bequest and the death of the testator, the manifest meaning of the statute is that such a month must fully elapse between the dates of the two events. A calendar month is made up of days—in this case, of 31 days. These are full, clear 31 days, not 30 days and fractions of 2 other days, making in hours another day, and, with the other 30, 31 days, but 31 separate and independent days; the first beginning when October 8th ended, at midnight, and the last ending at the close of November 8th, at midnight. The computation in hours which the appellant makes, from 5 p. m. October 8th, to 8 p. m. November 8th, it is true, would make in hours 31½ days; but this is not the computation contemplated by the statute. It is "at least a calendar month," made up, at certain seasons of the year, of a certain number of full, clear days, and that kind of a month did not intervene between the execution of this will and the death of the testatrix. "When so many 'clear days' or so many days 'at least' are given to do an act, or 'not less than' so many days must intervene, both the terminal days are excluded." Endlich on Interpretation of Statutes, § 391.

The act of 1855 is for the protection of a testator for the last full calendar month of his life against yielding to any influences during that period—so often a susceptible one—which may unduly lead him to devote his estate, or any portion of it, to religious or charitable uses. It must be literally read and strictly construed, if effect is to be given to the legislative intent, and cannot be stretched to save a bequest clearly intended by the act to be void. Charitable or religious institutions claiming bequests or devises must bring themselves within it. As between them and the next of kin of a testator there are no equities, and the rights of each are such only as are given by the statute. As the meaning of the words of the act under consideration is so plain, we do not deem it necessary to apply the rule as to the computation of time, nor refer to the act of June 20, 1883 (P. L. 136), declaratory of it, requiring the exclusion of the day on which an act is done. Under that rule, with October 8th excluded, the full calendar month would not have expired until the end of November 8th.

Decree affirmed, and appeal dismissed, at cost of appellant.

McCOY v. OHIO VALLEY GAS CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

MASTER AND SERVANT — NEGLIGENCE — EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action against a natural gas company by one of its employés to recover for personal injuries sustained while repairing a pipe, evidence held to require submission of the case to the jury, where the circumstances connected with the accident were such as to warrant an inference of negligence in failing to shut off the gas or regulate its flow.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Washington County.

Action by George McCoy against the Ohio Valley Gas Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Defendant presented the following points: "(5) The uncontradicted evidence in this case being that the defendant followed the usual method and the one invariably adopted by pipe line companies in temporarily repairing lines such as this, and there being no evidence that any accident was liable to occur by reason of the method employed, the plaintiff cannot recover, and the verdict must be for the defendant. Answer: Refused. The case is one for the jury and not the court to determine. (6) The uncontradicted evidence in this case being that the method pursued by the defendant was not only such as is usually adopted by other corporations conveying natural gas, but that the accident itself was unusual and extraordinary and unforeseen, the defendant cannot be held to the duty of warning the plaintiff against such unforeseen and unexpected accident, and the verdict must be for the defendant. Answer: Refused. (7) Under all the testimony in this case the plaintiff cannot recover, and the verdict should be in favor of the defendant. Answer: Refused."

Verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $4,000. Defendant appealed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

A. M. Todd and J. A. Wiley, for appellant. R. W. Parkinson, Jr., for appellee.

STEWART, J. The plaintiff was injured by an explosion that occurred in the pipe line of the defendant company, at a point where he and others of the company's workmen were engaged in the work of repairing, under these circumstances: The pipe line was some three feet underground, and at this particular place it followed the side of a hill. A landslide had here pushed some of the sections of pipe from their original location, to what extent does not appear, but sufficient to cause a leak where two of the pipes joined. To relieve the line of the pressure and restore it to its place, the earth on the higher side was being removed, and the pipe uncovered so as to admit of its repair. The plaintiff was engaged in this work. It had been ascertained that the leak was about the collar of a joint, but it did not appear that examination had been made to ascertain whether other or further injury had resulted from the slide. At the time the work was being done, there was no interruption in the use of the line. The distribution of gas through the line continued at a pressure of about 225 pounds to the square inch, although by the use of safety valves and gates, which were placed along the line at intervals of three miles, the gas could have been wholly shut off or its flow regulated, at the pleasure of the defendant company, not, however, without serious inconvenience to the consumers, who depended on the line for a regular and constant supply. The explosion occurred at the end of the pipe where the leak was discovered to be, breaking out a piece of pipe varying in width from six to ten inches, and extending back from the mouth some three feet. From the opening thus made the gas escaped against the earth about the pipe, and with great violence threw such material as was in its way against the plaintiff, inflicting upon him serious bodily injury. This action was brought to recover for the injury thus sustained, and the negligence charged as the basis of the action was the failure of defendant company to arrest or sufficiently moderate the flow of gas from the line while the plaintiff and his fellow-workmen were there engaged.

As will be seen, plaintiff's case rested wholly upon the inference of defendant's negligence; no direct evidence of negligence having been adduced. The theory advanced by defendant to account for the explosion was that it occurred in consequence of a latent defect in the pipe. The question raised on the appeal, and the only question is, was the evidence of defendant's negligence sufficient to require a submission to the jury? Whether the explosion occurred in consequence of the latent defect in the pipe, or from a fracture occasioned by the slide, may now never be determined. In the absence of definite knowledge on this point, was the former cause to be presumed, or, as between two conflicting theories, was the former to prevail? An unusual condition existed, and the unusual had happened in consequence. The landslide had pushed the line out of its true place with one evident and apparent result—a leak, from which gas was escaping. What else in the way of injury to line or pipe resulted from the slide, if any, was not for the plaintiff to know. He could exercise no authority. His duty was to work where he was placed; the operation being wholly and exclusively under the direction and control of defendant's agents. The rule in such cases is thus stated by the present Chief Justice, in Zahniser v. Penna. Torpedo Co., 190 Pa. 350, 42 Atl. 707: "In cases where the duty is not absolute, * * * it is essential that it shall appear that the transaction in which the accident occurred was in the exclusive management of the defendant, and all the elements of the occurrence within his control, and that the result was so far out of the usual course that there is no fair inference that it could have been produced by any other cause than negligence. If there is any other cause apparent to which the injury may with equal fairness be attributed, the inference of negligence cannot be drawn."

In the present case we have two apparent causes suggested; the one giving rise to the inference of negligence, the other negating it. Can the explosion be attributed with equal fairness to either? If so, it was error in the court to permit the jury to draw an inference of negligence as against defendant. A very brief reference to the facts will show how unequal in force these opposing suggestions are. That of the plaintiff suggests neither difficulty in connection with the occurrence itself nor improbability. The ordinary mind would meet with no surprise in discovering a fracture at the end of the section of pipe where, as in this case, a line three feet underground had been subjected to an external force sufficient to push it from its place and open up a joint through which gas escaped. If otherwise, it is rather remarkable that no effort was made to show that such a result is not, under such circumstances, to be anticipated. On the other hand, the suggestion of the defendant encounters improbabilities which, if they do not make it unreasonable, make it much less credible than that of the plaintiff. According to defendant's own showing, the pipe before it was in place had been subjected to a test of 800 pounds pressure to the square inch. After placed in the ground and it had become a part of the line, it was subjected to another test of 450 pounds, and then continuously thereafter, for a period of four years, to the usual pressure of something in excess of 400 pounds. It is, perhaps, possible that, notwithstanding all this, there was a latent defect in the pipe that caused it to break at this unfortunate moment, under a pressure of 225 pounds, but such bare possibility ought not to prevail against the theory which is both reasonable and probable in all its parts, considered in the light of the evidence.

Can it be said, in view of the facts stated and the entire consistency of plaintiff's theory therewith, that the explosion that injured the plaintiff can, with equal reason and fairness, be attributed to a latent defect in the pipe? To ask the question is to answer it. As was said in Shafer v. Lacock, 168 Pa. 497, 32 Atl. 44, 29 L. R. A. 254, a case where the actual cause of the accident was not clearly disclosed by the testimony, but circumstances were shown warranting an inference of negligence on the part of defendant: "The occurrence was not in the ordinary course of things, and the circumstances connected with and surrounding it put on them [the defendants] the duty of showing that it was at least consistent with the exercise of proper care in the performance of their work." This duty in the present case called for something more than a theory that was simply conjectural as to the cause of the explosion. Clearly this was a case where the circumstances connected with the happening of the accident were sufficient to warrant an inference of negligence; and, that being so, submission of the question to the jury followed necessarily.

The judgment is affirmed.

WELLER v. WELLER.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

L. CURTESY—DESERPTION OF WIFE—EVIDENCE.

Where, in ejectment, the question involved is whether the wife had been willfully deserted by her husband for one year previous to her death, so as to deprive him of his curtesy, under Act May 4, 1855 (P. L. 430), it is incumbent on the husband to show a reasonable cause for desertion; but where he shows many attempts to effect a reconciliation, and that he had been locked from the house and told by his wife not to come around again, a verdict in his favor will be sustained.

2. WITNESSES—IMPEACHMENT—EVIDENCE.

In ejectment by a husband claiming by the curtesy, a witness for plaintiff may testify to a conversation not in the presence of plaintiff's deceased wife, where the purpose is to contradict the evidence of a son of plaintiff, who is one of the parties defendant.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Washington County.

Action by Daniel L. Weller against Ern K. Weller and others to recover land. Verdict for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

At the trial Andrew Mackey, a witness for plaintiff, was asked this question: "Mr. Parker: Q. Now, I asked Lon Weller whether or not he had not in your presence called his father a lying son of a bitch? A. Yes, sir; he— Mr. Irwin: What do you propose to prove? Mr. Parker: We propose to contradict Mr. Weller, the witness, as to that fact, as bearing upon his interest and bias and credibility as a witness. The Court: Well, he was asked that question. Mr. Parker: He was asked it and denied it. Mr. Irwin: The evidence is objected to. Just let me ask a question. Mr. Irwin: Q. Mr. Mackey, are you about to testify to something that occurred not in the presence of Mrs. Weller? A. In the presence of Mr. Lon Weller, Dan Weller, and myself. Q.

Mrs. Weller not being present? A. Mrs. Weller not being present. (The evidence is objected to as incompetent for the reason that, no matter what Lon Weller may have said to his father not in the presence of the mother and wife, it afforded no excuse for the husband deserting his wife, and sheds no light upon the issue involved here; and, the inquiry made of Lon Weller being on a collateral matter, his answer is binding upon the plaintiff, and cannot be contradicted in this case. The Court: I think we will allow you to ask the question, because it is undisputed here that all the children were standing with the mother, and the claim being on the part of the father that they made it so hot for him he had to get out. It bears on the question, at issue here, of whether or not the desertion was willful. We would not allow it if it were independent and unconnected with the family affair. We think this is the kind of a case where the witnesses were members of the same family, and evidently taking sides with one parent against the other, and that the whole transaction and manner of living, and the feeling and conduct towards them, ought to be put before the jury here. We will seal a bill for the defendants and allow the question to be asked.) Q. Now, I asked Lon Weller whether or not he had not in your presence called his father a lying son of a bitch. I ask you whether that is true or not? A. Yes, sir. Q. And who heard it? Who was there? A. Lon, his father, and I. I went down there and Lon was on the wagon. I called him down, and he went back to his father and had a little chewing match, and finally he called him a damned lying son of a bitch. That's what he said—called. (Mr. Irwin: Q. I would like to ask the witness a question preliminary, to make an objection on the record: Mr. Irwin: Mrs. Patterson, the hearing that you refer to now was the hearing on the petition of Mrs. Weller to the court of Allegheny county to be declared a feme sole trader on the ground of her husband's desertion of her; is that correct? A. Yes, sir. Mr. Irwin: The testimony now offered is objected to for the reason that, no matter what Ern Weller called his father at the time of his testimony in the proceeding in Pittsburg, it sheds no light upon the relations between Daniel L. Weller and Mary J. Weller, his wife, and afforded no justification for his desertion of his wife, and his refusal to support her. Mr. Parker: No; nor we don't claim it does. It goes simply to the credibility of the witness Mr. Ernest Weller. The Court: Well, that being the sole purpose, the objection then is overruled, and the offer admitted and on request of defendants, exception allowed and sealed.) Q. What did he say about his father? A. It was after Miss Povard had been on the stand, and it was concerning her testimony, what she had said, and he said that any man that would go a year or two years without a bath was nothing but a hog."

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

R. W. Irwin, A. T. Morgan, and James P. Brownlee, for appellant. Norman E. Clark, John O. Bane, W. S. Parker, and Winfield McIlvaine, for appellee.

ELKIN, J. This is an action of ejectment by the surviving husband to recover possession of certain real estate of which his wife died seised. The defendants are the children and heirs at law of the deceased wife. The right of the husband, as tenant by the curtesy, to enjoy the use and possession of the real estate in question, is denied by reason of the following provisions of the act of May 4, 1855 (P. L. 430), to wit: "No husband who shall have as aforesaid, for one year or upwards previous to the death of his wife, willfully neglected or refused to provide for his wife, or shall have for that period or upwards willfully and maliciously deserted her, shall have the right to claim any right or title in her real or personal estate after her decease, as tenant by the curtesy. * * *" The question tried in the court below, and raised by this appeal, is whether there was a willful and malicious desertion of the wife by the husband from July 4, 1900, to the time of her death, July 7, 1903. Where the facts show a desertion, it is presumed to be willful and malicious, and the burden is on the husband to show reasonable and lawful cause for it. Bealor v. Hahn, 117 Pa. 169, 11 Atl. 776; Hahn v. Bealor, 132 Pa. 242, 19 Atl. 74. It is conceded that the husband withdrew from the home of his wife July 4, 1900, under circumstances requiring him to show reasonable and lawful cause for his action. At the trial the learned court instructed the jury that the manner in which the husband left his wife and family on the date mentioned, and the fact that he had remained away for upwards of a year before attempting to return, raised the presumption of a willful and malicious desertion under the law, and placed upon him the burden of showing that it was not so. The husband met this burden by testimony giving in detail the occurrences which led to his withdrawal from his house, and his repeated attempts to effect a reconciliation with his wife and live with his family. It is in evidence that on several occasions he went back to his home and attempted to see his wife, but was unsuccessful. He failed in these efforts because the doors were locked, and his wife would not admit him to her presence. The evidence further shows that the wife sent him a letter in which he is notified not to come upon the premises or annoy her further with his visits. The husband is corroborated by other witnesses, showing, or tending to show, that he made efforts to return to his home and live with his wife and family. Under these circumstances the learned trial judge very properly submitted the case to the jury to determine whether the presumption of willful and malicious desertion had been rebutted by the evidence. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. It was clearly a case for the jury, and, unless testimony was improperly admitted, their decision is final.

The first assignment of error raises the question of the admissibility of the testimony of Andrew Mackey, because the conversation referred to was not in the presence of the wife. It is argued that what the son said in the absence of the mother could not be used for the purpose of showing that the husband did not willfully and maliciously desert his wife. The answer to this contention is that the testimony was offered for the purpose of contradicting Lon Weller, the son, and as bearing upon his interest, bias, and credibility. It was competent for this purpose. The observations of the learned trial judge, wherein it was stated that this testimony bore generally upon the family relations and the question of the willful and malicious desertion of the husband, did no harm, and do not constitute grounds for reversible error.

What has been said about the first assignment of error applies generally to the second. It was a question for the jury to determine whether the husband had willfully and maliciously deserted his wife for one year or upwards prior to her death, so as to deny himself the right, as tenant by the curtesy, to the use and possession of the real estate of which she died seised. The jury has found in favor of the plaintiff, and we see no reason to disturb that finding.

Judgment affirmed.

McCLANE et al. v. McCLANE et al.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

RAILROADS—RIGHT OF WAY—INVALID GRANT—INJUNCTION.

A railroad company constructed its road in good faith on certain lands under deeds to persons without authority to make the grant. Subsequently the devisees of the owner of the land filed a bill to compel the removal of the road. The evidence showed that the real object of the suit was to compel the defendant company to permit certain crossings of the railway necessary for the purpose of marketing coal underlying the land and that the company had obligated itself to permit such crossings. The evidence showed that the construction of the railway had increased the value of the land, and that out of the seven devisees who were parties to the bill five were estopped by their conduct. Held, that the injunction will be denied, and that the court will retain the bill to enforce the agreement of the railroad company as to the crossings.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Washington County.

Bill by William McClane and others against Ebenezer McClane and others. From the decree, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The following is a part of the opinion of McIlvaine, P. J., in the court below:

"From the proofs in the case it is apparent that the interests of each of the seven children of M. W. McClane in the subject-matter of dispute in this controversy are one and the same. Because the four plaintiffs have made their three brothers (who are executors of their father's will) defendants in place of having them join with them as plaintiffs, does not alter the fact that the principal relief specially prayed for (the mandatory injunction) is for the benefit of all; nor does it alter the fact that the seven joined shortly before the bill was filed in a demand upon the railway company that it substitute a new agreement for the old one, and that they then gave the ultimatum that this must be done, or otherwise suit would be entered to compel the company by mandatory injunction to remove from the premises. Let us then see what relation each of these seven persons interested in this farm sustains to the railway company as bearing upon their right to invoke the aid of a court of equity in having it evicted therefrom. And, first, as to the three brothers who are made defendants.

"It is not denied that they in good faith executed and delivered to the assignor of the railway company the agreement attached to the plaintiffs' bill, wherein they, as executors and devisees under the will of M. W. McClane, deceased, granted the right to enter upon the farm in question and occupy the strip of ground now occupied by the Washington & Canonsburg Railway Company for railway purposes, and that they received therefor $500 in cash and a covenant to pay the additional sum of $1,500, and that they still retain the sum of $500, and have not offered to return it. It is not denied that these brothers, when they made the contract, were in possession of this farm; that they cut timber off it and sold the same for the use of themselves, doing business as M. W. McClane's Sons; and that they reopened an old and abandoned coal mine on the farm, and operated it for their joint use in the firm name of M. W. McClane's Sons. It is not denied that the Washington & Canonsburg Railway Company, some months before this bill was filed, under the grant made by these brothers, entered upon this farm and took full and exclusive possession of the strip of land now occupied by its track, and that the company had fenced and graded the same, and that this was done by the company in good faith, under a claim of right, and in the belief that the grant made by the three brothers was a valid conveyance. It is not denied that the three brothers knew that the company so entered, and that it was at large expense constructing its road across their farm, relying on the validity of the grant in question. And it is not denied that these three brothers, before any question was raised as to the validity of their grant, doing business as M. W. McClane's Sons, sold ties to this company to be used in the construction of its road, and that these ties were made of timber cut from this farm by them. Under these facts, we think it is clear that the Washington & Canonsburg Railway Company, as against these three brothers, is entitled to continue in possession of the strip of ground they have inclosed for its way across this farm, and that they would be estopped from calling in question the validity of the grant they made.

"Let us now consider the case of Mary McClane and Bessie McClane, two of the plaintiffs. These two young ladies lived on the farm in question, and the family relation existed between them and the three brothers who made the grant of the right of way across the farm. They knew that the grant had been made by their brothers. They must have known that the brothers were cutting timber off the farm, and that they had opened an old abandoned mine and were operating it under the firm name of M. W. McClane's Sons. They must have known that the defendant company had entered and taken possession and fenced the way for its track across their farm, and that it was expending large sums of money in grading the track, and that this was done under a claim of right on the part of the company, who relied on the validity of the grant made by the three brothers; and, knowing all this, they never in any way intimated to the defendant company (until very shortly before the bill was filed) that they would claim that this grant was invalid. The relation they sustained to their brothers, their desire to have the road built, their seeing its construction from the house in which they lived, their knowledge that the brothers were selling ties, made of timber cut on the farm, to the railway company to construct its road, would suggest to any reasonable mind that they consented to and approved of the action of the brothers in permitting the railway company to construct its road across the farm, and that it would not be considered as a trespasser in entering thereon for that purpose. If they were unwilling that the road should be built across the farm, it was their duty to speak to the railway company and make known to it their dissent before it improved the way granted to it. In our opinion, they were too late in making known their objections, and that they have failed to show any just excuse for this delay. They were in possession of all the facts, they were of full age, and it will not do to now say that they relied upon what their brothers told them as to a question of law, concerning which they took no legal advice until the brothers discovered that they might need a crossing for a coal road over the railway track to the track of the steam railroad, and put them and their coplaintiffs forward as persons who could best make the attack on the railway company's title for the joint benefit of all.

"This brings us to the consideration of the other two plaintiffs. William McClane lives in the state of California, and although he did not sign nor verify the bill, and was not examined as a witness, yet we must infer, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that he did not have knowledge of the facts to which we have referred as being within the knowledge of those that lived on the farm. The burden is on the defendant company to prove the facts out of which an estoppel grows. The other plaintiff, Rebecca McClane, at the time the bill was filed, was a minor. As to these two plaintiffs, we are of the opinion that the defendant company has failed to prove such facts as would entitle them to have the bill in this case dismissed unconditionally.

"On the first question for our decision we are of the opinion that, as all the plaintiffs are not estopped from maintaining this bill, the defendant company is not entitled to have it unconditionally dismissed at the plaintiffs' cost. This brings us to the second question for decision: What relief in equity and good conscience are the plaintiffs entitled to under the proofs in this case? Let us first discover the real ground of complaint as it appears from the proofs. It is plain that it is not the presence of the railway upon the farm in question. No one of those interested, so far as the testimony shows, really wants the defendant company ejected and the operation of the railway stopped. It is admittedly a great convenience to those who occupy this farm, and the proof shows that the presence of the road on the farm, and its operation between Washington and Canonsburg, has probably increased the value of the farm. The real complaint against the railway company is that it will not allow a coal switch from the steam railway to the mine on the farm where coal is being mined. Until the developments in a suit between the defendant railway company and the Meadow Lands Coal Company in regard to the right of the coal company to cross the defendant company's track on an adjoining farm brought it to their mind that they might need a switch crossing for coal mining purposes, no objections were made to the presence of the street railway on the farm; and after it was discovered that the reservations in the grant for switches did not include a switch for a coal road, but only switches to manufactories that might be located on the farm, what was demanded by the seven children was not that the company get off, but that a new agreement be executed, with provisions for coal switches and some other matters not in the original grant. If the provision for a coal switch had been in the old agreement, the claim of irreparable injury, according to the testimony of the plaintiffs themselves, would have been out of the case.

"There are other matters to be considered in connection with this question of equitable relief. One is the position in which the issuing of the mandatory injunction specially prayed for would leave the defendant company. Without any fault on its part it has expended thousands of dollars on the route leading through the McClane farm, after having abandoned what was known as the shaft road route which did not touch this farm. To adopt that route now would require the abandonment of two or three miles of road, and the loss of these thousands of dollars. The plaintiffs and the three brothers, who together own the farm, evidently do not want the road abandoned, but they want a new contract. And, with the alternative of a new contract or loss of thousands of dollars before it, the railway company would be put by the court (if the mandatory injunction prayed for was granted) in a position of inequality in making this new contract, especially when we consider the fact that five of them are not entitled to a more favorable contract than the one they have. Again, this road is mortgaged to secure innocent bondholders whose interests would be prejudiced if the mandatory injunction was enforced. Again, the road is now in full operation between Washington and Canonsburg, and the public is interested in its uninterrupted operation. A mandatory injunction is a drastic remedy. And in a court of equity the effect of its issuance upon the defendant, upon innocent third parties, and upon the public are matters that will be considered, as well as the wrong the plaintiff has suffered. If his wrong can be righted by an action at law or by equitable relief in a form that will not do injury to others, the drastic remedy ought not to be invoked.

"The question therefore logically arises: Can such equitable relief be granted in this case? The plaintiffs pray specifically for an injunction restraining the maintenance and operation of this railway by the defendant company, and that it be compelled by mandatory injunction 'to remove from said premises all material, equipment, and the like used in or about or for the construction and operation of a railroad across said premises'; and it prays generally that the court 'grant such other and further relief as to equity and good conscience belong.' The equitable relief that the plaintiffs are entitled to in equity and good conscience, in our opinion, is a switch crossing for a coal yard to carry the coal mined on the farm to the steam railroad. If this is furnished by the defendant company so that a coal road on either side of the defendant company's track can be connected therewith, then, in our opinion, the drastic remedy should not be resorted to, and no mandatory injunction should be granted. This will certainly meet the claim of irreparable injury made on the part of the two plaintiffs who are not estopped from making such a claim, and will be giving the other five children more than they are entitled to under the contract, the validity of which we hold they are estopped from denying. How, then, shall our decree be drawn to give this relief? Under the pleadings as they now stand there may be doubt whether we could make an affirmative decree in favor of the plaintiffs giving this relief under the general prayer, although the proofs warranted it. But we believe there is another way of reaching this end. During the trial of the case one of the attorneys of the defendant company made in open court verbally an offer to grant to the plaintiffs and their three brothers a switch crossing, the lack of which the plaintiffs' witnesses complained about, and which one of the plaintiffs at one stage of the examination said was all that she had to complain about. One of the plaintiffs' attorneys replied to this offer: 'Make your offer in writing. You have never done it since this thing begun.' When court met to hear the case argued, the attorneys for the defendant company complied with this request, and with leave of court, and without objection from any one, filed the following paper, which was made part of the record: 'In the Court of Common Pleas of Washington County, Pa. William McClane et al. v. Ebenezer McClane et al. and Washington & Canonsburg Railway Company. No. 1,322 in Equity. Stipulation. And now, August 11, 1904, the Washington & Canonsburg Railway Company, by its counsel, offers to the plaintiffs in this case to permit at all times hereafter the construction of such crossings of the railway of the defendant company as may be necessary for the purpose of marketing the coal underlying the land described in the bill filed in this case, the number and location of said crossings and the method of crossing, whether at grade, under or overhead, to be determined by the court, and the cost of construction and maintenance thereof to be borne by either or both parties, as the court at that time may decree. Washington & Canonsburg Railway Company, by Its Counsel, Walter Lyon, John H. Murdoch.'

"This puts the case in such a shape that justifies the court in filing a conditional decree, and this is the form in which, in our opinion, it should be: 'And now, August 17, 1904, this cause came on to be finally heard and was argued by counsel, whereupon, upon due consideration, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiffs' bill and prayers for an injunction be, and the same is hereby, dismissed on the following conditions to be performed by the Washington & Canonsburg Railway Company, one of the defendants herein, to wit: (1) That it construct, or allow to be constructed, a crossing or crossings over its railway track such as may be necessary for the purpose of marketing by the steam railroad south of its railway the coal underlying the land described in plaintiffs' bill, the location of said crossing or crossings, and the method of the construction of said crossing or crossings, whether at grade, under or overhead, and how paid for, to be agreed upon by the parties to this suit. If, however, such an agreement cannot be reached as to the location or method of construction of said crossing or crossings, or how the same shall be paid for, then either party showing this fact may ask that this bill be reinstated and that the pleadings, if necessary, be amended; if the plaintiffs, that their bill be amended, and if the defendant, that its answer be amended, or that it be allowed to file a cross-bill, so that the pleadings as amended shall require the court to determine the location, method of construction, and how the costs thereof shall be borne, and the court so far retains control of the case as to allow it to be so reinstated and the pleadings so amended and the conditions herein named enforced. (2) That the defendant company pay to the executors of M. W. McClane, deceased, the sum of $1,500, the balance of the contract price which remains unpaid. (3) That the defendant company pay the costs of this proceeding.'

"In reaching our findings of fact as to the contract made between M. W. McClane and Arthur Kennedy, we excluded the testimony of Arthur Kennedy. Being a stockholder in the defendant company, in our opinion, made him an incompetent witness to testify as to the making of the agreement he had with Mr. McClane. There is testimony in the case other than that of Mr. Kennedy to justify the finding we have made as to the existence of this agreement."

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

T. F. Birch, James I. Brownson, and J. W. & Alvin Donnans, for appellants. Walter Lyon, and John Murdoch & Son, for appellees.

FELL, J. On a former appeal in this case it was decided that the parties who granted to the corporation defendant a right to construct its road were without power to make the grant either as executors or as devisees, in both of which capacities they had assumed to act. McClane v. McClane, 207 Pa. 465, 56 Atl. 996. The order then made reversing the decree and directing that an injunction be issued was afterwards modfied, and the defendants were granted leave to answer. At the second hearing on bill, answer, and proof, the main question was that of estoppel. Three of the parties named as defendants were only nominally such, and were not acting in sympathy and interest with the real defendant, the Washington & Canonsburg Railway Company. They had joined with the plaintiffs in giving notice to the railway company that suit would be brought unless their demand for a new agreement, permitting a coal road crossing of its tracks, was complied with, and the relief sought was for the benefit of them, as well as of the plaintiffs. The court found that three of the seven persons interested in the land were estopped to deny the right of the railway company to maintain its tracks and operate its cars, by their execution of the grant and their subsequent conduct; that two others were estopped by their silence and acquiescence with full knowledge; that, as to the remaining two, one of whom was without knowledge and the other was not of full age, an estoppel had not been established. It was also found that the company had entered on the land and constructed its road thereon in good faith, believing it had a valid grant; that the location, construction, and operation of the road had enhanced the value of the farm, and will increase the value of the shares the plaintiffs will be entitled to receive on the distribution of the estate; that the real ground of complaint, as it appeared from the proofs, was, not the presence of the railway on the farm, but the fact that the company would not allow the construction of a coal switch from a steam road to a mine on the farm to cross its tracks; that permission to make this construction would take out of the case wholly the claim of irreparable injury. The company having obligated itself to permit crossings, an injunction was refused, but the bill was retained to enforce, if necessary, the agreement. This disposition of the case is manifestly equitable. It gives to the two plaintiffs who have a standing all they can justly claim, because their shares in the distribution of the proceeds of the land, when sold, will not be diminished. It relieves the company from incurring a ruinous loss in the removal of its road from the land in question and other lands on either side of it. The grounds on which it is rested are so fully stated in the opinion of the learned judge of the common pleas that further discussion of them is unnecessary.

The decree is affirmed, at the cost of the appellants.

HILES v. GARRISON et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 24, 1906.)

1. WILLS — CONSTRUCTION — JURISDICTION IN EQUITY—APPOINTMENT OF TRUSTEE.

A suit for the construction of a will and the appointment of a trustee to execute the trusts established is properly brought in chancery; the relief sought being the appointment of a trustee.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 1686.]

2. SAME — CONSTRUCTION — TRUSTS — DURATION.

Testator provided that his property should be "put in a trust," and declared that the income should be equally divided between his brother, sister, and widow as long as the widow remained unmarried, and in case of her death or marriage her share should go to the brother and sister. Held to create a trust, to continue during the widowhood or life of the widow, and on her death or remarriage the corpus of the estate passed to testator's next of kin as intestate property.

3. TRUSTS — APPOINTMENT OF TRUSTEE — JURISDICTION OF EQUITY.

The court, on the failure of a testator to name a trustee, will appoint one to carry out the trusts created by the will.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 47, Cent. Dig. Trusts, §§ 204, 205, 207.]

Bill by Caroline W. Hiles against Caroline C. Garrison and others, for the construction of the will of Richard Hiles, deceased, and for the appointment of a trustee. Will construed, and trustee appointed.

W. T. Hilliard, for complainant. T. S. Hilliard, for defendants.

BERGEN, V. C. The bill in this case is filed by the complainant, widow of Richard Hiles, deceased, for the construction of his last will and testament and the appointment of a trustee to execute such trusts as may be determined are established by such will. As the relief sought is the appointment of a trustee, and the necessity for such appointment requires the construction of the will as an incident to the relief sought for, the complainant is properly here.

The pertinent part of the will is the second clause, which reads as follows: "I do devise that all my property and bonds and mortgages be put in a trust, and the income be divided equally between my brother, Biddle Hiles and sister, Caroline Garrison, and my wife, as long as she remains my widow, in case of her marrying or death her share to go to my brother Biddle Hiles, and my sister Caroline Garrison." The testator died possessed of considerable estate; the personalty having been appraised at the sum of $54,089.88. His real property consisted of an undivided interest in certain real estate in the county of Salem in this state; such interest being estimated by the parties in interest, at something over $20,000. At the time of his death the only next of kin of the testator was his brother, Biddle, and his sister, Caroline. The will was prepared by the testator, and does not clearly express his desires, and the purpose of this cause is to ascertain whether a trust has been established by the terms of such will, and, if so, that a trustee be appointed to carry out such trust.

While this will is very inartistically drawn, I think the clear intention of the testator was to create a trust by the terms of which the income of his estate was to be divided equally between his widow, brother, and sister, and that this trust shall continue as long as his widow lives or remains unmarried, and on the happening of either such events the trust terminates. As the testator has made no disposition of the corpus of the fund after the expiration of the trust estate, he died intestate as to the residue of his property, and it will go to his next of kin. That the testator named no trustee will not prevent the execution of the trust, for the court will always appoint a trustee wherever necessary to sustain the trust, and a trustee will be appointed. The will contains no power of sale, and therefore the trustee cannot dispose of the land by virtue of any authority contained in the will. It is, in my judgment, however, included in the trust, and, subject to that, will vest in the heirs at law of the testator.

I will advise a decree in accordance with the above.

AVON-BY-THE-SEA LAND & IMP. CO. v. McDOWELL et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Feb. 6, 1906.)

1. EXECUTION — LEVY — CONSTRUCTIVE SEIZURE—SUFFICIENCY—GOODS IN POSSESSION OF MORTGAGEE—INVENTORY OF GOODS.

Where goods of a judgment debtor were in possession of a mortgagee thereof, the taking from the mortgage of a list of the chattels already agreed on between the mortgagee and the judgment debtor, the mortgagor, for the purpose of an inventory, and annexing such inventory to the levy, was sufficient as a legal levy, although the officer did not see the goods.

2. SUBROGATION — PRIOR INCUMBRANCES — PAYMENT BY OWNER—INDEMNITY TO BENEFIT OF SUBSEQUENT INCUMBRANCES.

Where the owner or purchaser of property subject to several incumbrances pays off a prior incumbrance with his own money, the payment inures to the benefit of the subsequent incumbrances, against which the prior incumbrances cannot be kept alive for the owner's benefit, even by express agreement, and on such payment by the owner, without any agreement for subrogation or keeping the security alive, a court will not revive the prior incumbrances by application of the equitable doctrine of subrogation in favor of the owner.

Bill by the Avon-by-the-Sea Land & Improvement Company against Louis G. McDowell and others. Heard on bill, replication and proofs. Decree for complainant.

A. C. Hartshorne, for complainant. S. A. Patterson, for defendants.

EMERY, V. C. Complainant is a judgment and execution creditor of a Mrs. Albertson, and the defendant Thompson is the purchaser, and the defendants McDowell and Faust are the lessees, of personal property of the judgment debtor levied on or claimed to be levied on prior to the purchase and lease. The lessees, at the time of the levy claimed, were also in possession of the personal property under a lease from the judgment debtor, and McDowell, one of the lessees, was at that time holder of two chattel mortgages on the property for the sum of $880. Both the mortgages were then due, and expressly authorized the mortgagee, in case of judgments against the mortgagor, to take immediate possession of the mortgaged chattels and sell them to pay the mortgage debt. The judgment was recovered on November 28, 1900, the execution returned with a levy on real estate and personal property of the debtor at the January term (1901) of the Monmouth circuit, and the conveyances of the real estate and personal property by the debtor to the defendant Thompson were made on or about April 9, 1901. On May 14, 1901, Thompson leased the hotel and furniture in question to McDowell and Faust for five months, at the rent of 17½ per cent. of the gross receipts of the business during the tenancy; $475 to be paid in cash at the time of signing the lease, and the balance at the termination of the lease, or sooner closing of the hotel. The lease contained the further provision that the lessees should have the right, on the final settlement, to deduct from the rents the amounts due on the two notes given to McDowell by Mrs. Albertson, then amounting to $915.20, principal and interest, which were to be credited as so much paid on the rent, provided the 17½ per cent. amounted to a sum equal to the cash paid and the amount then due on the notes, and if the percentage was not sufficient to satisfy the whole amount of the notes the lessees were to credit on the notes only the amount of the balance due on the rentals. These notes to McDowell were the notes secured by the chattel mortgages on the furniture, and it was admitted on the hearing that $300 over and above the amount due on the mortgages has accrued as rent under the lease. Complainant in August, 1901, became the purchaser at sale under the execution of the right, title, and interest of the judgment debtor in the furniture for the sum of $30. The furniture was not taken from the possession of the lessees and mortgagee by the purchaser, but has been sold since the filing of the bill by consent of the parties, and the proceeds of sale deposited subject to the joint order of their attorneys.

Complainant's bill, resting on its title as judgment and execution creditor and purchaser at the sale, was filed before the termination of the lease, and alleged that the mortgages were paid by the rental percentages, and prayed an account of the amount due on these mortgages. The right to an account is resisted by both purchaser and lessees on two grounds. The first is that the levy under the execution is illegal and void, for the reason that it was made by the sheriff without his actually seeing the property levied on. The return to the execution shows a levy on the personal property with an inventory annexed; and the under sheriff, to whom the execution was delivered by the plaintiff's attorney, together with the list of chattels taken from the chattel mortgages, says that he sent the execution to an officer at Asbury Park to go down and make the levy. This officer's evidence has not been produced by the defendants, and, in its absence, I must hold that the sheriff's return of a levy actually made on the goods has not been so contradicted or shown to be untrue that the sale under it can be affected because of the supposed irregularity in making the levy. But on this point my further conclusion is that under our decisions the levy, by annexing the inventory, was sufficient in this case without actually seeing the goods, for the reason that the goods levied on were, at the time of the levy, in the actual possession of the mortgagee. The sheriff was not entitled to take the goods from the possession of the mortgagee, and his possession under any levy could only be constructive. Fox v. Cronan, 47 N. J. Law, 493, 509, 510, 2 Atl. 444, 4 Atl. 314, 54 Am. Rep. 190. And, so far as the levy was concerned, his only right was to see the goods for the purpose of making the levy. Taking from the chattel mortgage a list of the chattels already agreed on by the mortgagor and mortgagee, and annexing this list as the inventory, is, I think, sufficient as a constructive seizure for the purpose of a legal levy. Making an inventory from a list given by the defendant for the purpose of the inventory, and without seeing the goods, operates as a constructive seizure, and is valid against defendant. Caldwell v. Fifield, 24 N. J. Law, 150, 160 (Sup. Ct. 1853). And although it has not, in the later cases, been expressly held that a list or inventory made without seeing the goods and without the defendant's consent would be valid where the officer has the right to take the goods into his possession, I think that where he has no such right, but must levy and sell subject to the mortgage, an inventory of the goods in a mortgagee's possession, taken from the mortgage, is a sufficient constructive seizure, for the purpose of the levy, as against both mortgagor and mortgagee, and that they or persons claiming under them have no right to demand an actual view as necessary to a valid levy on the mortgaged chattels.

Second. It is insisted that, if the mortgages of McDowell are paid, the payment was made from Thompson's funds, being the rental of his property, and he is therefore in equity entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the chattel mortgages. But, if the levy was valid, Thompson took title to the chattels subject to the execution as well as the mortgages, and the law is settled that, where the owner or purchaser of property subject to several incumbrances, pays off a prior incumbrance by his own money, the payment inures to the benefit of the subsequent incumbrances, and as against them the prior incumbrances cannot be kept alive for the owner's benefit, even by express agreement. Bolles v. Wade, 4 N. J. Eq. 458; Traphagen v. Lyons, 38 N. J. Eq. 618, 616 (Err. & App. 1884). A fortiori, on such payment by the owner without any agreement for subrogation or keeping the security alive, a court of equity will not revive the prior incumbrance against subsequent incumbrances, by the application of the equitable doctrine of subrogation in favor of the owner.

Complainant is entitled to a declaration that the mortgages have been paid, and that the sale of the goods to Thompson was subject to the lien of its judgment and execution. At the settlement of the decree I will hear counsel on the right to further relief. This may depend on the terms of the agreement for sale of the mortgaged chattels, made by consent of parties after filing the bill.

ROSE et ux. v. COOLEY et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 19, 1906.)

TENANCY IN COMMON — POSSESSION BY ONE TENANT TO EXCLUSION OF CO-TENANTS — PARTITION — RENTAL VALUE OF PREMISES AND PROFITS — ACCOUNTING — ACTIONS — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for the partition of lands owned in common, evidence that on the death of the parties' ancestor the premises were rented, but were shortly thereafter vacated; that one of defendants, who had been supporting her co-tenants, her half-sisters, and complainant, her half-brother, being unable to continue so doing, suggested that complainant and his two sisters occupy the farm; that, on taking possession thereof, payment of rent was not considered; that the farm was run at a loss, complainant expending his own money in repairs, etc., and repeatedly asking defendant, his half-sister, to relieve him of the burden of the farm, which she declined to do, encouraging him to stay until a favorable sale be made; that on one or two occasions complainant gave defendant money, at one time a check for $50, indorsed with a memorandum that it was for rent, and on another occasion, when some material was sold from the farm for $40, giving her $10 thereof as her share; and that several times defendant applied to complainant for what she called rent—did not show that complainant and his two half-sisters refused possession to defendant, or deprived her of the income of the premises, it appearing that there never was any net income, taking the whole period together, but rather a loss; and hence defendant was not entitled to an accounting for the use of the premises.

Bill by J. Forman Rose and wife against Emma L. Cooley and others. On exceptions to report of master appointed in partition proceedings and objections to confirmation thereof. Report confirmed and exceptions dismissed.

E. R. Walker, for complainant and for defendant Rose. Linton Satterthwait, for defendant Crozier. Vroom, Dickinson & Scamell, for defendant Cooley.

BERGEN, V. C. The bill of complaint in this cause prays the partition of lands therein described, owned as tenants in common by the complainant, his two sisters, Ella P. Rose and Mary L. Crozier, and his half-sister, Emma L. Cooley; the sisters and half-sister being made defendants. Mrs. Cooley answered, praying for an accounting by her half-brother and sisters. An order of reference to a master was made, which directed him to ascertain and report whether or not the complainant and his sisters, Ella P. and Mary L., or some of them, had been in the possession of the whole of said premises to the exclusion of the answering defendant, Emma L. Cooley, and whether their occupation had been of such a character as to exclude her from participation in the enjoyment thereof, and whether they should account to her for the use of the premises, and that the said master should also ascertain the reasonable rental value or income which the land was capable of yielding from the month of March, 1891, to the present time. The master, upon due notice to the parties, proceeded to the taking of the depositions of such witnesses as were produced before him, and thereupon reported that the complainant and his two sisters, Ella P. and Mary L., had not, nor had either of them, been in the possession of the whole of the lands to the exclusion of their half-sister, Emma L., and that their occupation had not been of such a character as to exclude Mrs. Cooley from participation in the enjoyment thereof, and that they were not liable to account for such occupation. The master also reported that, from the evidence offered, he was unable to fix the reasonable rental value of the farm, or the income which it was capable of yielding during the time stated in the order of reference. To this report the defendant Mrs. Cooley has filed exceptions, and objects to the confirmation of the report, which is the matter now to be passed upon.

The evidence taken before the master shows that the father of these four children died seised of the lands in question; that at the time of his death the children, other than Mrs. Cooley, were minors; and that the farm was rented to a tenant for money rent until April, 1891, at which time the tenant left the farm, and for some reason the owners were not able to secure another tenant. Just previous to April, 1891, the husband of Mrs. Cooley died, she having, after her father's death, and until April, 1891, supported the infant children at her house, which was located within sight of the lands in question. Owing to the death of her husband, Mrs. Cooley did not feel able to continue the arrangement and suggested that, as the complainant was then about 19 years of age, he should take his two sisters and occupy the farm and farm it. It clearly appears from the evidence that when these children went to the farm the payment of rent was not considered, nor, in my judgment, was it expected; for the principal motive which Mrs. Cooley had in making the arrangement was to provide a place where these children could support themselves and at the same time keep the farm in condition to induce a profitable sale of it. The testimony clearly discloses the fact that the running of the farm was not a profitable business, for, after years of renting, it had acquired the characteristics of all farm lands subject to such treatment, the fences had nearly all disappeared, and the buildings were in a decaying condition, so much so that, on one occasion, the end of the barn fell away from the rest of the building, and was repaired by the complainant at considerable expense; that during the period the complainant and his sisters lived on the farm he invested in repairs to the buildings, the putting up of fences, and the fertilizing of the land, not only all the proceeds he derived therefrom, but all the patrimony he had received from his father's estate, amounting, as I am able to gather from the evidence, to about $1,000; that during this time he repeatedly asked Mrs. Cooley to take the farm and relieve him from the burden, but she declined, and encouraged him to stay, hoping for a favorable sale. On one or two occasions he did give her money, at one time a check for $50, indorsed with a memorandum that it was for rent, and on another occasion, when some material was sold from the farm for $40, he gave her $10 of it, being her share. From these circumstances, and from the further fact that she at different times applied to him for rent as she puts it, or for her share of the farm as the other witnesses say, it was argued that Mrs. Cooley is sustained in her claim that there was an agreement to pay rent; but I do not think that such an inference is properly to be deduced from these circumstances. She did, undoubtedly, on several occasions apply to the complainant for what she called rent; but I am satisfied that what she meant was a proportion of the profits arising from the working of the farm. A reading of this evidence will not justify the conclusion that these three children refused possession to their elder sister and co-tenant, or deprived her of the income from the premises. On the contrary, there never was any net income, taking the whole period together, but rather a loss, which absorbed the little property which the complainant had inherited, and that without taking into consideration the years of labor which he devoted to the preservation of the property.

In Edsall v. Merrill, 37 N. J. Eq. 114-117, Van Fleet, V. C., said: "The principle adopted may be stated as follows: Where the tenant in possession has prevented his co-tenants from obtaining from the premises such profits as they were capable of yielding, or has taken possession of the whole, and used them as his own, and thereby made a profit, he must account either for their fair rental value, or the profits." Applying this rule to the circumstances of this case, the report of the master should be sustained. These co-tenants were put in possession by this claimant, their elder sister and the head of the family, and, so far from preventing her from obtaining from the premises such profits as they were capable of yielding, they were holding, at her request and for the joint benefit of all the co-tenants, possession of the premises at an actual cost to them, to which she never contributed or offered to contribute a dollar to reimburse the complainant for the losses he was sustaining because the premises yielded no profit. Nor did the complainant or his sisters take possession of the whole premises and use them as their own, and thereby make a profit. Instead of taking possession, they were put in possession by their elder sister for her convenience and to keep the property in condition for a purchaser. A considerable portion of the evidence was directed to the question to which of these parties were responsible for the failure to make a sale of the property. I am satisfied that the great preponderance of evidence tends to show that the complainant and the two sisters who were on the farm with him, one, Mary, being there but a portion of the time, were anxious to sell, and that, if the sale was prevented, it was because Mrs. Cooley was unwilling to join in the conveyance.

The master's report will be confirmed, and the exceptions dismissed, with the costs of the accounting to be charged against the share of Mrs. Cooley.

BALTIMORE & N. Y. R. CO. v. BOUVIER et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 15, 1906.)

1. ESTOPPEL—GROUNDS.

Where, in partition proceedings, a master's deed was in substance and effect executed by the direction in writing of a husband and wife, and they received their share of the consideration money, they were estopped from setting up that the conveyance did not pass any interest in the land on the ground that the master's deed was void.

2. EMINENT DOMAIN—RAILROADS—CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS—COMPENSATION—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—IMPROVEMENTS.

Where a railroad entered on land under a right of way deed, wherein it covenanted among other things to erect a passenger station and double-track its road for a certain distance, which conditions it failed to fulfill, the improvements made by the railroad on the land were not to be considered in determining, in condemnation proceedings thereafter instituted, the damages suffered by the vendor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Eminent Domain, § 361½.]

3. SAME—FORFEITURE—EJECTMENT—EFFECT OF JUDGMENT—TITLE.

Under Gen. St. p. 1288, § 44, providing that "a judgment in an action of ejectment shall be conclusive as to the right of possession and the title to the premises (as the case may be) as the same has been established by such judgment," where a railroad entered upon land under a right of way deed binding it to double-track its road and to erect a passenger station on the vendor's property, which grant it thereafter forfeited by failure to comply with the terms of the deed, and a judgment in ejectment was recovered against it, that fact did not give the vendor such a new and independent title as to bar the application of equitable principles in condemnation proceedings thereafter instituted, in determining whether or not the vendor was entitled to compensation for improvements made by the railroad prior to the forfeiture.

4. SAME—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Where, in fixing the price of land conveyed to a railroad for right of way purposes, the benefit resulting to the landowner from improvements to be made by the railroad in the way of a passenger station and double tracks was taken into consideration in fixing the compensation under the deed, the comparative value of the land with and without the advantages of such improvements was determinative of the abatement or allowance to the railroad company in fixing the price for the land conveyed.

5. SAME—EQUITABLE RELIEF—BREACH OF COVENANTS.

Where, under a right of way deed, a railroad company covenanted to double-track its road and construct a passenger station, but it did not appear that any benefit would result to the vendor from such improvements, the road being distinctly one for the carriage of freight, a breach of such covenants by the railroad did not debar it of equitable relief, in condemnation proceedings instituted by it after declaration of a forfeiture for the breach, with respect to the allowance to the vendor of compensation for improvements already made by the road on the land.

6. SAME—COSTS.

Where, in condemnation proceedings, the position and conduct of a railroad was in accordance with the principles of a court of equity, and in such proceedings it substantially succeeded, it was entitled to costs, although in its supplemental bill it asked the court to ignore the findings of the jury and ascertain the amount of compensation to be paid defendant landowner in its own way; no proceedings being had under such prayer, and defendant incurring no expense by reason of the insertion of the prayer in the bill.

Bill by the Baltimore & New York Railroad Company against John Vernou Bouvier, Jr., and others. Decree for complainant in accordance with opinion.

For the previous history of the litigation between these parties, see Bouvier v. Baltimore & New York Railroad Company, 65 N. J. Law, 313, 47 Atl. 772; 67 N. J. Law, 281, 51 Atl. 781, 60 L. R. A. 750, on error; and 69 N. J. Law, 149, 53 Atl. 1040, on certiorari.

E. Q. Keasbey, for complainant. R. V. Lindabury, for defendant Bouvier. W. L. McDermott and Charles E. Lydecker, for heirs and devisees of William H. Hume.

PITNEY, V. C. The complainant, on March 22, 1889, purchased and took title from Frederick K. Reichard and William H. Hume to a strip of land (part of a much larger tract) containing $5\frac{52}{100}$ acres, being 2,200 feet, nearly half a mile, in length, and 100 feet in width, for the purposes of its railway, and proceeded promptly thereafter to construct its railway thereon. The conveyance, however, contained a series of clauses providing for the construction and maintenance of a double-track railway over the land conveyed, and for the erection and maintenance of a passenger station at one end of the strip on a small additional plot outside the 100-foot strip, but included in the conveyance. The deed also contained clauses providing that, if the grantee should fail to construct and maintain a double-track railway, then "it shall and may be lawful to and for the parties of the first part, their heirs or assigns, into and upon all and singular the lands and premises hereby conveyed, or any part thereof, to re-enter, and the same to have again, repossess, and enjoy as in their former estate, this conveyance, or anything herein contained, to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding, together with all and singular, the buildings, improvements, etc., with the appurtenances; subject to the covenants and conditions, hereinbefore set forth, to be kept and performed by the said party of the second part, its successors and assigns, to have and to hold," etc.

The complainant constructed a double-track railway over about two-thirds of the strip only, and did not erect the passenger station. The whole tract was subsequently, in the year 1895, subjected to partition proceedings in this court and actually divided between the tenants in common, with the exception of the right of re-entry in the railway strip, which was sold by a master under a decree of the court, and subsequently, together with the title to some of the lands divided, became vested in the defendant Bouvier. He, early in the year 1900, brought an action of ejectment against the railway company, and recovered, on the ground that the condition subsequent had not been fulfilled and that the right of re-entry reserved by the deed of conveyance had become vested in him. The judgment of the Supreme Court (47 Atl. 772) was based upon the notion that the whole title was vested in him. The complainant brought a writ of error to the Court of Errors and Appeals (51 Atl. 781, 60 L. R. A. 750), and that court affirmed the judgment, but expressed the opinion that Bouvier's title extended only to one undivided half of the premises by reason of the invalidity of the master's deed in partition for the strip in question, but held that as a tenant in common he was entitled to maintain an ejectment. Upon the affirmance of this judgment complainant filed its bill in this court for relief against its execution, and made the defendant Elizabeth Hume, widow and devisee of William H. Hume, former owner of one-half, and their children, parties thereto with Bouvier, on the ground that under the judicial utterance of the Court of Errors and Appeals she was possibly, with or without her children, the owner of one undivided half of the premises. Interim relief against the writ of habere facias possessionem was granted upon verbal condition that the complainant would take immediate proceedings to acquire by condemnation the title to the strip, and later on the defendants Bouvier and Hume were required to consent that the commissioners, and, in case of an appeal, the jury, should make a double finding, namely: First, find the present value of the land with all the structures and improvements on it; and, second, its value without those improvements and as if never used for railroad purposes. This has been done.

The result was, as found by the commissioners, as follows:

|---|------------|
| The total value of land and railroad additions at the time of filing the petition for condemnation..... | $8,985 72 |
| Value of lands without railroad track, etc., as if it had never been used for railroad purposes..... | 1,964 00 |
| Damages to Bouvier as owner of adjoining lands..... | 500 00 |
| Damages, etc., to Hume..... | 500 00 |

An appeal was taken, and the jury found as follows:

|---|-------------|
| Value of land with railroad track and improvements..... | $18,212 50 |
| Value of the land without regard to railroad structure..... | 2,716 50 |
| Damages to Bouvier as owner of adjoining land..... | 8,600 00 |
| Damages to Mrs. Hume as adjoining owner..... | 8,780 00 |

A supplemental bill was thereupon filed by complainant, setting out and attacking the binding effect of this verdict in this court, stating several grounds why the court should disregard it, and by its own method ascertain the proper amount to be paid, and also praying that it might be instructed as to whether the defendant Hume was entitled to any interest on the award, and that pending the further proceedings in this court judgment and execution on the verdict might be stayed. Judgment and execution was stayed upon paying a sum of money into court. The defendants answered severally, and the defendant Bouvier filed a cross-bill against the defendants Hume to establish the validity in this court of his title under the master's deed in partition before referred to. This cross-bill was answered by the defendants Hume, and the cause brought to a hearing. With this brief statement of the history of the cause I will now consider the questions raised by the pleadings.

Two questions present themselves: First, are the defendants Hume entitled to any interest in the premises? Second, upon what basis the defendant Bouvier shall be entitled to compensation. I shall consider the question of the Humes' title first, because its solution will, as we shall see farther on, seriously affect the other question.

The railroad strip was part of a larger tract of land which was bisected by it. Reichard, one of the tenants in common at the date of the deed of conveyance to the railroad, afterwards conveyed his interest to Salter, who later on conveyed it to Sergeant and De Marmon, the result of which was that Sergeant and De Marmon became tenants in common with William H. Hume. On May 21, 1895, De Marmon filed his bill against his co-tenants in common for a partition of the premises. In it he set out the land conveyed to the railroad company and the condition upon which it was conveyed. To that bill William H. Hume and his wife, Elizabeth, the defendant herein, appeared by their solicitor, Mr. N. C. J. English, and filed their answer. On the 24th of September, 1895, the complainant filed an amended bill, praying special relief as to the railroad strip. On the 2d of December a decree pro confesso was entered against Sergeant and wife, and an order of reference to Master Atwater to ascertain the value and the capacity of the land to be divided was made in the usual form, and to that order Mr. English, as solicitor for Hume and wife, consented. Master Atwater found that the premises were capable of partition, excepting the railroad strip, and recites in his report that he was attended by the solicitor of the Humes. On that report, which was confirmed, partition was had of all except the railroad strip, and a decree was made that the railroad strip should be sold by Master Byington, and that decree is expressly consented to by Mr. English in writing, as solicitor of Hume and his wife, and by Mr. George Biller, as solicitor of Sergeant and his wife. The master made sale to De Marmon and Sergeant for the sum of $681, which sale was reported and duly confirmed by order dated September 22, 1896, and the deed delivered and the purchase money paid. The master, since deceased, filed his statement showing what he did with that money in detail. All but $132.05 went for costs and expenses, of which latter Hume's solicitor received $16.52 and a counsel fee of $75. There was left for distribution $132.05, of which Mr. Hume received for his share $56.03 as certified to by the master. These allowances of counsel fees were made by the court and the whole proceeding validated by a final decree dated October 13, 1896. It was not disputed at the hearing that Mr. English was duly authorized to appear for Mr. Hume, and his attendance as a witness was waived. The only question raised was as to his authority to appear and represent Mrs. Hume, the defendant herein, in protection of her inchoate right of dower in the premises, and that, as I recollect, was submitted on the ordinary presumption that he was so authorized. Mrs. Hume was not sworn as a witness, she being too ill to attend. Mrs. Hume, the defendant herein, succeeded to the title of her husband to these premises after his death.

I think it must be presumed from the report of the master that he actually did pay a portion of the proceeds of the sale to Hume or his solicitor, so that, not only did Hume authorize, through his solicitor, the sale of these premises by the master, but he actually received, in person or through his solicitor, one-half of the consideration money therefor. Now that the court of chancery has had and exercised since the time of Queen Elizabeth jurisdiction of the subject-matter of dealing with the rights of coparceners and tenants in common in land, and decreeing partition thereof, including owelty where equal partition could not be made, seems to be undisputed. And, while I do not find it necessary to assert that the decreeing of owelty to be paid by one tenant in common to the other amounts to exercising the jurisdiction of sale outright, it certainly approaches it somewhat nearly. Be that as it may, the sale of land by this court in partition proceedings is, and for many years has been, clearly within the jurisdiction of this court. Its exercise is indeed regulated by statute, but its jurisdiction in that behalf clearly and ex necessitate rei includes the power to construe that statute, and if the court makes a mistake therein its decree is subject to reversal on appeal. But, if not reversed on appeal, I should have thought, but for what was said by the learned judge, speaking for the Court of Errors and Appeals in Bouvier v. Baltimore & New York Railroad Company, 67 N. J. Law, at page 294, 51 Atl. 781, 60 L. R. A. 750, that a conveyance made by order of the court in partition and duly confirmed by the court could not be attacked collaterally. The substance and effect of the decision in its ultimate analysis is, after all, no more than this: The defendant in ejectment contended that the plaintiff's title, derived through the master's deed in partition, was void. To this the court replied: Conceding that it is void, yet the plaintiff remains the owner of an equal undivided one-half part, and that is sufficient to sustain his action.

There was nothing in the decision, or judgment of the court which was based thereon, which could operate as an estoppel against Mr. Bouvier. The rule, as I recollect it, with regard to estoppel by record, is that it must be mutual; that one party shall not be estopped unless the other would be in case of a contrary decision. Now, as Mrs. Hume was not a party to the record before the Court of Errors and Appeals, she could not have been estopped by a declaration of that court that she had no interest in the land in question; hence Bouvier could not be estopped by a contrary decision. Be that as it may, the circumstances attending the making of the decree for sale in this case were not before the Court of Errors and Appeals, nor was that court at liberty in that case to deal with the title of either Bouvier or Mrs. Hume, as between them, from an equitable standpoint. From a chancellor's standpoint the decree for sale and its execution was made, so to speak, by the direction in writing of Mr. and Mrs. Hume, so that the master's deed was, in substance and effect, the deed of Mr. and Mrs. Hume; and when we have the additional fact that they received their share of the consideration money it seems to me quite plain that they are estopped, on plain principles of justice, from setting up that the conveyance did not pass their interest in the land. For these reasons, expressed orally at the hearing, I shall advise that Mrs. Hume and her children have no interest in the premises.

We come now to the complainant's case as made by the bill, answers, and proofs as against Mr. Bouvier. The proof shows, and it was admitted, that immediately after the rendition of the final judgment in ejectment complainant attempted without success to settle with Mr. Bouvier. But, if he had agreed with Mr. Bouvier as to the price to be paid for the strip in question, he was still embarrassed by the express declaration of the Court of Errors and Appeals, above referred to, that an equal and undivided one-half part of the title still rested in the heirs at law and devisees of Mr. Hume. Mrs. Hume seemed to be the universal devisee of her husband, who had in the meantime died. But then it further appeared that there were children, who were born after the making of Mr. Hume's will, and their conveyances to their mother were, as I now recollect, not yet on record. Bouvier did not admit any title outside of himself. Under these circumstances the complainant had a clear equity to apply to this court for relief: First, to ascertain who were the real owners of the strip; and, second, as I think and am well assured, to ask this court to determine how much it ought to pay those owners when ascertained. This latter equity will be elaborated further on. It is proper for me here to say that, when counsel for complainant first applied to me for an interim injunction against the execution of defendant's judgment in ejectment, he desired me to proceed upon the basis of the practice adopted in Trenton Water Power Company v. Chambers, 9 N. J. Eq. 471, but I declined so to do, and declared that I would only grant an injunction upon condition that complainant would take immediate proceedings for condemnation, stating orally at the time that I would so manage it that the commissioners, and jury on appeal, should appraise the value and damages in such manner that this court would be informed of the value and damages, both with and without the improvements, placed upon the premises by the railroad. This course was pursued.

The defendant Bouvier answered the original bill, denying that complainant had any standing in this court for any purpose, and denying that it had any right to take the condemnation proceedings mentioned in its bill, and added to his answer a cross-bill praying that complainant be enjoined from so doing. He shortly thereafter removed the condemnation proceedings by certiorari to the Supreme Court, and there challenged their validity, and was defeated, as reported in 69 N. J. Law, 149, 53 Atl. 1040. Promptly after this decision complainant applied for, on notice, and obtained leave to amend its bill both in its statement and its prayer, in substance as follows: In the stating part, that if proceedings for condemnation were taken the inquiry before the commissioners will be limited to an appraisal of the land and an assessment of the value thereof at the time of the condemnation, and damages sustained by the owner on the same basis, and that neither the commissioners, nor the jury on appeal, have power to inquire into the circumstances of the case, nor consider the equities set forth in the bill; then alleging the fact that valuable improvements have been made by the complainant since its entry on the premises prior to 1890 under the deed from Reichard and Hume, and that a railroad has been built thereon, part of a greater line, and that an appraisal which should include the value of the railroad tracks would not be a measure of the fair compensation to the owner of the land, and would work great injustice to the complainant, and that the compensation which should fairly be made to the defendant could only be ascertained by this court or under its direction, and in view of the facts hereinbefore set forth; and a further amendment in the prayer that this court may retain the bill and may proceed, in such manner as it may see fit, to ascertain what is the fair and full compensation that should be made by the complainant, under all the circumstances of the case, to the defendant for the taking of the lands and the damages sustained by reason thereof, the complainant tendering itself ready and willing to pay the amount so ascertained, and, further, that if this court should see fit to direct that the proceedings for condemnation should be continued, then an order may be made that the commissioners, and jury in case of appeal, should appraise and estimate the value of the land taken apart from the structure and work and materials placed and done thereon, and without regard to the tracks and cuttings and embankments laid and made thereon, and without regard to the use made by the complainant of the railroad built thereon. No answer was filed to this amendment.

Coincident with the amendment of the bill by the complainant, the defendant Bouvier applied for and obtained leave to withdraw so much of his answer as was a cross-bill, and the complainant's answer thereto was also withdrawn, and then, on motion of the complainant and without objection by the defendant Bouvier, a special order was made as follows: It recites that it appears to the court that commissioners have been appointed to condemn the land in question, and the complainant asks it to make provision for ascertaining the value of the lands proposed to be taken for railroad purposes, apart from the railroad and structures already made and built thereon by the complainant, and that an order may be made to assure a special assessment by the commissioners, and by the jury in case of appeal, of the value of the land as if it had never been used for railroad purposes and no embankments, cuts, or structures had been built or made thereon; such assessment to be in addition to and independent of such assessment as may be or shall be made under the order made by the judge or court appointing said commissioners, and proceeds: "It is ordered that the defendant shall consent at the hearing before the commissioners in the proceedings for condemnation, and before the jury on appeal, for the purposes of such proceedings and of this cause and for no other purpose, that the commissioners and the jury, respectively, when making an appraisal and assessment in such proceedings, and in addition to the appraisal and assessment so made by them, shall make a special appraisal of the value of the land to be condemned as if it had never been used for railroad purposes, without regard to the railroad track, structures, trestles, embankments, cuttings, additions, and changes made or built thereon by the complainant, or to the use made of the lands and structures by the complainant as a part of its railroad." Under these circumstances I think that simple justice to the complainant requires that the case should be considered in all respects as if the amendments to its original bill, just referred to, had been inserted in the bill at the time it was filed, and the condemnation proceedings should be treated as having been taken by the direction of this court as a convenient mode of ascertaining values to be used by this court in working out and administering the equities between the parties.

The result of those proceedings was the two findings by the jury above mentioned. After the rendition of these verdicts a motion was made in the law court for a new trial, and refused. The complainant then filed a supplemental bill, setting up the proceedings in the law court, praying for relief against a judgment being entered on either of the verdicts, charging that they were unjust and excessive and based upon wrong principles, and asked this court to disregard both verdicts and to ascertain for itself, in such manner as it might see fit, what amount the complainant ought to pay. In his answer to this supplemental bill the defendant merely echoed his previous answer, and denied that the complainant had any equity whatever, setting up that the complainant had deliberately taken his choice to proceed at law without application to this court and is bound by his selection, and stating as a reason why there is no injustice to the complainant in holding it to the larger verdict that the complainant forfeited its title to said land by its own voluntary act and breach of the conditions in its deed. In this condition of the pleadings the cause was brought to a hearing. I declined to hear any evidence to show that either of the verdicts were excessive, unless complainant would satisfy me in argument that it would be just and equitable for me to do so. This he has not been able to do, especially in view of the admitted fact that a motion was made and heard by the learned judge who presided at the trial to set aside the verdicts because excessive. It would be manifestly unjust to permit the complainant to speculate in that manner on the result of an appeal which it had taken itself. Equity will not permit it to find fault with the result of an appeal which it has itself taken and which it was under no obligations to take. If the complainant had rested content with the award of the commissioners, and the defendant had appealed therefrom, with the result which actually occurred, it is quite possible that this court might, under the view which I take of this case, have determined that it would ignore the verdict of the jury and adopt the award of the commission. I feel constrained, however, to say that the great difference in the damages to adjoining property found by the commissioners and that found by the jury—about seven times as much—leads to the suspicion that the jury did take into consideration improper matter in the fixing of the damages.

Two questions remain: First. Shall this court adopt and compel the complainant to pay to Mr. Bouvier the whole value of the strip of land taken, which includes, confessedly, the value of its railroad embankments, cuts, and tracks, or shall it limit Mr. Bouvier's right to the value of the land without the railroad improvements, as found by the smaller verdict? Second. Is Mr. Bouvier entitled, under the circumstances, to any damages to his adjoining land?

As the result of the actual partition of the premises, as shown on the map forming part of the master's report in partition, Mr. Hume became the owner of certain tracts adjoining on the railroad on one side, and Mr. Bouvier's immediate grantors (and Mr. Bouvier in succession to them) became entitled to certain lands adjoining on the railroad on the other side, and by reason of his ownership of these lands, which were a part of the original tract, damages were awarded to him to the extent of \$3,600, and to the Humes, on the basis of their being the owner of an undivided one-half interest, damages were awarded to the extent of \$3,780, in all over \$7,380, while the value of the land itself, without the railroad structures, was put at \$2,716.50. But, as the Humes' interest is eliminated, they are not, of course entitled to any damages to adjoining lands; hence the amount to be paid by complainant, if the value of the improvements is excluded, is \$6,316.50. The quantity of land originally conveyed by Bouvier's grantors to complainant was $5\frac{2}{100}$ acres, consisting of a strip 100 feet wide and about 2,200 feet, or a little over one-third of a mile, in length, with an addition at one end of $\frac{21}{100}$ acres, outside of the 100-foot strip, which was intended for a railroad station. The strip conveyed and here in question omits the railroad station and includes only $4\frac{21}{100}$ acres. It may be well to observe just here that at no stage of the proceedings did counsel on either side suggest to the court that the commissioners should be instructed to ascertain the value of the land and incidental damages as of the date of the original entry by the railway, with the view of adopting that value, with interest from the date thereof, as a proper method of compensation. Manifestly that rule was inapplicable.

Coming, now, to the first question: A long line of cases in this court, and one in the Supreme Court of this state, and numerous others in other states of the Union, collected and cited by counsel for the complainant, hold with entire unanimity that, except where the railroad company entered in the first place as a willful trespasser, or where it has been guilty of some inequitable conduct sufficient to raise a counter equity, the value of the land without the additions and superstructures is the proper measure of compensation in a case like the present. Such was the expressed declaration, after full consideration, of our Court of Errors and Appeals in North Hudson County Railroad Company v. Booraem et al., 28 N. J. Eq. 450. The foundation of the rule in equity is its intrinsic justice. This appears from an examination of the cases cited. Justice Depue, in the Booraem Case, supra, at page 453, says: "But where the company has taken possession by the consent of the owner, and has expended money in the adaptation of the land to the proposed use, and altered and changed its condition, this rule [referring to the fixed rule at law] manifestly is not adapted to reach the just compensation contemplated by the constitutional provision." Then, after showing that it might be unjust to the landowner to compel him to take the value of the land at the time of the appraisement, because it might have been injured in value by reason of the change made by the railroad company, he proceeds: "On the other hand, to compel the corporation to pay, as the value of the land, an increased price because of the improvements made by it, would be unjust to it. The owner has no claim in justice to have expenditures for such purposes inure to his benefit. Under such circumstances he is entitled to be paid the damages he has sustained, and nothing more. That will be represented by the value of the land as it was before it was changed in its condition, irrespective of the structure put upon it by the corporation, and interest from that time. Neither in law nor in equity is the owner entitled to anything more." The learned judge then proceeds to cite cases in support of that proposition. This rule had been previously applied in the case of Trenton Water Company v. Chambers, 9 N. J. Eq. 471 (s. c., 18 N. J. Eq. 199). Confessedly the same rule was adopted at law in Coster et al. v. New Jersey Railroad & Transportation Co., 23 N. J. Law, 227, and Id., 24 N. J. Law, 780. And it was only by what was held by the law court to be the stress of the statute regulating condemnation proceedings that any other rule was adopted at law. For in Leeds v. Camden & Atlantic Railroad Company, 53 N. J. Law, 229, 23 Atl. 168, the learned judge who spoke for the Court of Errors and Appeals closed his opinion as follows: "The equitable rule, which appears to have been followed in the present case, is that, when prepayment has been waived, the landowner retains an equitable lien upon the land for the payment of such damages as he has sustained, when the company violates the conditions upon which the entry without compensation was permitted, which may be enforced in a court of equity. Wood, Railw. L. 785. The value of the land and damages at the time the entry was made, and interest from that time, have been fixed as a proper measure of damages in some such cases. See Hudson County R. R. v. Booraem, 28 N. J. Eq. 450, and later cases that have followed it. "When parties are before that court seeking the adjustment of equitable claims for and against the railroad company, all the rights of the landowner will be protected, and full compensation may be made, not only for the value of the land taken and the damages incident to the taking, but also for the breach of any agreement made with him, and allowance for the occupancy of the land under such agreement or by consent or license. When the company proceeds to condemn lands, under its charter, it can act only according to the exact terms of the power therein conferred. There was error in the ruling, and the judgment will be reversed."

The question in Leeds v. Camden, etc., R. R., supra, was whether the land should be appraised as of the date when taken or as of the date of the appraisal, and it was held that the statute required it to be taken as of the date of the appraisal. A careful reading of the opinion does not lead me to the conclusion that the court intended to decide that the value of the railroad structure should be added to the value of the land. However that may be, in the case which followed it in the Supreme Court, namely, Trimmer v. Penn., Poughkeepsie & Boston R. R. Co., 55 N. J. Law, 46, 25 Atl. 932, the learned judge who spoke for the Supreme Court seems to have so treated it, and states that there is an apparent inconsistency between the Leeds Case and the Booraem Case, and reconciles them as follows: "The difference, however, arises from a distinction taken in the later case between a proceeding to condemn, considered as a purely legal proceeding, and a proceeding in an equitable suit to ascertain the damages which the landowner has sustained by reason of the appropriation of his land. In equity, when a corporation having power to condemn has been let into possession by the landowner and makes improvements, the court will adjust the claims of the landowner upon the basis laid down in the Booraem Case. The court will, by means of a reference to a master, ascertain the damages to the landowner according to this standard of compensation. In the Booraem Case the award of the commissioners, although made upon an erroneous legal principle, was in conformity with the equitable rule, and so was permitted to stand in place of a report of a master to whom a reference might have been made. If the question of compensation had not been drawn into a court of equity by the foreclosure of a mortgage covering the land condemned in addition to other land, the rule adopted by the commissioners in that case would have been inaccurate. The result of these conflicting rules seems to be that if a corporation, under the conditions mentioned, takes proceedings to condemn lands, the legal rule applies; but, if the question of the value of the land becomes involved in a suit in equity the equitable rules apply. So if, under these conditions, the owner brings an action of ejectment to dispossess the company, a court of equity will stay the action upon payment of damages to be ascertained in conformity with the equitable rule. Trenton Water Co. v. Chambers, 9 N. J. Eq. 471; s. c., 18 N. J. Eq. 199." The question, after all, was not involved in the Trimmer Case, since the case disclosed no privity by way of succession or otherwise between the railroad company prosecuting the proceedings before the court and that which had built the works upon the ground included in the condemnation proceedings.

The only case which has been cited by the defendant in conflict with the Booraem Case and the other cases in the same line is Briggs v. Railroad Co., 43 Pac. 1131, decided by the Supreme Court of Kansas March 7, 1896. The case is much like the Booraem Case, and, as in that case, on condemnation proceedings the inferior tribunal held that the value of the land without the additions made by the railroad company was the true measure of compensation. But the Supreme Court on appeal held otherwise, and made the railroad pay the purchaser under foreclosure the full value. The injustice of it was felt by the Supreme Court, but it seems to have felt constrained to do the injustice. I prefer the rule laid down by our Court of Errors and Appeals in the Booraem Case, and am glad to feel bound to follow it.

Now the quality of justice or injustice in a given transaction does not depend upon or vary with the name or character of the court under whose jurisdiction it is brought for consideration. What is considered unjust in a court of equity is also considered unjust in a court of law, and so says Justice Depue in the Booraem Case. It is felt to be quite as unjust by a common-law judge for a trustee of the legal title to eject the cestui que trust and hold the subject of the trust against him as it was by the equity judge. The difference, and the only difference, between the two courts, lies in the variance in their several capacities to protect the rights of the cestui que trust. It is a mere matter of judicial machinery. The learned judges in the Leeds Case and the Trimmer Case, from whose opinions extracts have been recited, did not mean to say, and in fact did not say, that it was just that improvements already put upon the property by the railroad company should be included in making up the valuation and price to be paid by that company on condemnation proceedings, but only that the statute is so framed that it must be done. Aristotle (Ethics, book 5, c. 10) defines equity as "a better sort of justice, which corrects legal justice where the latter errs through being expressed in a universal form and not taking account of particular cases." And Grotius condensed this definition into the modern one, namely: "Equity is the correction of the law, wherein by reason of its universality it is deficient." It seems to me that the present case is brought directly and clearly within the definition of these great men, and the propriety and the duty of this court to exercise its corrective power abundantly appears and of itself gives this court jurisdiction to act.

The complainant herein, then, by all the authorities, is properly in this court, and is entitled to have the equitable rules applied precisely as in the Booraem Case, unless there are some circumstances in the case to bar its equity. Moreover, its right to ask the aid of the court arises not only out of the injustice of being compelled to pay the defendant for improvements which it has, at its own expense, put upon the premises, but it has a distinct standing in the court by reason of the character of the defendant's title, which rests upon a forfeiture by reason of complainant's failure to perform a condition subsequent. The right of re-entry for such failure was manifestly reserved in the deed, for the purpose of insuring the performance of those conditions. Hence the case assumes the aspect of a mortgage given to secure the performance of those conditions and must be so treated for present purposes.

Let us examine its position. In the first place, at the time it took the conveyance from the former owners it was duly empowered to acquire the lands by ordinary condemnation proceedings. But it agreed with the owners and bought the land, and paid for it the sum of $1,190, upwards of $200 per acre. Thus its original entry was entirely lawful. Nothing that it subsequently did or failed to do can alter that position. The right of re-entry in the grantors, found and established by the court, not only does not make that original entry unlawful, but recognizes its lawfulness. This price of $1,190 was not, however, the whole consideration for the conveyance. The grantors seem to have expected some benefit to their remaining land to arise from the construction of the proposed railway. Hence the insertion of the conditions, first, that a railway passenger station should be erected on part of the land conveyed, and maintained, and, second, that a double-track railway should be constructed and maintained over it. It will be observed here that there is no such provision here as was found in the case of N. Y. & Greenwood Lake R. R. Co. v. Stanley's Heirs, 34 N. J. Eq. 55, where the provision was for the running and stopping of four (4) trains daily each way. There was no provision here that any train should be run over the railway or should stop at the station. If the railway had been double-tracked all the way across the land conveyed—for that is the language—and nowhere else on the line of the railroad, and a passenger railway station had been erected and maintained, and no train had ever run over the road, and no passenger train ever stopped at the station, I am unable to see how any court could have declared that the land was forfeited and a right of re-entry had accrued. Be that as it may, the conditions were not fulfilled. The double track was laid two-thirds of the way across the strip, but the passenger station was never erected. In fact, it was admitted that the road was built and intended for the purpose of carrying freight only, and not passengers, and that it never has made it a business of carrying passengers, so that the passenger station would have proved, if built, of no value whatever to the landowners.

Let us now ask what were the actual conditions when this land was conveyed, and what reasonable expectation the landowners had of any appreciable benefit to them? The road in its total length is and was less than 6 miles, and its general course was and is northwest and southeast, which is directly athwart the general course of passenger travel in that portion of New Jersey. Its termini were a point at or near Cranford, on the Central Railroad of New Jersey, and Staten Island Sound, across which it was to be carried by a bridge to Staten Island. The grantors are chargeable with knowledge of all this. Manifestly it was not intended to be used as a passenger road. The land here in question lies between the New Jersey Central or the Lehigh Valley Railroad, at or near Cranford, and the Pennsylvania Railroad at the familiar point where the complainant's road crosses the latter road. Manifestly the only chance the complainant's road had of making a business of carrying passengers was to make some sort of a passenger traffic arrangement with either the Central Railroad of New Jersey or the Lehigh Valley Railroad, at or near Cranford, or with the Long Branch Railroad on the Sound, and manifestly and confessedly there was no population, present or prospective, along the complainant's road between the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Lehigh Valley Railroad which would warrant the establishment of a set of passenger trains to be run over it and to reach New York by either of those railroad lines. These considerations lead me to the conclusion that complainant's grantors had no reasonable grounds to expect any appreciable benefit from the construction and operation of the road.

With regard to the condition of building a double-track road. Its terms would have been fully and literally complied with, as before remarked, by laying a double track across the strip conveyed. But, suppose the implication was that it was to be double-tracked throughout its length of $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles, of what material benefit would such construction be to the grantor's land. I confess I am unable to see any, unless, indeed, it could be conceived that it was to become a great through route for passengers. But this supposition seems to me quite extravagant and inadmissible. A common experience teaches us that, the greater number of trains that pass over a railroad, the greater injury it is to the adjoining lands, though, on the other hand, the greater the number of passenger trains, the greater the probability of benefit. No evidence was offered before me to show what, if any, benefits were expected to be derived or could be derived by the fulfillment of the two conditions in question. The case was submitted on the bare right arising out of the nonperformance of the conditions. Now I deem this aspect of the case important, since Bouvier's right arises out of a forfeiture by the complainant of its land, for which it had once paid, by reason of the nonfulfillment of certain subsequent conditions. Now it is one of the offices of the court of chancery to relieve against forfeitures, and it does so gladly, but always upon equitable terms; and those terms are to make compensation to the party claiming the forfeiture for his real loss or injury. In the present case the complainant has lost the sum of \$1,199, with the interest on it for all these years, and I am unable to see, on that part of the case, why it ought to lose any more. No allegation of injury or loss is found in the defendant's answer, and no proof of any was offered by him. This, it seems to me, it was the privilege of the defendant to do. One of the reasons given by the learned judge in the Leeds Case for determining cases of this kind in this court is that "allowance can here be made for the breach of any agreement made by the railroad company with the land-owner."

Let us next inquire if there has been anything inequitable in complainant's conduct since the proceedings to recover the land were commenced. I think it was entirely justified in defending the case at law and saving the forfeiture, if it could do so. The questions raised were real, and not colorable merely, and were such as were fairly debatable. Upon the whole, then, I see no such conduct on the part of the complainant that may be deemed inequitable to such an extent or degree as to bar it from the right to be dealt with as a deserving suitor in this court and to have relief as such in accordance with the principles applicable to such cases. These positions were not seriously contested by counsel for Bouvier, as I understand his oral argument. I understood him to place himself on the ground that all these equitable considerations are barred by the action and judgment of ejectment; that the relation between the railroad company and the original grantors, and himself as their successor, is entirely changed by the judgment in ejectment; and that that judgment gives Bouvier a new, independent, solidified, and crystalized title, which in some mysterious way bars the exercise, or rather the application, of any equitable principles. I am unable to take that view, or to see the least force in the argument presented in its support. A proceeding in ejectment is simply one to obtain possession of land. In order to succeed, the plaintiff therein must show that at the time he commenced his suit he was entitled to such possession. He need show no more. Nothing else is put in issue. The character or extent of the title, whether in fee, or in pledge, or for a term of years, or for a single year, is not put in issue nor determined by the court, if it be in the plaintiff's favor. Nor is the character or quality of the right, whatever it may be, upon which the plaintiff recovered, in the least degree affected, increased, or strengthened by a judgment in his favor. He obtains no new title, nor anything in the nature of a new title, but simply a declaration of the court to the effect that by virtue of the right which he had at the commencement of the suit he is entitled to take possession. This appears clearly from the judgment record in this case. The section of the statute (Gen. St. p. 1288), relied on by counsel for the defendant is as follows: "44. A judgment in an action of ejectment shall be conclusive as to the right of possession, and the title to the premises (as the case may be), as the same has been established by such judgment." The declaration of the plaintiff in ejectment herein declares that the plaintiff Bouvier "demands of the Baltimore & New York Railroad Company, the defendants therein, the possession of all that land," etc. And the judgment is: "Therefore it is considered that the said plaintiff do recover against the said defendant his term yet to come of and in the tenements aforesaid, with the appurtenances; * * * and thereupon the said plaintiff prays the writ of the state of New Jersey, directed to the sheriff of the county of Union aforesaid, to cause him to have possession of his said term yet to come," etc. Clearly, then, we must look beyond the record for the real character of defendant's title. And when we do so we find that it rests on a forfeiture, and all that is conclusively settled by the judgment in ejectment is that the forfeiture has actually taken place, with all its legal consequences.

But, argues the counsel for the defendant in his written argument, the effect of the judgment in ejectment, if it be limited in its effect to showing that the defendant herein was the party who was entitled to possession at the time of the commencement of his suit, is nevertheless to show that at that time the entire estate of the complainant in the premises was gone forever, and it stood without a shred of right at law to retain possession. Its estate under the deed was entirely gone, and by its own consent Bouvier, the defendant herein, became possessed as of the former estate of Reichard and Hume, and was not entitled by virtue of its former estate, either legally or equitably, for any allowance on account of improvements put thereupon. Granting that may be so in a court of law, it is to be remarked that the same is true of a common-law mortgage after ejectment brought and recovered upon it, or of an absolute deed given to secure a sum of money. But the question here is whether that hard and fast rule of the common law applies to a court of equity. I think not. I am unable to see why it should, any more than in any other case of forfeiture of an estate by breach of a condition subsequent. The effect of the judgment of ejectment based on a mortgage, or an ordinary deed of conveyance by way of mortgage, is simply to establish at law the right of the plaintiff in ejectment, and does not affect the equity of redemption. No case was cited by counsel to sustain his position in that behalf. And the same principle applies in the case of the loss of the legal title by breach of a condition subsequent. If the defendant has an equitable defense, it is undisturbed by the judgment in ejectment.

The principle contended for by defendant would prevent this court from relieving against the loss of an estate, by breach of a condition subsequent, no matter how unimportant the condition or how trifling the injury actually resulting therefrom. This doctrine is enlarged upon by Mr. Justice Story (section 1316) as follows: "In reason, in conscience, in natural equity, there is no ground to say, because a man has stipulated for a penalty in case of his omission to do a particular act (the real object of the parties being the performance of the act), that if he omits to do the act he shall suffer an enormous loss, wholly disproportionate to the injury to the other party. If it be said that it is his own folly to have made such a stipulation, it may equally well be said that the folly of one man cannot authorize gross oppression on the other side." At section 1314, speaking of penalties, he says: "If it is to secure the performance of some collateral act or undertaking, then courts of equity will retain the bill, and will direct an issue of quantum damnificatus; and, when the amount of damages is ascertained by a jury, upon the trial of such an issue, they will grant relief upon payment of such damages." And in section 1315 he says: "And, in cases of this sort, admitting of compensation, there is rarely any distinction allowed in courts of equity between conditions precedent and conditions subsequent; for it has been truly said that, although the distinction between conditions precedent and conditions subsequent is known and often mentioned in courts of equity, yet the prevailing, though not the universal, distinction as to condition there is between cases where compensation can be made and cases where it cannot be made, without any regard to the fact whether they are conditions precedent or conditions subsequent."

Prof. Pomeroy, in section 381 of his treatise on Equity Jurisprudence, says: "The general doctrine was finally settled that, wherever a penalty or forfeiture is inserted merely to secure the payment of money, or the performance of some act, or the enjoyment of some right or benefit, equity regards such payment, performance, or enjoyment as the real and principal intent of the instrument, and the penalty or forfeiture as merely an accessory, and will therefore relieve the debtor party from such penalty or forfeiture, whenever the actual damages sustained by the creditor party can be adequately compensated. The application of the principle in such cases, and the relief against penalties or forfeitures, must always depend upon the question whether compensation can or cannot be made. If the principal contract is merely for the payment of money, there can be no difficulty. The debtor party will always be relieved from the penalty or forfeiture upon paying the amount due interest. If the principal contract is for the performance of some other act or undertaking, and its nonperformance can be pecuniarily compensated, the amount of such damages will be ascertained, and the debtor will be relieved upon their payment. But the principle, in this scope of its operation, is not confined to agreements. It has been extended so as to prevent the forfeiture of a tenant's estate under a clause of re-entry for the nonpayment of rent, or for the breach of some, though not all, the covenants contained in a lease, and to prevent the enforcement of a forfeiture for the nonperformance of conditions subsequent." And in section 433 he says: "Where the penalty is to secure the performance of some collateral act or undertaking, equity will interpose, if adequate compensation can be made to the creditor party. The original practice in such cases was for the court of equity to retain the bill, direct an issue to ascertain the amount of damages, and to grant relief upon payment of the damages thus assessed by the jury. By the more modern practice the court of equity would doubtless determine the amount of damages itself, without the intervention of a jury."

This doctrine depends upon the intrinsic equity of the affair, and not, as contended by counsel for defendant, upon the other general heads of equity jurisprudence—fraud, accident, mistake, surprise, and the like. Thus we have Prof. Pomeroy, in section 451, distinctly stating as follows: "Although the agreement is not one measurable by a pecuniary compensation, still, if the party bound by it has been prevented from an exact fulfillment, so that a forfeiture is incurred, by unavoidable accident, by fraud, by surprise, or by ignorance, not willful, a court of equity will interpose and relieve him from the forfeiture so caused" upon equitable terms. And he further holds (section 452) in effect that, even where the fault is without what may be termed "equitable excuse," relief may be granted. And it is proper here to remark that the negligence or willful default of the debtor in the payment of the amount secured by an ordinary money bond will not debar the debtor from relief from payment of the amount actually due. And Mr. Justice Scudder, speaking for the Court of Errors and Appeals in Grigg v. Landis, 21 N. J. Eq. 494, at page 501, uses this significant language: "Penalties, forfeitures, and re-entries for conditions broken are not favored in equity, and constitute a large branch of equitable relief. Usually they are held to be securities for the payment of money and the performance of conditions, and, where compensation can be made for nonpayment and non-performance, equity will relieve against the rigid enforcement of the contract. This is upon the general principles that a court of equity is a court of conscience, and will permit nothing to be done within its jurisdiction which is unconscionable." The court was there dealing with the case of specific performance of a contract to convey land, and the complainant was met by a clause of forfeiture in the contract. But, says the defendant, there is a class of cases where the damages are so uncertain and so difficult of ascertainment with precision that the court will not undertake to relieve against a forfeiture, and he contends that this is one of those cases, and he ranges it with that class of cases, arising out of ordinary contracts, where the parties have agreed upon a fixed sum of money as liquidated damages in case of breach, and which the courts find to be liquidated damages, because the actual damages are so difficult of ascertainment as to render liquidated damages conscionable. But, even in those cases, where the damages fixed and declared to be liquidated so far exceed any injury that the court can conceive that it is either probable or possible that the party can have sustained, the courts avoid, if possible, the enforcement of the contract.

Now, let us see how this case stands in that respect. But just here, and before proceeding to consider that precise question, it is proper to remark that counsel for complainant addressed a strong argument to me in favor of his position that by the true construction of the contract it was not within the contemplation of the parties that anything more than the land without the railroad structure should revert in case of the breach of the condition subsequent. Without expressing any opinion on that argument, I refer to what I have already said with regard to the circumstance that the location and length of the railroad was such as to preclude the idea that its establishment and operation could be of much value by way of benefit to the adjoining property, and it does seem to me that the forfeiture of $13,000 or $14,000 worth of property for the failure upon the strength of which this ejectment was recovered shocks the conscience and sense of justice of a chancellor. But, after all, are the damages resulting from the nonfulfillment of those conditions incapable of measurement? It is urged by the defendant and it is conceded that the $1,199 paid was not the full consideration (though the use of odd dollars indicates that there was some price by the acre) and that the landowners expected to derive a substantial benefit from the construction of the road and the establishment of a passenger station on their lands, and (although not expressed in the deed) from the operation of the railroad as a passenger carrier and the stopping of the trains at that station. Now the question is, how much of the actual value of the land conveyed and the incidental damages to the remaining land was abated or allowed to the railroad company in fixing the price for the land conveyed? Now that is the sort of question which is constantly being dealt with and determined according to a familiar rule, and that rule is the comparative value of the land with and without the advantages of the railway station and passenger trains stopping thereat. That I understand to be in the way the question would be put to a jury. It would be so put to the jury for the purpose of ascertaining the incidental damages to the adjoining lands due to the devotion of the same to railroad purposes. The jury would be directed to ascertain how much less the adjoining lands were worth in the market by reason of the construction and operation of the railroad; and that without regard to the general benefits of all the land in the neighborhood to be derived from such construction and operation.

Now let us inquire what has been awarded to the defendant herein. He has been awarded the full value of the land originally bought and paid for, as it was at the commencement of the condemnation proceedings, precisely as if no railroad structure had ever been placed upon it, and he has been awarded $3,600 as incidental damages to his adjoining land. Now the presumption is that the jury awarded those damages on the basis which I have stated, namely, as the amount which the other lands of the defendant will be depreciated in market value by the existence of the railroad and its operation. Here, then, it seems to me, we have ascertained by the jury the precise damages which the defendant has or can ever sustain by the failure of the complainant to fulfill its contract. For it must be remembered that it was within the power of the complainant, in the first place, to have acquired these lands by condemnation proceedings, on precisely the same basis as it has now acquired them, and it is not to be presumed that the amount abated from the value of the land and damages at the date of the original purchase was more than the amount which would have been awarded in ordinary condemnation proceedings. Now the defendant will get back all of that, and I have not the least doubt that he will get a great deal more, and I find it impossible to conceive that his land would have been increased in value by the fulfillment of those conditions in the deed by anything like the amount so awarded him. Shortly stated, I think it is impossible to suppose that the damages suffered by the nonfulfillment of the conditions in the deed are greater than the whole value of the land so taken, with the incidental damages to the adjoining land.

But this discussion is academic. In the shape which the case has taken the only forfeiture from which the complainant is asking relief is the value of the superstructure and work put upon the land in question, and that has been ascertained by the jury and is represented by the difference in the amount of the two awards, namely $13,212.50 and $2,716.50. It will be observed that no damages to adjoining property were included in the greater verdict. This was explained by counsel for defendant at the argument by his statement that at the trial before the jury he had explicitly waived any damages to adjoining property on the appraisement of the premises in question with the additions. But, says the defendant, the petitioner is not entitled to any relief at the hands of this court, because it deliberately broke its covenant, and therein the case differs from those where, by reason of some equitable circumstance, such as oversight of its duty or pecuniary or physical inability or other exculpatory circumstances, a party has failed in that regard. Against that it is to be observed that there is no proof in this case that the complainant ever had its attention called by the defendant to the existence of this covenant, prior to the commencement of the ejection, or was requested, and refused, to build the station and complete the double track across the lot. One can imagine that the complainant and its officers had entirely overlooked these conditions found in its deed, and forgotten, if they ever knew, of their existence. But, taking the case as it stands, it is fair to presume that the complainant's officers, knowing that the road was built as a freight road, and not a passenger carrier, and that its assumption of that function would, under the circumstances, be of no appreciable benefit to the defendant, and knowing that it had the right by law to take condemnation proceedings to reacquire the land in case the forfeiture was enforced against it, and relying upon the just and equitable rule for ascertaining the value and damages on such proceedings, deliberately concluded not to fulfill those conditions. I am unable to see how that conclusion, and subsequent action founded thereon, deprives it of its standing in this court, since, for reasons previously stated, I am unable to perceive how the establishment of a passenger station and the building of a double track would benefit the defendant's land in any appreciable degree.

The case of Bracebridge v. Buckely in the Exchequer Chamber, reported in 2 Price, 200, cited by defendant, was decided by a divided court, and does not sustain the position claimed by the defendant that relief in these cases is never granted where the forfeiture results from complainant's neglect or willful act, or otherwise than from fraud, accident, surprise, or mistake. It was put distinctly on the ground of the inability of the court to ascertain the damages, and it did not appear that the forfeiture was of any serious injury to the complainant, and the real ground was the peculiar relation between landlord and tenant. Chancellor Kent, in Livingston v. Tompkins, 4 Johns. Ch. 433, 8 Am. Dec. 598, in a casual remark relied upon by the defendant, gives an unwarranted force to that case. In fact, the case is cited, among others, by Prof. Pomeroy as authority for the position that the court will relieve where the damages can be ascertained. The canon as claimed by the defendant would exclude relief where there was a failure through inability to pay a sum of money. On the contrary, the authorities show, as before remarked, that the failure without excuse to perform the conditions subsequent does not necessarily affect the defaulter's right to relief.

I have examined the cases collected in the notes to Peachy v. Duke of Somerset, 2 Leading Cases in Equity, in which the English courts have held that the injury resulting from a breach of conditions subsequent were not measurable in damages, and have found them to be mainly conditions in leases that the tenant should not assign the lease, or should keep the premises insured and in repair. With regard to the provision for keeping the premises in repair, it was at first held that the damages to result therefrom could be measured, and relief would be granted the tenant upon the terms of making the repairs, but later on this view was overruled. All these instances are those of the failure to observe a line of continuing policy affecting the relation of landlord and tenant. Take the case of failure to insure. It meant simply that the landlord was unwilling to have a tenant of such business habits as that the buildings should not be protected by insurance. For it must be remembered that, though the landlord might protect himself by insurance on the payment of premiums, yet that required care and watchfulness on his part, and a certain condition and use of the premises in order to enable him to insure on any terms. So with regard to the covenant not to assign without the consent of the landlord. The latter had the right to stipulate against occupying the relation of landlord and tenant with any person not agreeable to himself. The same consideration applies to the case of allowing the premises to fall into a state of disrepair, or committing actual waste. The landlord had a right to stipulate that he declined to have such a tenant. No one can read the cases on this subject in the English courts in which a breach of conditions subsequent have been held unrelievable in equity, and which are confined almost exclusively to cases of landlord and tenant, without feeling that the hard and fast rule finally adopted and enforced by the English courts of equity led to great hardships; so great, indeed, that I believe Parliament finally felt constrained to interfere. Be that as it may, those cases have no application here.

Somewhat on the same principle the Court of Errors and Appeals in this state held that failure to fulfill breaches of the conditions precedent in the contract under consideration in Grigg v. Landis, 21 N. J. Eq. 494, could not be relieved against on the ordinary principles of making compensation for damages resulting from their breach and unenforcement. The court found that Mr. Landis inserted these conditions in his contracts for sale for the purpose of enforcing the peculiar scheme which he had formed for building up a town, and that they must be performed as far as reasonable. But they relieved Mr. Grigg on the ground of the equities arising out of the acquiescence of Mr. Landis in the breaches. It would have been quite impossible in that case, as in the cases before referred to between landlord and tenant, to show that any damages whatever had been sustained by Mr. Landis by reason of the breaches or nonperformance of the conditions precedent in the contract to convey.

But it was argued by counsel for defendant in his written argument that the right to relief against a forfeiture was not set up in the bill, nor was it framed on any such theory. I am unable to yield to that argument. The bill as amended, which was done before any proceedings had taken place before the commissioners, must be treated as if the amendments had been incorporated in the bill when first filed, and the bill as amended clearly shows that the complainant was seeking to have the amount to be paid ascertained upon the basis, at the outside, of the actual value of the land without the improvements, and this necessarily included the notion that the improvements ought not to be forfeited. The defendant, therefore, had notice, not only by the bill as amended, but by the special order which was made directing two awards and two verdicts, of what was the precise question intended to be raised. Moreover, he was well aware of the line of decisions on this subject, found in the cases before cited in our own Reports, and he must have known that the whole title rested on a forfeiture, and the great effort of the complainant was to be relieved as far as possible from that forfeiture. It seems to me, therefore, that it was entirely competent for either side to have adduced evidence, at the hearing of any peculiar circumstances existing outside of the record which affected the question thus raised. The complainant should have shown any excuse which it had for its failure to fulfill the covenants, but contented itself with alleging the fact, which was admitted by the answer, that the railroad was never intended for, and never was in fact used as, a passenger road, and upon the absence of any proof or contention on the part of the defendant that his predecessors in title had ever requested complainant to specifically perform those covenants. The defendant was at liberty to prove any facts or circumstances tending to show that it was not inequitable or unjust for him to insist upon the forfeiture provided for in the deed to the extent of obtaining compensation under the condemnation proceedings for additions and improvements put upon the property by the complainant while in lawful and undisturbed possession under the conveyance of his predecessors in title.

It is further urged that it is impossible to apply the principles upon which the Booraem decision was based in the present case, because the rule laid in that and kindred cases for the appraisal of damages was the value of the land at the time of the original entry, with interest from the date of taking possession. But this is a mere rule for the ascertainment of value and damages, and not a part of the rule itself. The essence of the rule is that the owner shall not have pay for the improvements put upon the premises by the railroad company before the condemnation proceedings were taken. It does not include any particular rule for the admeasurement of the damages which the railroad company should pay. That rule must depend upon the particular circumstances of the case; and I interpret the language of the learned judge in speaking of it as so implying. Its applicability to the cases where it has in practice been applied is manifest; but I thought, at the time the motion was before me to direct a special award and verdict, that it did not apply here, and I still think so. In fact, I doubt whether it is ever applicable where there has been a change in title and circumstances.

Mr. Hume, prior to the partition proceedings, never thought it worth while to enforce the forfeiture, but was content to have the right of re-entry sold by the master in partition for the insignificant sum of $687. And the predecessors in title of the defendant never saw fit to enforce it. It was treated as a mere right of re-entry. The defendant purchased in October, 1899, and in less than three months thereafter commenced this suit in ejectment and recovered. Now manifestly it would be unjust to go back and ascertain the value of the land and incidental damages at the date of the conveyance to the complainant, and give interest thereon to this date to the defendant. His title arises out of the forfeiture and commenced in 1899. I thought, when the bill was first presented to me, that it was equitable and just that the complainant should pay such a sum as would represent the value of the premises at that time, as if they had never been used for railroad purposes, with incidental damages to the adjoining land of the owner. When the order directing what I will call the double award and verdict was advised, counsel for the defendant was heard, and he did not object to that mode of determining the damages, if the value of the improvements and additions were not to be included. Upon the whole, then, I think that he ought not to object to that mode.

Upon the question whether the complainant must pay the incidental damages as well as the value of the strip, I feel constrained to hold against it. I will therefore advise a decree upon that basis, its terms to be settled on motion. With regard to costs, I think the complainant is entitled to costs. Its position and conduct in this court has been in accordance with its principles, and it has substantially succeeded. It is true that in its supplemental bill it asked this court to ignore the findings of the jury and ascertain the amount to be paid in its own way, but no proceedings were had under that prayer, and the defendant incurred no expense by reason of its insertion in the bill. Complainant is also entitled to a counsel fee.

I cannot take leave of this subject without saying that my study of it has led me to doubt the propriety of my imposing upon the complainant, as a term of granting it interim relief by injunction, the taking of condemnation proceedings, and to incline me to the opinion that this court ought, in this case, to have undertaken the ascertainment of the damages incurred by the defendant by reason of the failure to perform the covenants in the deed by its own methods.

VULCAN DETINNING CO. v. AMERICAN CAN CO. et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 13, 1906.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—TRADE SECRETS.

The employment of persons by a company using a secret process for separating tin from scrap, with their knowledge that the company was trying to keep the secret, was sufficient to raise an implied agreement on their part not to divulge it.

2. CORPORATIONS — NOTICE TO AGENT — EFFECT.

A corporation is charged with knowledge of its agent employed to purchase a secret process for detinning that the company from which the purchase is made obtained the secret by fraudulent methods from the true owner.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 12, Cent. Dig. Corporations, § 1748.]

3. SAME—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show that a corporate agent employed to purchase a secret process for detinning knew that the company who sold it had obtained it by fraudulent means from the true owner.

4. INJUNCTION — DEFENSES — CONDUCT OF PARTY SEEKING RELIEF.

The complainant company, which obtained a secret process for detinning by purchase from another company, with knowledge that the latter had procured it fraudulently, is not entitled to restrain its use by another company which obtained the secret from the complainant by fraudulent means.

5. TRUSTS—CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS.

Where employes fraudulently used for their own benefit a secret process for detinning obtained from their employer, who had purchased it from a company which was known to have procured it fraudulently from the original owner, and the employes subsequently obtained a license from the original owners to use the process, they did not hold the license in trust for their employer, in view of the unconscientious conduct of the latter.

Bill by the Vulcan Detinning Company against the American Can Company and others to enjoin defendants from operating detinning plants or utilizing or operating factories in imitation of those of the complainant, or operating or utilizing certain secret process. Bill of complaint dismissed.

See 58 Atl. 290.

McCarter, Williamson & McCarter and Henry Wollman, for complainant. Lindabury, Depue & Faulks, for defendants.

BERGEN, V. C. The evidence in this cause shows that the firm of "Th. Goldschmidt," of Essen, Germany, had prior to 1894, as the result of experiments pursued for that purpose, so perfected a process by which well-known chemical and mechanical principles could be so applied in the separation and recovery of different metals as to render the detinning of tin scrap profitable to a degree not theretofore attained. The successful combination was not patented, but its inventors sought to protect themselves against infringement by keeping their discovery a secret; only imparting it to such of their employes as the carrying on of the business required, and then only upon a promise not to divulge. Dr. Hans Goldschmidt, the member of the firm most active in making the experiments and obtaining the results, testified in detail regarding the agents used, viz., electricity, steam, lime, and caustic soda, and the required relative power and quantity of each, and also described with great particularity the size, character, and relative positions of the machinery and other necessary mechanical instruments used in their detinning plant.

In order to understand precisely what these inventors claimed was the secret process which they had discovered, we cannot do better than reproduce a portion of the cross-examination on this point, which is as follows: "Q. You say that you invented this process that you have described? A. Yes, sir; I did. Q. Wasn't electrolysis well known before the time you claim you invented this process? A. If you mean by electrolysis, electrolytical processes, I answer that there were known a good many electrolytical processes for recovering metals of different kinds. Q. You mean by that the separation of metals by electric current? A. The principles were known, and some of them applied in practice. Q. And this was true of tin, was it not? A. No. Q. So that your answer is that tin had never been removed from iron by electricity? A. That is not my answer. It has been removed before, but on a smaller scale. Q. Regeneration of lye was known before the time last spoken of, was it not? A. What kind of regeneration of lye do you mean? Q. Application of carbonic acid and caustification by lime. A. The principle was known. Q. What, then, was novel in your process of invention? A. There were a good many things new, which I partly described this morning. The main things are the size of the baskets, the size of the tubs, and the distances, especially worked out, of the baskets from the walls of the tubs, then the especial kind of inflow pipes as described, and the overflow, the electric combination of the tubs as described—last, not least, the whole arrangement of the plant, which was set up in a manner that the handling of the bulky material was saved as much as possible. Also, the making of the bundles by the steam hammer was new. All those details, of course, were never published, but were kept secret."

It also appears by a great preponderance of evidence that while, prior to the discovery by Goldschmidt, a number of persons were engaged in detinning scrap, and in so doing used the same agents employed by Dr. Goldschmidt, the business was not especially profitable, but when the processes which Dr. Goldschmidt claims to have discovered were applied to the detinning of scrap a very profitable result followed, leading to the building up of a successful business under their management at Essen. The growth of the business at Essen required the purchase of large quantities of tin scrap, some of which was bought in England and some in New York; the purchases in the latter city being made largely, if not entirely, from A. Kern & Co., a firm engaged in importing and exporting goods. The scrap from England appears to have been shipped, prior to 1895, through the Zealand Steamship Company, in the employment of which company were M. Laernoës, R. J. Brakema, and H. L. Herman, who, through their connection with the Zealand Company, it is fair to presume, acquired some knowledge of the character and extent of the Essen business, for about this time they built a detinning plant at Vlissingen, Holland, under the name of the "Electro-Tinfabriek," and through newspaper advertisements, followed by personal interviews, induced two of the confidential employes of the Essen factory, namely, William Zeyen, who had been employed by Goldschmidt from August, 1891, as foreman of the electrolysis room, and had become familiar with the Essen process of detinning, and William Foerster, who had been employed in the same factory from 1892, and worked in the cooking room, the place where the brine was prepared and regenerated, to leave their employment in Essen, and enter the service of the Holland company. Both of these employes had agreed with the Goldschmidt firm that they would refrain from communicating the processes in use, which were claimed to be secrets. I have no hesitation in finding that the processes used by Laernoës and his confederates in the Holland factory were, for all practical purposes, the same as those used by the Goldschmidts in their Essen factory, and that it was the intention, deliberately formed and boldly carried out by Laernoës and his partners, to obtain, by stealth and fraud, the secret processes and methods in use in the Goldschmidt factory, and that this theft was accomplished by debauching and corrupting the trusted servants of the Goldschmidts. It can serve no useful purpose to here recite the evidence which justifies this conclusion. It is sufficient to say that there is no denial of the facts offered in display of the iniquity of Laernoës and his partners. Considerable evidence has been taken in this cause in Germany, under a commission issued for that purpose; but Mr. Laernoës was not called as a witness to explain the many damaging circumstances proven. Mr. William Zeyen is in New Jersey, in the employ of the complainants in this cause, and the neglect to produce him, unexplained, justifies the conclusion that he could not deny his wrongdoing. Mr. Foerster was called, and exposed the disreputable methods employed by Laernoës to obtain the secret.

The possibility of erecting a detinning plant in this country attracted the attention of Mr. Adolph Kern, the senior member of the firm of A. Kern & Co., as early as 1892, at which time he opened negotiations with the Messrs. Goldschmidt, looking to the establishment of such a plant in America, to be operated according to the processes in use in Essen. The negotiations, carried on principally by correspondence until 1897, produced no satisfactory result, and in December of that year a party of gentlemen, seven in number, of whom the defendant Assmann was one, met with Mr. Kern at an office in New York City to consider the desirability of making further efforts towards the founding of a detinning factory in the United States. At that time subscriptions to the amount of $42,000 towards the organization of a company for that purpose had been secured, and the gentlemen taking part in the conference determined that sufficient progress had been made to warrant the sending of Mr. Kern to Europe for the purpose of obtaining one of the secret processes in use there. In furtherance of this conclusion Mr. Kern first visited the Holland factory, and then went to Essen, where he saw the Messrs. Goldschmidt, and tried to induce them to join the enterprise, but they refused, giving as a reason that in their opinion the cost of wages and materials in the United States would prevent the successful application of the process in that country. From Essen Mr. Kern returned to Holland, and entered into negotiations with Laernoës, who acted for the Electro-Tinfabriek of Vlissingen, which resulted in an optional contract, by the terms of which, in consideration of one-third of the capital stock of a company to be organized for the carrying on of the detinning business in the United States, the Holland company were to furnish the processes according to which they were detinning scrap, together with all necessary plans and instructions to properly install a plant, and also to send over to this country two men qualified to give instructions, and to superintend the erection of the factory. On his return to this country Mr. Kern submitted to his associates the result of the negotiations he had made in their behalf, and he was directed to accept the option and to procure a formal contract based on its terms. This was done, and Laernoës, with Zeyen, came to this country to supervise the erection of the factory and instruct the purchasers how to operate it. On the arrival of Laernoës, the formal contract was prepared and executed between the Electro-Tinfabriek and A. Kern & Co.; Laernoës acting and signing as the representative of the Holland firm. Thereupon a company was formed under the name of the "Vulcan Metal Refining Company," to which company A. Kern & Co. assigned the contract which they had made on behalf of their associates with the Holland company. The method of construction and operation as carried on in Holland was thereupon committed to writing by Laernoës and delivered to the company, and upon the suggestion of Mr. Assmann four copies were made of the original formula; one being handed to each of four trustees appointed by the board of directors to hold in trust for the company—the reason given by Mr. Assmann being, as stated by Mr. Kern, "that, as we have a valuable secret process, it ought to be preserved, so as to guard against the loss of it by the death of any one of the parties conversant with it." The original and all of the copies, except the one held by Mr. Assmann, as trustee, have been destroyed. The reason for the destruction was not made to appear; and when Mr. Assmann dissolved his connection with the company the copy which he had was delivered to Mr. Kern. A factory was erected during the year 1898 at Seawarren, N. J., and in 1899 another company was organized by the same parties under the title of the "Vulcan Western Company," and this company, supplied with the same formula, erected a similar plant at Streator, Ill. Subsequent to this the two companies were merged into the complainant company. In 1901 Mr. Assmann, having then become a director and officer of the American Can Company, resigned his position with the Vulcan Company, and sold his stock to Mr. Kern, giving as a reason for dissolving his connection with the Vulcan Company that as the American Can Company was a large seller of tin scrap to the Vulcan Company, of the selling of which he had charge, he could not consistently continue to occupy the position of buyer and seller. Shortly after Mr. Assmann dissolved his relations with the Vulcan Company the American Can Company began the erection of two detinning plants, one at Paulsboro, N. J., and the other at Joliet, Ill., and employed the defendants Schmaal, Baumann, and Egbert; Schmaal having until very recently been, and Baumann and Egbert then being, employed by the complainant company in positions of trust, such as necessarily required the imparting to them of the alleged secret processes used by the complainant company. Considerable testimony was directed to supporting and denying the allegation that these defendants were employed under an express contract not to reveal the secret processes in use. I am, however, satisfied, even in the absence of an express agreement, that the confidential relation existing between these defendants and the complainant company, and the effort made by it, to the knowledge of these defendants, to keep secret the methods employed, is sufficient to raise an implied agreement on their part not to divulge any such secret.

No reasonable doubt can exist under the evidence in this cause that the methods and processes in use by the defendants, the complainant, Laernoës and his partners, under the name of the Electro-Tinfabriek, and by the Messrs. Goldschmidt, at Essen, are for all practical purposes identical; the changes in mechanical construction being so small and unimportant as to hardly merit consideration. The bill of complaint prays that the American Can Company and the defendants Assmann, Baumann, Schmaal, and Egbert, may be enjoined from operating the detinning plants at Paulsboro and Joliet, or constructing or operating any other factories in imitation of those of the complainant, or for the purpose of utilizing or operating under said secret process, or any improvements thereon, and that the three defendants last named be enjoined from performing any further services in the detinning plants of the can company, and that the employés of Assmann and the can company be enjoined from using or communicating any knowledge they may have of the secret process or of the construction or operation of complainant's plant, and that they be required to surrender and destroy all copies of such secret process and of all drawings and designs that might aid any other in the construction of similar plants.

The defendants, among other things, seek to justify their action upon the ground that the process was not a secret one. It certainly appears that a number of persons, particularly in Germany, were engaged in detinning by a process in some particulars not unlike that in use at Essen by the Messrs. Goldschmidt, yet it is equally clear that until the Goldschmidts had perfected their plant the detinning business cannot be said to have been successful, and I am inclined to the belief that the Goldschmidts did discover a method or process for detinning scrap which was not known to their competitors, and that, so far as they are concerned, their secret could not be said to have been divulged by them, and, if it escaped, it was through the gross betrayal of a confidence reposed in a trusted employé. While it thus appears that when Mr. Kern was dealing, on behalf of his associates, with Laernoës and his partners, for a sale of the information which they possessed, and which they had surreptitiously obtained from the Essen factory, the methods and processes then employed were not so well known as to have become the property of the world, it is manifest from this evidence that from the year 1900 down to and including the year 1902 numerous publications appeared in scientific journals describing with some particularity these or similar processes. A notable article on this subject by Dr. Hans Mennicke was published in May and June in the "Zeitschrift für Electrochemie." A reading of this article in comparison with the formula furnished by Laernoës justifies the testimony of Mr. Leitch that it describes the process employed at Paulsboro and Joliet. So, if this case was devoid of what the complainant insists is a trust relation between the parties, I should have no hesitation in declaring that the process is no longer such a secret as to justify the interference of this court in preserving it to the complainant. What the complainant insists upon is that Mr. Assmann, as one of the original associates, occupies a relation of trust and confidence towards those who, in conjunction with him, purchased this secret, and who, relying upon his agreement to preserve the secret, became stockholders of the complainant company, and invested their money, and he ought now to be estopped from declaring that the process is no longer a secret, without regard to whether or not Laernoës and his partners had a title which they could properly convey. This contention they claim is supported by the following expression to be found in the opinion of Vice Chancellor Reed, overruling a demurrer interposed to the bill of complaint in this cause: "Now, the title to this trade secret held by the Vulcan Company was, I think, good against every one but Dr. Goldschmidt and his assignee. A person who became bound to the Vulcan Company by contract or by confidence cannot, as against that company, when suing for a breach of such contract or confidence, set up that the Vulcan Company had no right to such trade secret, because it had been obtained honestly from owners who had dishonestly obtained the knowledge from the discoverer." Vulcan Detinning Company v. American Can Company (N. J. Ch.) 58 Atl. 290-293. While the proposition thus stated by Vice Chancellor Reed appeals with great force to a court of equity, and is one which I would be bound to follow if the conditions which he states were present, viz., that "It had been obtained honestly," it has no application here, because in my judgment the secret was not honestly obtained by Mr. Kern for his associates, because he had sufficient knowledge of the dishonest manner in which the Holland people obtained the secret from the rightful owner to charge him with notice of all such facts as a proper inquiry would have disclosed, and that knowledge will be imputed to his associates and the officers of the company for whom he was acting in the business to which it related.

A corporation is liable for the fraud of its agents acting within their authority and in due course of its business, and cannot shield itself from responsibility by showing that the agent also failed in his duty to the corporation. Bank v. Christopher, 40 N. J. Law, 435-439, 29 Am. Rep. 262. "The fact that the information had not been acquired by him in the course of his agency does not militate against the application of the rule in question, when the agent personally participates in the later transaction in behalf of the corporation. Where information is casually obtained by an agent for a corporation, the corporation is not charged with notice from the mere fact of its agent's knowledge; but, if the corporation act through such agent in a matter where the information possessed by him is pertinent, the knowledge of the agent will be imputed to the principal. To bring about this result two things must concur, viz., the possession by the agent of pertinent information, and his personal participation in respect thereto on behalf of his corporation." Willard v. Denise, 50 N. J. Eq. 482, 26 Atl. 29, 35 Am. St. Rep. 788.

Mr. Kern admitted that before he had any dealings with Laernoës, and on the 16th day of May, 1896, he learned from Dr. Goldschmidt by correspondence that Laernoës, representing the Holland concern, had obtained his secret processes through Mr. Zeyen, one of his servants, and that Zeyen had been arrested and punished in a German court for taking from the Essen factory, for the purpose of conveying it to Laernoës, a sample part of a metal basket used in the Essen factory, and that one of these letters from Goldschmidt, if not two, contained copies, taken from German newspapers, of articles describing the alleged offense. A part of the article, which Mr. Kern had, reads as follows: "During the duration of the shipping contract by which the Zealand Co. acted as agents for Th. Goldschmidt, the officers of this company advertised anonymously in the Essen papers for workmen on goods such as the Goldschmidt concern was making. After several workmen had applied, and had been engaged, although they remained for the time being in the employ of the Essen firm, Inspector Laernoës obtained from them an exact description of the process and drawings of the apparatus. Workman Zeyen, who is now accused, refused to furnish samples, as only a short time before another workman had been punished for a similar theft. After the necessary apparatus had been constructed in accordance with drawings obtained from the man Zeyen, employed by Laernoës, Zeyen took leave of absence under false pretenses, went to Vlissingen, and made the first experiments on a steamer belonging to the Zealand Co. The workman thereupon returned to Essen, and remained after his engagement, by order of the company, as it were, as a spy, with the firm in Essen. Later the Essen firm got wind of the competition, but without knowing that the Zealand Co. was back of it. The firm of Goldschmidt therefore turned to the Zealand Co., whom they considered as their friends and asked for information regarding the new firm, whereupon they were told that the Zealand Co. knew nothing of such a firm in that place; at the same time, the workmen engaged by Laernoës and his associates were speedily called away from Essen to Vlissingen. Later it was learned that the workmen had not only furnished information and plans, but also samples which were of the greatest importance in the carrying on of the work."

When Mr. Kern went to Holland for the purpose of obtaining the secret process, he had with him the letters and newspaper extracts which he had received from Dr. Goldschmidt, and the only steps which he took to verify or disprove these charges was to communicate them to Laernoës, who very naturally denied them. The following extracts from the cross-examination of Mr. Kern on this point are very suggestive: "Q. Did you make any inquiry as to whether or not the plant at Flushing differed in the smallest detail from the Essen plant? A. I did not. Q. Did you inquire as to whether or not the process used at Flushing differed in the smallest detail from the process used in the Essen plant? A. Mr. Laernoës told me that it was a different process. Q. Did you ask him how it differed? A. We did not go into details, because he refused to speak of it. He refused to go into details in regard to it. Q. Did you ask him how it was that he had enticed this man away from Dr. Goldschmidt; why he did that? A. I did not. Q. Did you ask him how it was that he had the man that he had employed from Essen bring samples from the works there? A. I did not. Q. Did you ask him whether they did or not? A. I did not; but he told me that they did not. Q. Did he tell you they did not? A. Yes; he told me that of his own accord. He gave me that information himself. Q. Did he explain, then, how it was that both of them were convicted of doing it? What did he say to you about that? A. He said that he was not convicted. Q. He said that personally to you, now, the paper told you that both of the men he employed were convicted and sent to prison? A. He explained it on the score of prejudice on the part of the court of Essen. Q. Did he deny that the men had brought samples from the Essen plant to him? A. He did. Q. Did you ask him about his keeping the man at the Essen plant as a spy after he had employed them to put up the Flushing plant? A. I did not. Q. Did he say anything to you about that? A. He did not. Q. You knew that the paper—the Steel and Iron paper—had charged that? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you ask him about his having advertised in Germany for men understanding this process? A. I did not. Q. Did you ask him whether or not, in fact, he obtained from these two men that he had employed from Essen a thorough and detailed description of the process and a drawing of the apparatus? A. I did not. Q. Did he make any statement on that subject to you? A. I do not think he did. He simply denied having stolen anything, and stated that the man whom he engaged knew very little about the process. Q. Did he state whether or not he availed himself of what that man did know about the process? A. He did not."

A careful reading of Mr. Kern's testimony discloses that he not only made no effort to obtain the whole truth from Laernoës, but admits that he made no attempt to find out from Dr. Goldschmidt, whom he afterwards saw, whether there was any truth in what Laernoës did deny, nor whether the story published was true or false. It is perfectly clear to me that, being unable to negotiate with Dr. Goldschmidt, he decided to obtain the information he was so anxious to get from Mr. Laernoës, although, if not already convinced that he was purchasing from Laernoës stolen property, he very carefully abstained from so using the information which he had as to ascertain the truth. When stripped of all refinements, the situation presented is this: Dr. Goldschmidt discovers a secret process for detinning; Laernoes entices Zeyen, a trusted employé, to betray his master, whereby he became possessed of a secret process belonging to another; that secret the complainant purchases, under conditions which charge it with knowledge of the wrong committed against Dr. Goldschmidt, thereby helping Laernoes and Zeyen to market their stolen property. It is not to be conceived that a court of equity will stain its hands by contact with such a disreputable proceeding.

It was most strenuously insisted on the argument by the complainant that its association with Laernoes in procuring this secret was a matter entirely distinct from the present controversy, and that the rule requiring a complainant to come into a court of equity with clean hands does not require that all his acts be pure, and that the uncleanness for which the rule may be invoked must have some relation to the other party. My conclusion is that the rule applies in this case. The foundation of the complainant's right rests upon the assignment to it by Laernoes of the right to use this secret, and if in ascertaining its title, for without title it would have no property to protect, it is made to appear that the title was acquired knowingly from one who could never equitably invoke the court's protection, good conscience requires that the court should abstain from interfering. It is not alone fraud or illegality which will prevent a suitor from entering a court of equity. Any really unconscientious conduct connected with the controversy to which he is a party will repel him from the forum whose very foundation is good conscience. Pom. Eq. Juris. § 404. In Edward Thompson Co. v. American Law Book Co., 122 Fed. 922, 59 C. C. A. 148, 62 L. R. A. 607, relief by way of injunction was refused upon the ground that the acts of the defendant of which the complainant complained were of the same character as those in which the complainant was itself indulging, and that, if the defendant was guilty of literary piracy, the complainant was guilty of the same offense, and that a literary pirate was not entitled to consideration in a court of equity; Judge Coxe saying: "Consistency requires that the defendant should not be punished for doing that which the complainant does with perfect impunity." In Krauss et al. v. Peebles' Sons Co. (C. C.) 58 Fed. 585, Judge Taft stated the rule as follows: "The reason why relief is refused complainant in such cases has nothing to do with the defendant's rights or wrongs. It is that the court will not protect a fraudulent business of a plaintiff, however much in the wrong the defendant may be." In cases of this class the jurisdiction of the court is rested upon its duty to protect property from wanton destruction, and it interferes by injunction because that is the only efficient method by which property of this character can be preserved to the owner. This complainant claims to be the true owner of a secret process, a recognized species of property, but, when the owner asks the aid of the court to restrain the defendant from injuring his property, it is essential that he should not be guilty of any wrongdoing in connection with the property he seeks to protect. He cannot represent to the court that he came honestly by the property when the contrary is the truth, and then successfully invoke the help of a court of equity, for he is guilty of a false representation regarding the very right which he desires protected. The complainant in this cause pirated a secret process belonging to the Goldschmidts. The defendants are, if we accept the complainant's contention, guilty of the same offense, one step removed; and as each is using the same secret process, the property of another, from whom, to the knowledge of each, it was dishonestly obtained, they are both in pari delicto. Leather Co. v. Amer. Leather Cloth Co., 4 De G. J. & S. 187; Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218, 2 Sup. Ct. 436, 27 L. Ed. 706.

The proposition advanced by the complainant, viz., that, the defendants having agreed with the complainant either as joint purchasers or employés to keep secret this process, they cannot now be heard to question the title of the complainant because of a trust relation, either express or constructive, thereby raised, would appeal with great force to a court of equity if, in the purchase of the secret process, the complainant had acted honestly, and was justified in the belief that the vendor's title was without fault. But the mainstay of this proposition is absent in the case at bar. The purchasers knew, or were bound to know, that in treating with Laernoes and his partners they were obtaining for use the property of another dishonestly procured, and for which they had unsuccessfully negotiated with the true owner. That they afterward disagreed as to which of them should appropriate what they had thus improperly secured does not make it the duty of a court of equity to interfere and by injunction protect some of the wrongdoers against the assaults of their confederates. The want of honor among thieves is not a ground of equitable jurisdiction.

Since the bill of complaint was filed in this cause the defendants have obtained from the Goldschmidts a license, executed in due form, permitting them to use their secret in the United States forever, and in Canada for 10 years following the date of such license, which was October 17, 1904. This assignment conveys to the American Can Company a title to this secret process from its discoverer, and is superior to any rights which the complainant has. The claim made by the complainant that this assignment of, or license to use, the secret process, although made to the American Can Company, must be taken to have been made to that corporation in trust for the complainant, does not, under the facts disclosed in this case, meet my approval, nor has it the sanction of judicial authority. The trust, if any, which existed between these parties, was based upon their agreement to keep secret a process purchased in bad faith from Laernoos, and it needs no argument to sustain the proposition that the parties to such a trust have no standing in equity.

After a careful examination of the whole case, I am satisfied that the complainant has failed to present a cause calling for equitable aid, and a decree will be advised, dismissing the bill of complaint, with costs.

STEVENS v. HEADLEY et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. June 24, 1905.)

1. EASEMENTS—PRIVATE WAYS—PURCHASERS WITH NOTICE.

In a suit to quiet title to certain land as against an alleged highway easement, evidence held to require a finding that defendant L.'s grantor and attorney, before purchasing his part of the land, had knowledge that plaintiff had bargained for another part of the whole tract, which included a part of the road in question, and was thereby put on inquiry as to the precise extent of complainant's purchase.

2. SAME—PRIVATE RIGHTS—APPURTENANCES.

Where no map of certain lots in a city addition had ever been filed in any public office, and part of a road on one side of the plat in dispute had never been worked, accepted, or used by the public, the right of the owner of a lot abutting on such alleged road, which ended in a cul-de-sac, to have the same kept open, was at most a mere private right of way appurtenant to the lots conveyed to him.

3. SAME—PRIVATE WAYS—CREATION.

Easements of private way are not the subject of possession, but lie in grant, and hence can only be created by express or implied grant, by adverse user, or by estoppel.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Easements, §§ 13-62.]

4. COVENANTS—PERSONAL COVENANTS.

Certain deeds of lots which abutted on a road ending in a cul-de-sac referred to the road "laid out across the whole tract," and contained covenants on which the grantors bound themselves and their heirs and assigns not to erect or permit to be erected on the property owned by them adjoining the property conveyed any house costing less than $5,000, or nearer than 40 feet from the street [road] line. Held, that such covenants were personal to the grantees, and did not extend to the benefit of subsequent purchasers.

5. SAME—HIGHWAYS.

A declaration, in deeds to certain lots abutting on a highway, laid out, but not open, that the same shall remain open and be used as a public road by all persons desiring to use the same, can operate only as a private covenant to the several grantees or as a dedication which can be only made available to third persons by acceptance by the public.

6. EASEMENTS—IMPLICATION FROM CONVEYANCE.

Where a deed to certain land abutting on an alleged private road contained a building restriction prohibiting the erection of buildings nearer than 40 feet to the northwesterly side line of such road, the deed did not by implication convey any right of way over that part of the road ending in a cul-de-sac, which was beyond the property conveyed toward the closed end of the road.

7. ESTOPPEL—TO WHOM AVAILABLE—CLOSING PRIVATE WAY.

Where a grantee of certain land abutting on a private way would not be injured by the closing of the way beyond his property and toward the end of the road in a cul-de-sac, he was not entitled to object that the owners thereof were estopped to close it.

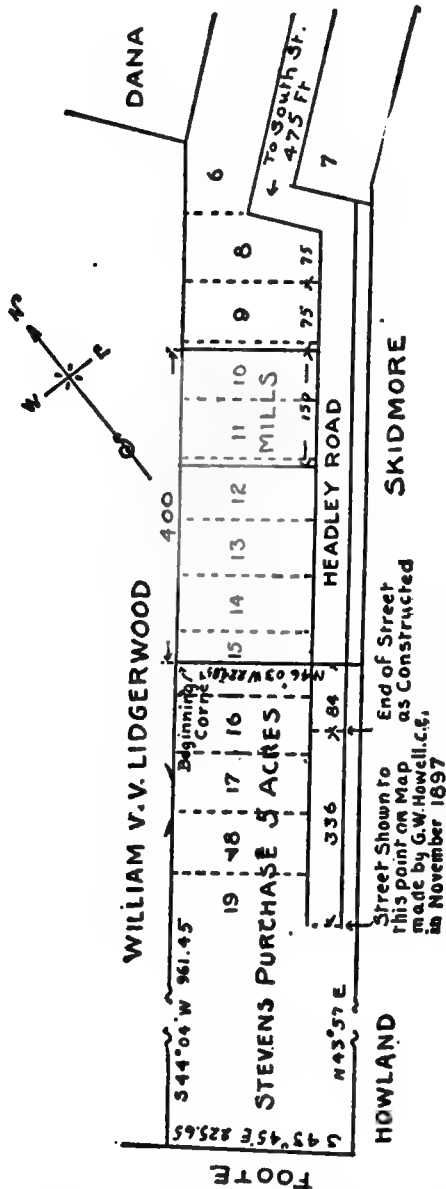

Suit by Frederic W. Stevens against William T. Headley and others. On final hearing. Judgment for complainant.

C. Franklin Wilson, for complainant. John M. Mills, for defendants Headley. Charlton A. Reed and Edward K. Mills, for defendant Wm. V. V. Lidgerwood.

PITNEY, V. C. (called on for his reasons for purposes of appeal, October, 1905). The complainant, Frederic W. Stevens, by his (amended) bill seeks to enforce the specific performance of a contract in writing for the conveyance of land, entered into by him with the defendants Wm. T. Headley and Helen T. Headley, dated April 6th and executed by the Headleys April 7, 1903. He makes the defendant Wm. V. V. Lidgerwood a party defendant, because, as owner of other land, he claims an easement over the lands covered by the contract, and complainant prays that that claim of easement may be dealt with by the court, and decreed not to exist. The easement claimed is a right of way over a portion of the land comprised in complainant's purchase. The defendants the Headleys answer the bill, admitting the complainant's equities and denying that defendant Lidgerwood has any easement in the land in question. They add to their answer a cross-bill against Lidgerwood, praying that the land in question may be decreed to be free of any easement such as is claimed by Lidgerwood. They make Mr. Edward K. Mills a party to their cross-bill because the title to Lidgerwood's land passed from them to him and from him to Lidgerwood. Mills and Lidgerwood answered the complainant's bill and Headley's cross-bill in one pleading, and without objection to the form of either. The case was brought regularly to hearing on these pleadings. At the hearing counsel for Lidgerwood took the preliminary objection to complainant's bill of multifariousness and misjoinder. I overruled this objection on two grounds: First, that it was not taken in time; and, second, that it was without merit.

The facts developed at the hearing are as follows: The Headleys acquired title to the land in question by descent from their father, J. Boyd Headley, and hold it subject to the right of dower of his widow, Helen T. Headley, the elder (not a defendant). The particular land in question is a part of a larger tract which may be, for the present purposes, described as a long, narrow strip of land, about 225 feet wide, with one end bounding on the southwesterly side of South street, one of the principal streets of Morristown. The annexed sketch shows as much of it as is necessary for present purposes:

It was formerly bounded on the northwesterly side for a few hundred feet on its South street end by the lands of the Female Seminary (owned by Miss Dana), and in the rear of the seminary lot it is bounded on that side by land of the defendant Lidgerwood. On the southwest end it is bounded by lands of Mr. Foote. On the southeast side by other parties. Its only connection with any highway is its junction with South street. In the year 1897 the Headleys caused about two-thirds of this strip next to South street to be laid out and plotted on a map into building sites; and, with a view of their sale, caused a road to be laid out on the map, from South street, along and near to the southeasterly side of the tract, but not touching the same, and ending at the bottom of a steep bluff on their own land. The reason for their stopping at this point with their scheme was that the remainder of the land, about 600 feet in length of the strip, was low and flat and unfit for building purposes, except perhaps of a very cheap class of dwellings. Over the part of the land here in question the lots were laid out about 167 feet in depth and 75 feet in front. At the time of the making of the contract here in question they had all been sold and built upon, from South street down the new street, except 10, at the extreme end. Of these, the three furthest southwest were, by reason of the configuration of the land, unavailable and unsalable as separate lots. Of those that had been sold and conveyed the one farthest from South street was owned, built upon, and occupied by Mrs. Romaine, whose husband, Wm. J. Romaine, was a real estate agent, and had the lots in his hands for sale on behalf of the Headleys, who lived in a suburb of Philadelphia. The Headleys had blue prints of their map made and circulated, for use in selling, but they had never filed it in any public office. This blue-print map did not include the whole tract, but only so much as covered the road and lots facing on it. As before remarked, the road (called "Headley Road") is laid out wholly on the lands of the Headleys. It kept some 14 feet away from the southeasterly side of the tract, and ended, so to speak, in the midst of it. The Headleys worked and graded on the ground about 1,400 feet in length of this road, stopping at the top of the bluff, from whence the land descended rather abruptly and irregularly to the low land before mentioned, leaving about 250 feet of the lower end of the paper road untouched and unaltered and covered with a thick growth of small trees and brush. No part of the road was ever accepted or worked by the municipal authorities, and it was never used by the public beyond the residence of Mrs. Romaine. Over that part of the road which is here called in question there was growing brush and small saplings. The Headleys, in making conveyance of lots, mentioned the Headley road, and inserted, in several instances, a limitation against building nearer than a certain number of feet from the side of the road. These allusions to the road will be referred to farther on. No mention was made of the map.

The complainant, in the latter part of the year 1902, opened negotiations with Mr. Romaine for the purchase of the southwest end of the whole tract, including about four and one-half of the most southwesterly of the lots laid out on the map, of which about 75 or 100 feet (defendant's surveyor says 84 feet) faced on the road as acutally worked on the ground. The negotiation included all of the road as laid out on the map within these lines. The quantity in the tract so negotiated for was five acres, and its northeasterly end was roughly marked on the ground by a stake set up, and in due course was surveyed and a description thereof made. The beginning point was 400 feet southwest from Mrs. Romaine's lot. This lot would give the complainant a large building site on comparatively high ground, with an outlet to South street over Headley road. As I interpret the evidence, the parties came to a substantial agreement on the 21st of January, 1903. This is fixed by a letter from Mr. Romaine to complainant of that date. But, owing to the necessity of measurements on the ground and other details, the agreement (set out in full in the bill) was not finally settled and executed until April 7th. Judge Vreeland, who was counsel for the Headleys, prepared an agreement in March and sent it to them, and it was by them recast and executed on that day, April 7th, and forwarded to Judge Vreeland. This sale left still belonging to the Headleys 400 feet of frontage on Headley road, or a little over 5 lots, 75 feet front each, between the complainant's lot and the Romaine lot. Hence the contract contained a restriction against the complainant building on his lot nearer than 25 feet to the northeasterly front of it and against the Headleys building on their remaining lots nearer than 40 feet to the Headley road. It also provided for a right of way from the lot to be conveyed to South street by the Headley road, which is described by metes and bounds. It also contained the following significant clause: "And the said Wm. T. Headley and Helen T. Headley, the younger, hereby further agree that they will procure the execution and delivery to them by all the owners abutting on what is known as the 'Headley Road' of a release of any and all right, title and interest of such abutting owners (if any) of, in and to any right of way or easement over the lot hereby agreed to be conveyed, or any part thereof." The Headleys anticipated and encountered little difficulty in procuring these releases, because the parties interested would at once infer, and could be assured, that the complainant purchased for the purpose of erecting a dwelling for himself, which would result in insuring the permanent character of the neighborhood, and in cutting off all danger of the low, flat land on the southwest end of the tract being devoted to the erection of cheap cottages for laborers, whose existence along the possible extension of the Headley road would, to say the least, not increase the desirability as residences of the high-class dwellings already erected on that road. Such a use of that low land was contemplated by the elder Mrs. Headley, and was an obstacle in the way of her joining in the conveyance to the complainant, and this was known to Mr. J. H. Lidgerwood, the brother and agent of the defendant W. V. V.

Lidgerwood, as early as February 27, 1903, as appears by his letter of that date to his brother, the defendant, who was a resident of London.

In the meantime, the defendant Lidgerwood, who, as we have seen, owns the land on the northwest side of the Headley tract, commencing in the rear of the seminary lot, instructed his brother, John H. Lidgerwood, a New York business man, residing in Morristown, to open negotiations for the purchase of the two lots (Nos. 10 and 11) next adjoining Mrs. Romaine's. His object in doing this, as declared in his testimony (taken by commission), and explained at the hearing by a map, was to obtain access from his land to South street by way of the Headley road. Besides, his land immediately adjoining those two lots is high, and would make a valuable addition to them, and the union of his land and the two lots would greatly increase the value of each, especially the high land of Lidgerwood, which is small in extent and area and so situate as to be of little value by itself. Mr. John H. Lidgerwood employed for this purpose the defendant Edward K. Mills, who opened negotiations at once with Mr. Romaine. Throughout their negotiations they used a blue-print copy of the original map, and also a vellum copy of it, produced by Mr. Mills, which showed a slight variation in the lines of the lots as laid on the original map, which had to be observed in locating the two lots for which Mr. Mills was negotiating. The only obstruction to an immediate sale to Lidgerwood was the price demanded by the Headleys, viz., $9,000, for the two lots. Mr. Mills offered $6,000. He negotiated entirely in his own name. The first interview between Mr. Mills and Mr. Romaine, the date of which is recollected by Mills, was on the 21st of February, 1903. On that occasion Mills swears he first heard of the Stevens purchase verbally concluded a month before. He then, as he says, heard from Romaine that Judge Stevens was negotiating for a lot of five acres at the lower end of the property at a price of $5,000. And on his (Mills) hinting that he thought the price was low Romaine answered, "Yes; but we think it will be a good thing; it will establish the property," and added that he was afraid the sale would not go through, because the elder Mrs. Headley would not consent to such a low price, because she thought she could get more money by selling off lots to different purchasers, rather than the whole thing in a lump. Here we have the exact amount of land purchased by complainant stated by Romaine, and we also have the origin of that part of the letter from John H. to the defendant Lidgerwood, dated February 27, 1903, in which he says, "Old Mrs. Headley refuses to sign. She has a dower right. She refused to sign Vice Chancellor Stevens purchase which was the last lot on the road, $8,000, and the swamp lots, because the swamp lots were not plotted in city lots and sold for $500 each." And, again, on March 3d he wrote to his brother: "All waiting now on Mrs. Headley, Sr. She refuses to make title to Chancellor Stevens who has bought 120 foot lots and some swamp, $8,000." The mention in this letter that Stevens purchase included "120 foot lots," which must have meant front on the road, is significant when we consider that Mr. Lidgerwood and Mr. Mills, from whom he got his information, probably had in mind the frontage on the road as worked on the ground which we have seen did not extend by 250 feet to the end of the road as laid out on the map. Indeed, the defendant Lidgerwood's surveyor, by a recent measurement, makes the complainant's frontage on the street as worked on the ground to be only 84 feet. I am unable to perceive how this idea of 120 foot lots could have been obtained by Mills, unless he either went on the ground and made a measurement and personal inspection or that Romaine pointed out to him on the map the place to which the complainant's land would extend, and this was easily done by showing on the map where complainant's land would commence, namely, as stated in the agreement, "400 feet southwest of Mrs. Romaine's lot."

The inference which I draw from the whole evidence, up to this time, February 21, 1903, including that of Mr. Mills, is that on that day Mills was informed by Romaine of the verbal agreement of purchase he had a month previously concluded between the Headleys and complainant, and that the only obstacle to its complete execution was the objection of the widow to join in the deed, and that Mr. Mills was then informed with approximate accuracy of the extent on the ground of the complainant's purchase. The parties (Romaine and Mills) proceeded with their negotiations, being divided only as to price. On or before the 20th of March Mills procured from Romaine a verbal option on his proposed purchase at $9,000. On that day (so his diary shows) he examined the records for conveyances and for building restrictions and the like, and there found the restrictions and references to Headley road previously mentioned; and at once told Mr. J. H. Lidgerwood that, if he took title to the lots, he must come under a restriction not to put a building on the lots nearer than 40 feet to Headley road. Nothing was at any time said between Mills and Romaine on the subject of restrictions, or rights of way, or the like. They finally, on the 4th of April, agreed on $8,500, and proceeded together to the office of Judge Vreeland, who was counsel for the Headleys, to arrange for the carrying out of their contract. It must be borne in mind here that Judge Vreeland had recently drafted and forwarded to the Headleys for approval and execution the contract between the Headleys and the complainant.

The result of the conference was that it was concluded that there was no occasion for a written contract, but that he (Vreeland) would prepare and forward promptly to the Headleys the deed for execution. It is plain from the contemporaneous letters from John H. Lidgerwood to his brother, the defendant, that he was in doubt whether the elder Mrs. Headley would unite in their deed. On that date, April 4th, Mills prepared a receipt, to be signed by Miss Headley, as follows: "April 4, 1903. Received from Edward K. Mills, a certified check for five hundred dollars being part payment of the purchase price of eight thousand five hundred dollars for lots 10 and 11 of the Headley tract (being 150 feet on Headley road next to W. J. Romaine's lot) which the said Edward K. Mills has agreed to purchase at the price above named ($8,500) and Helen T. Headley to sell. [Signed] Helen T. Headley, Jr." I can only infer from the omission of the name Wm. T. Headley, as a vendor in this short contract, that Mr. Mills was in haste about getting a binding contract, and was unwilling to wait to get the signature of Wm. T. Headley, whose business appears to have called him away from home at times. Be that as it may, the check and receipt were forwarded to Miss Headley and returned promptly, duly signed by her, and the check was indorsed by her and her brother, Wm. T. I recollect no evidence as to the exact date when this receipt was signed by Miss Headley. April 4th was Saturday. The complainant's contract is dated on Monday, the 6th, and was acknowledged by the two Headleys, brother and sister, in Philadelphia on the 7th, so that so far as the execution of a binding contract goes I conclude that the parties stand on an equal footing as to time.

Much testimony was given as to what occurred in the way of conversation in Judge Vreeland's office on the 4th of April, and it is somewhat conflicting. It is conceded that one or more copies of the blue-print map were on Judge Vreeland's table. Judge Vreeland and Mr. Romaine both testified that Romaine then and there pointed out on the map to Mr. Mills in a general way how far to the northeast the complainant's purchase extended. Mr. Mills is emphatic and positive in denying this testimony. Each of these witnesses is entitled to complete credit. Judge Vreeland and Mr. Mills are known to me personally to be so entitled to it. It is my duty to reconcile the evidence, if I can. I think the probability is that what was said and done in that respect made so little impression on Mr. Mills' mind that it has escaped his memory, and for the simple reason that he was not interested either personally or on account of his client Lidgerwood in the precise point or limit on the northeast of the complainant's purchase. The evidence of the defendant Lidgerwood, which was taken by commission, in connection with the letters written to him by his brother, show that what he had in mind mainly was access from his large tract of land to South street over the Headley road, and that he had little or no interest in the extension of that road upon the Headley land to the southwest of the two lots he was trying to purchase. I feel constrained then to hold that Mills, before he paid his money on April 4th, had direct notice and knowledge that complainant had bargained for a part of the whole tract which included a part of the road in question and approximately of its extent, and that he was thereby put upon inquiry as to the precise extent of that purchase, if it was of any consequence to his client, but I believe that the precise extent was pointed out to him on the map.

But it may be argued that the fact that defendant Lidgerwood, through his agent and counsel, is chargeable with notice that complainant's purchase included a portion of the southwest end of the road as laid out, and the lots facing thereon, did not necessarily indicate that he intended to close the southwest end of that road, even if he had a right to do so. Let us consider this suggestion. The width of the whole tract is about 225 feet. I believe the lines are not precisely parallel. This width was divided where these lots in question were laid out into 167 feet, more or less, for the depth of a lot, 45 feet, more or less, for the width of the street, and 14 feet for a strip of land between the road and the southeasterly side line. Now, it seems to me the question at once suggests itself, would the complainant contemplate or entertain the idea for a moment of building a dwelling on the comparatively small piece of high ground on the northeast end of a tract 225 feet wide and nearly 1,000 feet deep, with a public road in existence 45 feet wide passing near to his house and ending in his ground in the rear thereof? It seems to me that the question answers itself.

But to return to the subsequent events. Judge Vreeland shortly after April 4th prepared the two deeds for execution and sent them in one envelope to Philadelphia. I infer the dates were left blank. It was in that to complainant. The original deed to the defendant Mills was not produced. That is dated the 16th of April, and executed and acknowledged on that day by the elder Mrs. Headley and by the brother and sister Headleys, and the wife of the brother. It was promptly returned to Judge Vreeland. The deed to the complainant, with the date in a different handwriting, is dated the 29th of April, and was executed by Wm. T. Headley and wife on that date and returned to Judge Vreeland unexecuted by the other Headleys. Undoubtedly the brother and sister encountered difficulty in inducing their mother to sign it. She did finally unite with her daughter in executing it before Judge Vreeland in Morristown on the 15th of May. In the meantime, the deed to Mills had remained in Judge Vreeland's hands undelivered. The parties are not agreed as to the cause of delay in its delivery. Mr. Vreeland and Mr. Romaine and Wm. T. Headley understood that Mills was unwilling to accept his deed and pay for it until after Mrs. Headley had joined in executing the deed to the complainant. Mr. Headley is very emphatic on this subject. They seemed to have understood that Mills did not wish to carry out the contract unless the danger of the low lands being devoted to laborers' cottages was substantially removed by the sale to complainant. On the other hand, Mr. Mills understood that the delay was for the benefit and accommodation of the Headleys, in order to enable them to constrain their mother to join in the deed to complainant, and in this he is supported by letters written about that time by Mr. John H. Lidgerwood to his brother in London. I deem it of little importance to determine this question, since the fact was that the delivery of the deed to Mills was delayed until that to complainant was executed, and as soon as the complainant's deed was executed, to wit, on the 16th of May, Mr. Mills was notified of its execution, and immediately called on Judge Vreeland, paid the balance of his purchase money, took his deed and had it recorded, and promptly executed a deed from himself to Wm. V. V. Lidgerwood.

At the date of the delivery, so far as appears, nothing was said between Judge Vreeland and Mr. Mills as to this right of way; and this seems somewhat strange, because Judge Vreeland was well aware of the clause in complainant's contract requiring releases from each of the other property owners on the street, and those releases had been prepared by him or by one of his firm, and work was being done industriously in procuring the signatures of the various releasors, the accomplishment of which was delayed by reason of the absence out of the country of some of the parties. Judge Vreeland explains this apparent oversight on his part by saying that he supposed that it was all understood by Mr. Mills, as I am satisfied it was, and that no release from him was necessary, but, being reminded by complainant of the strict terms of the complainant's contract, he, within two or three days, prepared a release to be executed by Mr. Mills and asked him to execute it. This Mr. Mills expressed himself as being personally entirely willing to do, but that he had already conveyed the property to Mr. Lidgerwood, for whom he was acting as agent in the matter, and offered to forward a release to Mr. Lidgerwood to be executed by him. Such a release was prepared and either revised or redrawn by Mr. Mills and forwarded to Mr. Lidgerwood, who declined to sign it. Hence this suit. Upon this part of the case I am of the opinion that complainant's equity is superior to that of defendant.

Let us now inquire into the validity of the defendant's claim as evidenced by the various deeds, including that to Mills, upon which he relies. Since the proof is clear that no map of this property showing the road has ever been filed in any public place, and as that part of the road which is here in dispute or any part of it has never been used by the public or worked or accepted by it, it follows by the clear-settled rules of law that any right which the defendant Lidgerwood has in that part of the road here in question can be no more than that of a private right of way appurtenant to the lots conveyed to him. I deem it unnecessary to cite authorities to sustain this plain proposition. Now the familiar rule is that easements of a private way lie in grant, and are not the subject of possession; hence they must be created by a written grant or its equivalent. This may be by express grant, or by implication, as in the case of a way of necessity, or by long adverse user, which, for the sake of consistency, was always supposed to arise out of a lost grant, or a right of way may be created, so to speak, in equity, by an estoppel, as where a party so acts as to lead another to believe that a right of way does exist, and that party has so far acted upon it as to render it inequitable for the other to deny that the right of way exists.

One quality of a private right of way is that it must be from somewhere to somewhere. Thus, by the ancient rules of pleading in pleading a private right of way, the pleader should state the terminus a quo et ad quem of the way. Gale on Easements, p. 416. It must lead from some place to some place. Chief Baron Comyn (volume 3, p. 56, tit. "Chimn") says: "A private way is such as goes to a church, house, vill, or close and is not common for all the king's subjects. So it may be from a meadow or close to a street or to a highway. So it may be from one part of a close across the ground of another to another part of the same land (close). But a man cannot have a way from one part of the land of another to another part." And the same learned author (Comyn, Dig. vol. 1, p. 284, tit. "Proceeding in an Action for a Disturbance") says: "The declaration ought to show the certainty of the thing in which the disturbance is alleged, as in an action upon the case for stopping his way, it ought to allege the terminus ad quem the way goes, and likewise the terminus a quo, so if the plaintiff prescribe for a way to such a close he must show a title to the close, otherwise if the way claimed be to a high street, or to a common field." And he refers in support to the case of Parker v. Newsham, Latch's Rep. 160, the translation of which is as follows: "In an action on the case for stopping a way which the plaintiff had from a certain place across B acre where the nulsance was, to a certain field. That is good, without showing what interest he had in the field; because it shall be presumed it was a common field. Otherwise if it had been to such a close. There he must show what interest he had in the close." Comyn also cites Alban v. Brounsall, Yelverton's Rep. 163; s. c., 1 Brounwell, 215—which was an action of trespass and a plea of a right of way by prescription, and at page 164 we find this "the prescription is not good because it is not shown a quo loco ad quem locum the passage or way is."

It may be assumed that in these two cases the easement was based on either implied grant or long adverse user, especially is it probable in the case reported by Latch, which holds that the party must show some right or interest at each end of the way. It may be conceded that a right of way ending in private grounds may be created by express grant, where the grantee has no interest in those private grounds. But the necessity for a legal interest on the part of the person claiming the right in each end of the way as claimed, except where it is a public place or highway, is, as I understand the law, a necessary ingredient in the element of adverse user or mere implication in such cases. This principle was in substance acted upon, as to public rights of way, in the very recent case of the Attorney General v. Antrebus, L. R. Ch. Div. 1905, vol. 2, p. 188. There the Attorney General of England attempted to prevent the inclosure by the owner of the fee of the famous Stonehenge, on the ground that the public had enjoyed free access to it from time immemorial. But it was held that the public had no right in that great curiosity, and that the mere visiting of it for curiosity by numerous people, using, however, a definite route, must be presumed to have been with the permission of the owner. The court held that there was no such thing known to our law as a subject-matter of a grant or prescription as a jus spatlandi or manendi.

Let us see what language is found in any of the deeds executed by the Headleys. The first is Headley to Willis, dated October 30, 1897, and conveys land fronting on South street and abutting on one side "in the middle of a new road fifty feet in width." And then follows this clause: "It is understood and agreed [the Headleys and Mrs. Willis] that the fifty foot road referred to in the above description is to be and remain open as a road forever hereafter for the benefit of all parties interested." Next is a conveyance dated April 1, 1898, from the Headleys to Miss Dana. The lot thereby conveyed fronts on South street, and runs the depth of the Dana lot, and mentions a stake at an angle in the northwesterly line of the "new road laid out across the whole tract, called 'Headley Road,'" and further contains a clause as follows: "The said Headley road to remain open and to be used as a public road by all persons desiring to use the same." The next is a deed from the Headleys to Mary O. March, dated November 16, 1898. The description in that conveyance refers to a new street "known as 'Headley Road' laid out across the whole tract. * * * The Headleys especially covenant on behalf of themselves, and their heirs and assigns not to erect or permit to be erected on the property now owned by them adjoining the March lot to the southwest and within 800 feet of the property conveyed, any house that shall cost less than $5000 each or that will be nearer than 40 feet to the street line." It also contains a restriction against building within 40 feet of the street line by Mrs. March. The next deed is to Mrs. Romaine, dated March 15, 1899, and contained a like covenant to that of Mrs. March as to building within 40 feet of the street line, and a covenant on the part of the Headleys not to build within 40 feet of the line of the street for a space 500 feet west of her line. The next is a deed to Walsh, dated February 27, 1899. This refers to the Headley road as laid out across the whole tract and conveys half the road in front of the land conveyed.

With regard to these two covenants in favor of Mrs. March and Mrs. Romaine, it is enough to say that they were covenants in favor of the two lots conveyed to those ladies, respectively, and cannot by any proper construction be extended to any subsequent purchasers. With regard to the declaration or agreement in the deed to Mrs. Willis, it covers only the road which adjoined Mrs. Willis' land. With regard to the conveyances in which reference is made to a road laid out across the whole tract, it is quite plain that the draftsman of those deeds had before him the Howell map, which, as we have seen, includes only a part of the whole tract. The declaration "said Headley road to remain open and to be used as a public road by all persons desiring to use the same" can operate only in two ways: First, as a private covenant with the several grantees, in which no other person has any interest as an individual; and, second, as a dedication to the public. In neither aspect can Mr. Lidgerwood take advantage of it, since the public have never accepted the dedication. But these several mentions of the Headley road—the map was never mentioned in any of the deeds—were undoubtedly the moving causes of the complainant, out of abundant caution, making it a condition that he should have a release from these parties before he accepted his conveyance.

We come now to the deed to Mills. The description of the land conveyed found in that deed refers to the Headley road, but nowhere to any map. Then is found this clause: "The parties hereto hereby agree that no dwelling house or other building shall be erected on the lot above described or on the remaining land of the parties of the first part, nearer than 40 feet to the northwesterly side line of Headley road aforesaid." This clause was inserted in fulfillment of the clause on the subject found in complainant's contract of April 6, 1903, as above quoted, and the deed to complainant subsequently executed in pursuance of it, which provided that such erection shall not be made on the lands of the Headleys. It must be confessed that taken literally it restricts the building of a house within 40 feet of the line of the Headley road on a part of the property covered by complainant's contract, if the Headleys were the owners of it at the time that the deed to Mills was delivered. Good conveyancing required that the lands under contract to the complainant should have been expressly excepted in that deed. Mr. Headley swears that he executed the deed intelligently, because he understood that the deed to the complainant was to be delivered prior to the deed to Mills. Judge Vreeland swears that he did not limit the scope of that covenant by taking back from Mr. Mills a contemporaneous declaration in writing to that effect because he thought it was thoroughly understood by Mills, and I am of the opinion that he was justified in so supposing. But the precise effect of the deed in restricting the complainant's right to build is not involved in this suit, since it is not within the issue, which, as I read the pleadings, is confined entirely to a right of way, hence I shall express no opinion upon it. I can find no language in Mr. Mills' deed which gives by implication any right of way over that part of the Headley road which is included in complainant's purchase. The only implication which can justly be raised therefrom is a right of way over Headley road to South street.

The right to drive or walk over the lower end of the road across the line of complainant's purchase is neither necessary or convenient for the beneficial enjoyment of the lands conveyed to him. Further, it will be observed that, unlike the deeds to Miss Dana, Mrs. March, and Mrs. Romaine, the deed to Mills contains no language by which the extent of the road to the southwest can be determined. As in the other cases, there is no mention of a map.

But say counsel for Lidgerwood: The Headleys spoke of the road and a map was used. The road was visible on the ground for at least 85 feet within the limits of complainant's purchase, and on the map for over 300 feet, and they claim that the Headleys are now estopped in equity, and so is the complainant as their grantee, from setting up that the road does not exist. It is of the essence of equitable estoppel that the party setting it up must have so far acted upon it as that it would work injustice to him to permit the other party to retract his position. Now, I am unable to see how Lidgerwood will be injured in the least by the closing of this road, as proposed by the complainant. The case is not only bare of any proof that he bought with a view of making any use of or deriving any benefit from the existence of the road at the point in question or that he can possibly derive any benefit therefrom, but, on the contrary, it abundantly appears that the sole use that he expected to make of the road was to have access over it to South street. I have said that the object of an estoppel is to promote justice. To set it up and enforce it in this instance would, in my judgment, work a gross injustice on the Headleys and the complainant, since it would simply give to Mr. Lidgerwood a right to injure them without benefitting himself or his land, except in so far as it gave him power to compel the parties to buy him off. The result is that complainant had an oral contract for the purchase of his premises as early as the 21st of January, 1903, which as against third parties with notice of it was binding and valid; that it was crystallized by a written agreement, complete in all its parts, executed on the 7th of April, 1903; that Lidgerwoods' agreement was perfected as a verbal agreement on the 4th of April, and crystallized into what may be deemed a valid and binding agreement on the same day as the complainant's; that Lidgerwoods' agent, Mills, had complete notice of complainant's agreement before he paid any money, and that a deed to complainant had been executed to his knowledge before he accepted his title and paid his money, and that therefore the complainant is first in time and is entitled to priority in equity.

Second. I find that the deed to Mills does not, either expressly or by implication, convey any right to him in the Headley road over the parts here covered by complainant's contract, and that the case not only does not warrant, but forbids, the raising of any estoppel in favor of giving Mr. Lidgerwood any right in the premises. For these reasons, briefly stated orally at the hearing, and without commenting upon or very carefully examining the cases cited by the counsel for defendant, I advised the decree now under appeal.

I have now examined the authorities cited by counsel for Mr. Lidgerwood, and find in them nothing to conflict with that result, except one or two cases in Massachusetts. The judges of that state, in ascertaining the rights of parties arising under circumstances more or less similar to the present, early adopted the judge-made doctrine that the mention in the description of land in a conveyance of a street or road adjoining the same amounted by implication to a positive and solemn covenant, with all its characteristics, and results on the part of the grantor that such a street did exist, and they applied that doctrine so far in one or two instances as to give the grantee an absolute right of way over the whole length and breadth of the street, whether such right was of the least benefit to him or not. I have always conceived that the right in such a case was to be derived either from an implied grant of a right of way to the nearest public highway, as in the nature of a right of way by necessity, or from an estoppel, which prevents the grantor from denying the existence of the road, where and so far as the doing so would injure the grantee, or that, if a covenant was to be presumed, it was to be confined in its operation and effect within such limits as the presumed intention of the parties and the very right and justice of the case required. The indisposition of our courts to presume a covenant in the strict sense of that word in such cases is manifested by the case of Hopkinson v. McKnight, 31 N. J. Law, 422.

Let us look at some of the cases in our own Reports relied upon by defendant. I pass over those which deal with the sufficiency of certain acts to affect a dedication to the public, since they have little or no application here. In Dill v. Board of Education, 47 N. J. Eq. 421, 20 Atl. 739, 10 L. R. A. 276 (where most of the cases up to that date, 1889, are collected), the claim was one for light and air over a lane immediately adjoining the lands of the complainant, so that there was no question as to the right of way in that lane at any point beyond its contact with complainant's land, and could be, therefore, no question as to a right of way in a cul-de-sac at a distance from complainant's lot. In fact there was no cul-de-sac, but the lane in question was part of a network of streets; all opening directly or indirectly upon recognized public highways. So with the case of White v. Tide Water Oil Co., 50 N. J. Eq. 1, 25 Atl. 199. That was the case of an elaborate network of streets laid out on the official map of the city and connecting with public highways, so that the element of cul-de-sac did not exist. Just here I will refer to the careful language of Chancellor Zabriskie, in Attorney General v. Railroad, 19 N. J. Eq. 386, where, at page 394, in speaking of the effect upon the right of the individual abutters of the lawful vacation of a street once dedicated and accepted by the public, he says: "The purchaser of a lot upon a street so dedicated acquires a perpetual, indefeasible right of access to his lot over the same, or at least over so much as leads from his lot to the next adjoining public street on each side, whether the same be accepted and adopted by the public as a highway or not, and retains it if, after acceptance, the same be abandoned by the public as a public highway." I conceive this to be an accurate statement of the law, and it fully recognizes the doctrine laid down by Baron Comyn, above stated, namely, that each end of a private way must either be some public place or some private place where the occupant has some right to go. To the same effect as Chancellor Zabriskie's statement is the well-considered opinion of Van Fleet v. C., in Dodge v. Penn. R. R. Co., 43 N. J. Eq. 351, 11 Atl. 751, adopted by the Court of Appeals in affirming his decree in 45 N.

J. Eq. 368, 19 Atl. 622. The case is too long for extensive citation, but refused to extend the right of way beyond the first street on each side of the complainant's lands, precisely in accordance with Chancellor Zabriskie's doctrine. And I think it is quite consistent with what was said by Mr. Justice Depue in Boornem v. North Hudson Co. R. R. Co., 40 N. J. Eq. page 564, 5 Atl. page 108. There, in speaking of rights arising out of conveyances referring to streets, the learned judge speaks of the implied right of access to the land. He does speak of it as an implied covenant thus: "By such conveyances the grantees are regarded as purchasers by implied covenant to the right to the use of the street as a means of passage to and from their premises"—by which he means passage from some public place to and from their premises. And, further on, he says: "For a grantor may acquire an easement in lands conveyed by apt words in the deed to create such a right, which, by way of estoppel, covenant, or implied grant will bind the grantee." But it is quite plain from this and other similar language used by other judges in this state in such cases that the implication arising under such circumstances, whether it be founded on implied covenant or on estoppel, is confined to such use of the road or street as is necessary or useful for the beneficial enjoyment of the lot conveyed. And in general the language used by the judges is that the right is to a right of way for access from some public highway to and from the premises conveyed.

No case, in New Jersey or elsewhere, that I have found, except in Massachusetts, presently to be mentioned, has gone so far as to hold that in the present case, for instance, that if the Headleys, after conveying the two lots on the corner of Headley road and South street to Mrs. Willis and to Miss Dana, had chosen to obliterate and close the street they had already worked in the rear of these premises, they might not have done so, provided it did not appear that such closing would work any injury to those grantees. I will mention here the case of Holdane v. Trustees of Village of Cold Spring, 21 N. Y. 474. There the owners of a tract of land had laid out on the ground and fenced a strip of land for an avenue, extending from one already opened, across their lands to lands of one Morris, and there ending in a cul-de-sac, and had this street so laid out on the ground plotted and designated as a highway on a map of the village made and published by one Bethan. Years afterwards, and before any lots had been sold off from it, or there had been any acceptance by the public, the owners closed up the road and shut out the public. It was held by an unanimous court that the owners had the right to revoke their dedication at any time before the public accepted it; therein affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court, where two of the judges went on the ground that there could be no dedication of a cul-de-sac and the others went on the ground that there had been no acceptance. Another case cited by the defendants is Bissell v. N. Y. Central R. R. Co., 23 N. Y. 61. There the sole question before the court was whether the conveyance of land bounding on the side of a street laid out, but not yet accepted by the public, carried the title by implication to the centre of the street, and the court held that it did do so. The facts were that one Morgan, owning one half of a block of land in the city of Rochester surrounded by open streets, laid out through it a street called Erie street, cutting his land in two and ending in a cul-de-sac in the line of the owner of the other half of the square, who never continued it across his half. Morgan sold all the lots facing on this street not including in the descriptions the street itself. Subsequently the defendant acquired the title to all these lots and erected a building or buildings upon them, including the dedicated street. Subsequently Morgan conveyed his title to the bed of the street to the plaintiff, who brought ejectment to recover the land so conveyed to him. Judgment was given, reversing the Supreme Court, for the defendant, and it is difficult to see how it could have been otherwise.

I come now to the Massachusetts cases. First. Tufts v. City of Charlestown, 2 Gray, 271. There the question arose upon the amount of damages to be awarded to the owner of the soil of a street proposed to be laid out by the city of Charlestown. It was, I believe, originally a cul-de-sac, but the only land granted out on the street extended to the whole depth of the street, so that the grantee had a clear right of way over the entire depth. It was held that the grantee had an interest in the whole length of the street amounting to an easement, which reduced the value of the interest therein of the grantor, which should be taken into account in estimating the value of his interest. As the land conveyed, bounding on the street, extended to the full depth, the question here did not arise.

The next case is Thomas v. Poole (1856), 7 Gray, 83. There one Butters the owner of a tract of land bounding on a public street conveyed to the plaintiff a lot facing on this public street, and on one side "upon a new street now staked out and to be opened by said Butters, 30 feet wide extending from said main street along on the northerly side of said lot hereby conveyed westerly to the land of the heirs of Dr. Luther Stearns, deceased." The case does not show whether this staked out street was then or ever carried across the land of Stearns. Subsequently Butters altered the location of the street on the ground to the west of the plaintiff's land, and sold to the defendant, an entirely innocent purchaser, a lot facing on it which included a portion of the street as staked out on the ground at the date of the plain-tiff's purchase. The defendant proceeded to build upon his lot. The action was for damages for the obstruction of the street as staked out when the plaintiff bought. The court held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, although by reason of the removal of the stakes the defendant had no knowledge or notice of the first location of the street. The decision was based on the doctrine of a hard and fast covenant on the part of the grantor of the plaintiff that a perpetual immovable street existed at the point in question, although it did not appear that such existence at that particular point was or could be of the least benefit or advantage to the plaintiff or his land. To my mind the judgment was unjust and inequitable, and not warranted by law. It was in fact carrying the doctrine of implied covenant to a mischievous extent. The next case is Rodgers v. Parker (1857) 9 Gray, 445. In that case the owner of the whole tract sold at auction by a map several lots lying on each side of a street called "Hancock Avenue," leading southwesterly from Hancock street (a public highway) to lands of Greenleaf, but whether extending through Greenleaf's land or not does not appear, but presumably it did not. The plaintiff was the purchaser of one of these lots nearest the open street, and annexed to his deed, and recorded therewith, was a copy of the map used at the auction. The defendant bought a lot facing on the street, in about the middle of it, and reference was made by his deed to the map recorded with plaintiff's deed. The plaintiff subsequently bought the lots lying on each side of this new street on the end next to Greenleaf's lands, one of these lots immediately adjoined the defendant's purchase. The plaintiff built a fence across the avenue at the extreme outer edges of his lots, and immediately in front of the adjoining edge of defendant's lot. The defendant removed the fence. Plaintiff sued him in trespass for tearing down his fence. The court held that the plaintiff had clearly, though slightly, so mislocated his fence as to interfere with defendant's right of way in the street immediately in front of his lot, and therefore the defendant was justified in removing the fence. But the court went further and held, on the authority of the previous cases in that state and the doctrine of hard and fast covenant before referred to, that the defendant was entitled to have the street as laid out on the map kept open to its full depth. The case in its facts is distinguishable from the one in hand. First. In that the paper street there extended entirely across the original grantor's land and it might be said that, peradventure, the adjoining owner would at some time be willing to have it extended across his land to some public highway, while in the present case the road ended in the midst of the grantor's land. Second. That the map was referred to in defendant's deed, and, so to speak, made a part of the conveyance, while here it is not so referred to. Third. The plaintiff proposed to close the street up to a point immediately in front of the side of the defendant's lot, instead of 250 feet away from it, as in the present case.

But over and above those distinctions, I cannot bring my mind to acquiesce in the soundness of its doctrine. I think it carries the doctrine of implied covenant beyond what is warranted by reason or justice. I have taken the trouble to look through the subsequent Massachusetts Reports to ascertain how far the doctrine of the two cases just mentioned have been approved and followed in the subsequent decisions. In the case of Stetson v. Dow, 16 Gray, 372, the way mentioned extended from one street to another. In Fox v. Union Sugar Refinery Co., 100 Mass. 292 (cited by defendant's counsel), the passageway over which the right of way was claimed led from one street to another street, so that, as in the case in 16 Gray, 372, there was no question of a cul-de-sac. In the prior case of Light v. Goddard, 11 Allen, 5, which is later than Rodgers v. Parker and Thomas v. Poole, the court refused to extend the doctrine of implied covenant as it had been done in those two cases; and Biglow, C. J. (page 7), says: "In these and similar cases it is regarded as a question of intent; and as ways or streets adjoining land, and by which it is bounded are usually appurtenances, or used to obtain access to the land, the inference is a reasonable one that the grantor intended that the street or way named in the deed should continue open and be for the use of the grantee, so far as it might be beneficial to the estate granted, and was within the power of the grantor to convey." And, again (on page 8): "We are by no means prepared to adopt as a sound rule of exposition the general proposition on which the argument for the plaintiff rests. We do not think that a mere reference to a plan in the descriptive part of a deed carries with it by necessary implication an agreement or stipulation that the condition of land, not adjacent to, but lying in the vicinity of, that granted, as shown on the plan, or the use to which it is represented on the plan to be appropriated, shall forever continue the same so far as it may be indirectly beneficial to the land included in the deed, and was within the power or control of the grantor at the time of the grant." In Tobey v. City of Taunton, 119 Mass. 404, Tobey was the owner of a lot on the corner of Main and Prescott streets, in the city of Taunton, which last-named street that city proposed to lay out and widen, taking in a portion of what Tobey claimed to be his land. The city claimed that that portion was within the limit of Prescott street, as mentioned in a deed by Tobey's grantor to a party bounding on Prescott street in the rear of Tobey's land. Manifestly it has no application here. In Killion v. Kelley, 120 Mass. 47, there was also a dispute between several owners of lots bounding on a court and an owner of the lot on the corner of the court and the main street. Williams v. Boston Water Power Co., 184 Mass. 406, was a case in which the purchaser claimed, as a logical result of Thomas v. Poole and Rodgers v. Parker, that he had a right to light and air over a piece of land shown on the lot by which he purchased, but the court refused to carry the doctrine that far. The next case is Regan v. Boston Light Co., 187 Mass. 87. There the plaintiff bought a lot by a plan showing a great number of streets. Morton, J., at page 41, says: "These deeds undoubtedly give the plaintiff a right of way over the streets named in them, namely, Commercial and Union streets, so far as to furnish him with a communication with the public streets with which they connect. This right is not questioned, but they refer to the plan merely for the purpose of description and identification of the lots conveyed, and do not either expressly or by implication annex to these lots a right of way over all the streets laid down on the plan." And on page 42 he says: "The references to the plan in the deed by the grantor was merely for the purpose of description and boundary, and not with the intent to convey by implication remote rights of way not necessary to the enjoyment of the premises conveyed." And again on page 43: "What is the purpose and effect of a reference to a plan in a deed is a question of the intention of the parties. In the absence of an express grant, a grant by implication of an onerous servitude upon other lands of the grantor not necessary for the enjoyment of the land conveyed is not to be presumed unless such is clearly the intention of the parties." In Coolidge v. Dexter, 129 Mass. 167, it was held "a mere reference to a plan in the descriptive part of a deed of a lot of land does not import a stipulation by the grantor that the plan shall not in any respects be subsequently changed in parts not adjacent to the land sold." And, finally, in Pearson v. Allen, 151 Mass. 79, 23 N. E. 731, 21 Am. St. Rep. 426, the court refused to give to the complainant a right of way over an avenue plainly laid down on a map by which he bought, because it did not lead to any public street. The court says: "The cases here and elsewhere show that there are limits to the easements raised by way of implication, even if there are not limits to the power of creating easements when it is attempted by express words." While these cases do not expressly overrule the cases cited above, they do seem to me plainly to limit their effects as precedents.

If we inquire what was the intention of the parties to the deed to Lidgerwood with regard to the use of that part of Headley road here in question, we shall find that it was not the intention of the Headleys to grant to Lidgerwood any right in that part of the road, and that Lidgerwood could not have supposed that such was their intention, because he had notice through his agents, Mr. Mills, and his brother, that the Headleys had no such intention. And, if we inquire what beneficial use to Lidgerwood's lot such a right of way would be, we find absolutely none.

HITCHENS v. SCHOOL DIST. NO. 180 IN SUSSEX COUNTY.

(Superior Court of Delaware. Sussex. April 12, 1905.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS—EMPLOYMENT OF TEACHER—CONTRACT—VALIDITY.

A contract employing a teacher, entered into at a meeting of which all the members of the school committee had notice and at which a majority were present, is binding on the district.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—WRONGFUL DISCHARGE.

An employé, discharged without just cause before the expiration of the term of his employment, is entitled to recover the agreed compensation for the remainder of the term.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 84, Cent. Dig. Master and Servant, § 50.]

Action by Frank D. Hitchens against school district No. 180 in Sussex county. Verdict for plaintiff.

Action of assumpsit on an alleged verbal contract between the plaintiff and the defendant corporation, under which he agreed to teach the public school at Redden, in Sussex county, for seven months, beginning September 30, 1901, at $40 per month. At the trial the plaintiff testified to the facts of his employment, and stated that after teaching for 11 days the schoolhouse was locked by the school committee, and that he was not permitted by said committee to complete his contract, although tendering himself ready so to do.

Argued before LORE, C. J., and SPRUANCE and BOYCE, JJ.

Robert C. White, for plaintiff. John M. Richardson and C. W. Cullen, for defendant.

When the plaintiff had rested, counsel for defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground that there was no valid contract proved, inasmuch as the employment of the plaintiff was not effected at a meeting of the school committee duly convened.

SPRUANCE, J. In Smith v. School District, 1 Pennewill, 401, 42 Atl. 368, the agreement for the employment of the teacher was made with the commissioners individually, and not at a meeting of the board, and the court very properly held that said agreement did not bind the corporation defendant, saying that "in the employment of teachers the contract to be valid should either be made at a meeting of the committee in the first instance, or else be ratified at such a meeting of the committee, of which meeting all the committee should have notice and the opportunity to attend, and at which a major ity must be present and act. Such contract may not rest in agreements made upon solicitation, or otherwise, with the individual members of the committee apart from each other; but only upon united action at a meeting duly convened." In the present case the member of the board who did not attend the meeting at Hill's store, at which the agreement with the plaintiff was made, had notice of said meeting, and was requested to be present. The said meeting was held by the other two commissioners, a majority of the board, and their action in making the agreement with the plaintiff bound the defendant. The nonsuit is refused.

SPRUANCE, J. (charging jury). This action is brought by the plaintiff, Frank D. Hitchens, against the defendant, school district No. 180 in Sussex county, to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract. If there was no breach of the contract by the defendant, there can be no recovery.

We are asked by the defendant to charge you that if, from the evidence, you believe that the plaintiff was not employed by the committee duly convened, your verdict should be for the defendant. We decline to so charge; but say to you that, in view of the uncontradicted testimony, the meeting at Hill's store, of which the other commissioner had due notice, was such a meeting of the school committee as qualified the two members then present to bind the defendant corporation by entering into an agreement with the plaintiff employing him as a teacher of the school of said district.

It appears by the testimony on both sides that in the latter part of July or the early part of August, 1901, the defendant made a verbal agreement or contract with the plaintiff by which he was employed to teach the school of said district for 7 months, at $40 per month, and that under said agreement, on September 30th of the same year, the plaintiff took charge of said school and continued teaching for 11 days, when he was discharged. The plaintiff contends that up to the time of his discharge he had performed all of the duties and conditions of his employment, and that he was ready and willing to continue so to do to the end of the period for which he had been hired by the defendant, and that his discharge was without any sufficient cause. The defendant contends that at the time of the making of the said contract or agreement it was agreed by both parties (1) that the plaintiff should take his dinner to the school, and remain on the school premises during the recess and noon periods; and (2) that he should not board at the house of one Dutton, who lived a very short distance from the school. If these conditions were a part of the agreement, they were binding upon the plaintiff.

The defendant claims that these were material conditions of the plaintiff's employment, and that he was discharged by reason of his breach of these conditions and his refusal to observe the same in the future. It will be your duty to determine from the evidence whether these, or either of these, conditions was a part of the said agreement between the parties, and, if so, whether they, or either of them, was broken by the plaintiff.

Where one employed for service for a certain period, at a certain compensation, enters into the service of his employer, and is discharged without sufficient cause before the expiration of the period, he is entitled to recover the wages he would have been entitled to had he been permitted to remain in the service to the end of said period. But, if such discharge was for the failure or refusal of the employé to observe any material condition of his employment, such discharge would be justified, and the employé could not recover compensation for the residue of the period.

The claim in this case is for wages at the rate of $40 per month for seven months, making $280, less $22, which is admitted to have been paid. If there was on the part of the plaintiff no breach of any of the conditions of his employment, and he was discharged, he would be entitled to recover the said amount, less this credit of $22. If, on the other hand, he was discharged by reason of his breach of any of the conditions of his employment, or his refusal to perform the conditions thereof, then he would not be entitled to recover anything, and your verdict should be for the defendant.

Verdict for plaintiff for $258.

MacFEAT v. PHILADELPHIA, W. & B. R. CO.

(Superior Court of Delaware. New Castle. March 4, 1904.)

1. DEATH—ACTIONS FOR CAUSING—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

In an action against a carrier for wrongful death, a question asked a witness as to decedent's habits with respect to industry at the time of his death, with reference to decedent's earning capacity and to show that his life was of more value than that of a careless man, was too general.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Death, §§ 86, 87.]

2. EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY.

In an action against a carrier for wrongful death, a question asked a medical expert, who testified to the nature of the wounds on decedent's body, as to whether the injuries and the shock were such as would have been caused by being struck by an express train going at the rate of 25 or 30 miles an hour and his body being rolled or crushed under the running board of a shifting engine, was not a proper one for an expert to answer.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 2336.]

3. SAME—CONCLUSION OF FACT.

In an action against a carrier for wrongful death, a question asked a witness as to whether or not, in his judgment, the platform on which decedent was killed and the passageway or crossing over the same were an unusual and unsafe crossing for persons to use and wait upon for trains, was inadmissible as calling for a conclusion of facts.

4. CARRIERS—INJURIES TO PERSON AT STATION—ACTION—EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action against a carrier for wrongful death, it appeared that, while plaintiff was waiting on defendant's platform for an approaching train, he was frightened by steam from a shifting engine coming up on a parallel track, causing him to jump in front of the approaching train, a question as to whether witness had seen the shifting engine and the cars attached at any other position than where they were at the time of the accident, on other days, when witness was waiting for the daily train for which decedent was waiting, asked for the purpose of showing a custom on defendant's part of standing a shifting engine and one or more cars in front of the station at the time of the approach of the passenger train to act as a fence to keep people back off the dangerous part of the platform, was inadmissible.

5. SAME—CITY ORDINANCE—SPEED OF TRAINS.

Where, in an action against a carrier for causing the death of plaintiff's intestate while awaiting transportation at a station, plaintiff's declaration alleged that defendant's train which caused the accident was at the time moving at an unlawful rate of speed through the city, city ordinances in reference to the speed of trains passing through the city were admissible as against the objection that such ordinances were not identified and described with particularity in the pleadings.

6. TRIAL—OBJECTIONS—STRIKING OUT TESTIMONY.

Where no objection to the reception of evidence is made, a motion to strike out the same must be made at or about the time the evidence is given.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 245.]

7. EVIDENCE—PHOTOGRAPHS.

In an action against a carrier for wrongful death, a photograph of the station at which decedent was killed, showing the situation of the tracks and station, was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, §§ 1509, 1511.]

8. SAME—EXPERT EVIDENCE.

In an action against a carrier for wrongful death, evidence of a photographer as to where a camera was placed to take a photograph of defendant's track and the station where decedent was killed was inadmissible; the question not being one for expert testimony.

9. CARRIERS—INJURIES TO PERSON AT STATION—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action against a carrier for causing the death of plaintiff's intestate while awaiting transportation at a station, evidence examined, and held sufficient to take the case to the jury.

10. TRIAL—NONSUIT—JUDICIAL DISCRETION.

An exception does not lie to the court's ruling on a motion for a nonsuit; the question being one entirely within the discretion of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 868.]

11. CARRIERS—INJURIES TO PERSON AT STATION—ACTION—EVIDENCE—REBUTTAL.

Where, in an action against a carrier for wrongful death, plaintiff's witnesses testified that they saw one of defendant's witnesses standing on the railroad track two or three minutes before the accident, testimony of such witness as to where he was at or about the time of the accident was admissible in rebuttal.

12. NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE OF INJURY.

In an action for injuries resulting from negligence, defendant is liable only for such negligence as constituted the proximate or immediate cause of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Negligence, §§ 69-82.]

13. CARRIERS—INJURIES TO PERSON AT STATION—SPEED OF TRAIN—CITY ORDINANCE—VIOLATION.

The violation of a city ordinance respecting the rate of speed at which railroad trains may be run through the city is of itself an act of negligence, proof of which renders a railroad liable for any injury resulting therefrom to a person awaiting transportation at a station.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1155.]

14. SAME—ORDINARY CARE.

The term "ordinary care," when applied to the management of railroad engines and cars in motion, imports all care which the peculiar circumstances of the place or occasion reasonably require, and this will be increased or diminished according as ordinary liability to danger and accident and to do injury to others is increased or diminished in the movement and management of such engines and cars.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1087.]

15. SAME—WARNING BY BELL OR WHISTLE.

It is the duty of a railroad company to give timely and sufficient warning, by bell, whistle, or otherwise, of the approach of trains, and to run such trains at a rate of speed proper and reasonable under the circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1155.]

16. SAME—CARE TO AVOID INJURY—PERSONS—CROSSING TRACKS.

Persons crossing railroad tracks are bound to reasonably use all of their senses for the prevention of accident, and also to exercise all such reasonable caution as ordinarily prudent and careful persons would exercise in like circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1365; vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Railroads, § 1022.]

17. SAME.

Common carriers of passengers are responsible for any negligence resulting in injury to the passengers, and are required, in the preparation, conduct, and management of their means of conveyance, to exercise every degree of care, diligence, and skill which a reasonable man would use under such circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1087.]

18. SAME—RIGHTS OF PASSENGER AT STATION—CROSSING TRACKS.

When the arrangement of a railroad station is such that a passenger has to cross the track either before entering or after leaving the cars, he has a right to assume that the track may be crossed safely, provided he crosses the same at a proper and reasonable time.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1365.]

19. SAME—EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS.

In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the law presumes that at the time of an accident occurring to a passenger at a railroad station through being struck by an approaching train, such passenger exercised reasonable care and caution to prevent injury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1390.]

20. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—LIABILITY.

A railroad company is liable for injuries to a passenger if, notwithstanding any previous negligence of the latter, the company could have prevented the accident by the use of ordinary and reasonable care.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1087.]

21. SAME—RAILROAD CROSSING.

One approaching a railroad crossing to take a train is bound to know that it is a place of danger.

22. NEGLIGENCE—ACTIONABLE INJURIES—ACCIDENT.

A pure accident, without negligence on the part of the party responsible therefor, is not actionable.

23. DEATH—ACTION FOR CAUSING—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

In an action for wrongful death, the measure of damages is such sum as the jury believe from the evidence deceased would probably have earned in his business during life and have left as his estate at the time of his death, taking into consideration his age, his reasonable probabilities of life, his ability and disposition to labor, and his habits of living and expenditure.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Death, § 109.]

Action on the case by Alexander L. MacFeat, administrator of Walter MacFeat, deceased, against the Philadelphia, Wilmington & Baltimore Railroad Company, to recover damages for the death of said deceased, which was alleged to have been caused by the negligence of said company on the 26th of June, 1902, at its French Street Station in the city of Wilmington. Judgment for defendant.

At the trial plaintiff proved: That on the 26th of June, 1902, Walter MacFeat was standing upon or crossing over the spur track of the defendant company nearly opposite and south from the waiting-room door of the defendant's French Street Station about the time the 1:37 p. m. Philadelphia express was due. That several others who were waiting for said train were also standing or moving about said tracks. That there was a cement pavement extending entirely around said station, 137 feet long and varying in width from 28 to 35 feet. That near the side track or spur on which MacFeat was standing, and to the south of it, was the south-bound track of the defendant company, and six feet further to the south of the latter track was the north-bound track of said company, all of which tracks were at grade and had boards between them, forming a crossing or passageway from the said station to certain of defendant's trains. That when the said express train was coming up to the station on the north-bound track, suddenly and without prior warning, a shifting engine of the defendant company, with two empty passenger cars attached, started west on said track on which MacFeat was standing and at the same time began to blow off steam. That MacFeat, apparently startled by the unexpected movement of the shifter, and in order to escape being run over by the same, moved away from said track, with his right side towards the north-bound track, on which the express train was then coming in at a very rapid rate (the testimony being that at the time of the accident the train was running from 25 to 30 miles an hour), and in so doing was struck in the hip or back by the projecting timbers of the cowcatcher of the engine of said express train, whereby he was hurled in front of and underneath the running board at the front of the moving shifter. That his body was rolled over a few times and crushed under said running board before the shifter came to a standstill. That by said striking by the engine and rolling under the running board of the shifter MacFeat was so badly injured that he died in about six hours thereafter. It was further proved: That the deceased was employed at the Klamensal Woolen Mills, near Wilmington, but usually went to his home in Philadelphia on Saturdays to visit his family, and as a rule traveled over the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, but sometimes used the defendant company's road. That on the Saturday in question he rode into town from Stanton with a witness named Guest, and told the latter that he was going home to Philadelphia from Wilmington on the train that left there somewhere about 1 o'clock. That on arriving in Wilmington about 12 o'clock said witness stopped his team at Front and Madison streets and MacFeat got out and walked on down Front street towards the defendant company's station. Witness learned the following morning that MacFeat had been struck and killed by one of the defendant's trains.

The defendant produced evidence to the effect that MacFeat crossed the track in front of the shifter at a rapid rate and proceeded diagonally across the south-bound to the north-bound track, on which the express train was approaching, with his head down and his hands in his pockets, and never looked or stopped until he was struck by the said express train.

Argued before LORE, C. J., and PENNEWILL and BOYCE, JJ.

Levin F. Melson and Horace G. Knowles, for plaintiff. Herbert H. Ward and Andrew C. Gray, for defendant.

During the course of the trial the following rulings were made as to the admission of testimony:

Alexander L. MacFeat, the plaintiff, was asked by Mr. Knowles the following questions:

"Q. State as to your brother's habits, with respect to industry, at the time of his death. A. He was a very steady man, and never lost any time from his work, that I know of. Q. Was he or not a careful man? A. I would consider him to be very careful."

Mr. Gray: We object. That question has been ruled on in this court before. It is not whether he was an ordinarily careful man or not. The sole issue here is—if there is any issue as to his care—as to whether at the time of the accident he was in the exercise of due care.

Mr. Melson: The object of the question is to show that, if he was careful, his life was of more value than that of a careless man. I believe the court ruled it in the Cox Case.

PENNEWILL, J. You mean it has reference to his earning capacity?

Mr. Melson: Yes; reference to the loss.

PENNEWILL, J. We think it too general.

Mr. Ward: I move that the testimony on that point be stricken out.

PENNEWILL, J. Let the answer to that question be stricken out.

Dr. James A. Draper, who testified to the nature of the wounds upon the body of Walter MacFeat, was asked by Mr. Knowles the following question:

"Q. Were those injuries that he received, and the shock, such as would have been caused by being struck by an express train or the engine of it, going at the rate of 25 or 30 miles an hour and his body being rolled or crushed under a running-board of a shifting engine? (Objected to by counsel for defendant, as not a proper question for an expert to answer. Objection sustained.)"

John Sharp, a witness produced and duly sworn at the trial of the above stated case on behalf of the plaintiff, was asked by Mr. Knowles, among others, the following questions:

"Q. Are you familiar with the tracks and the crossing there [referring to the tracks and crossing at the French Street Station of the defendant company]? A. Yes, sir. Q. Right in front of the station? A. Yes, sir. Q. And have seen others passing over it to trains going backward and forward? A. Yes, sir; I have traveled over it every day for over a year. Q. Is that platform there and passageway or crossing, or not, in your judgment an unusually unsafe crossing for persons to use and to wait upon for the north-bound trains? (Objected to by Mr. Ward, of counsel for defendant, on the ground that it was calling for a conclusion of fact, which was for the jury to determine and not for the witness.)"

PENNEWILL, J. The majority of the court hold the question to be inadmissible.

"Q. In being down to take the 1:37 train, and other north-bound trains, have you seen the shifter and those waiting cars at any other position than where they were on that day? (Objected to by counsel for defendant as irrelevant. Counsel for plaintiff stated that they wished to show a custom on the part of the defendant company of standing the shifting engine and one or more cars in front of the station about the time of the approach of the 1:37 train, to act as a bar or as a fence to keep the people back off of the dangerous part of the platform where the tracks are; that it was proper to have the train there; that it was frequently seen there and did serve that purpose.)"

PENNEWILL, J. We think this question is inadmissible.

Mr. Knowles: We offer in evidence City Ordinances, p. 376, § 12, in reference to speed of trains passing through the city. (Objected to by Mr. Gray, of counsel for defendant, on the ground that, in order to introduce in evidence an ordinance of a municipality, said ordinance should be identified and described with particularity in the pleadings, whereas the allegation in plaintiff's declaration concerning the same was that the defendant's train which caused the accident was at the time moving at an unlawful rate of speed through the city, to wit, at a speed greater than six miles an hour. No authority was cited in support of the above contention.)

PENNEWILL, J. We think the ordinance is admissible if you have no other ground than that which you have stated.

Mr. Gray, of counsel for defendant, here states to the court that the witness Lewis Guest, called on behalf of the plaintiff at the afternoon session of the preceding day, had testified to certain statements made by Walter MacFeat on the morning of the accident to the latter concerning said MacFeat's intentions about going to Philadelphia on the afternoon train of that day; that such statements were obviously improper, and, although no objection was made to the testimony at the time, yet he considered that under the principles of evidence there could be no time limit, before the case was submitted to the jury, for a motion to strike out evidence, and therefore he made the motion that all such evidence as he had above referred to given by said witness should be stricken out.

PENNEWILL, J. You made no objection at the time to this evidence, and under our practice we think it is too late to make the motion now. Our practice is to require the motion to be made at or about the time the evidence is given. One reason for such a rule of practice, it occurs to us, is that, if at any time during the trial you could make such a motion, it would consume a great deal of time in going back and reading the testimony to ascertain what it was.

LORE, C. J. Another reason for our rule is that if you make no objection you waive your right and the testimony goes upon the record and becomes a part of it. The practice, as stated by Judge PENNEWILL, has been quite uniform in this court.

PENNEWILL, J. The court refuse your motion to strike out the testimony.

Harry Bucher, a witness, being produced, sworn, and examined on the part and behalf of the plaintiff, testifies as follows:

By Mr. Knowles: "Q. Where do you reside and what is your occupation? A. At 902 West Eighth street, and I am a photographer. Q. At the request of counsel for plaintiff in this case, did you make a photograph of French Street station? A. I did.

Q. Are you familiar with that locality? A. I am. Q. Have you been familiar with it for the last several years? A. Yes, sir. Q. What is the date of the photograph or negative which you made? A. The 14th of December, 1903. Q. Was the condition of the track and station there at that time the same as it had been for two years prior to that? A. To the best of my knowledge. Q. You have been familiar with it all of that time? A. Yes, sir. Q. You have been down there going to take the trains? A. Yes, sir. Q. Is that the photograph from the negative made at the time and place you just stated (shows photograph to witness)? A. This was made a week prior to that."

The above photographs are here offered in evidence by Mr. Knowles, objected to by Mr. Gray, who, pending the decision of the objection, cross-examines the witness as follows:

Cross-examination by Mr. Gray: "X. Where was your camera posted when you took that photograph—being the one showing the train? A. This one was made by a man in my employ. X. It was not made by you? A. No, sir; the other was made by me. X. You don't know where that was taken from? A. This was made from the position of French street looking east. X. Do you new where the camera was posted? A. I imagine from this view, about the middle of the street. X. Was it taken with a camera? A. Yes, sir. X. What kind of a camera? A. I could not say. X. What paraphernalia was there? A. An ordinary focus camera. X. Is it such as you would use in your studio? A. No, sir; it is different, but it is a view camera. We use different focus lenses for outdoor and indoor work. X. You did not take that one yourself? A. Not that one; no, sir."

Mr. Gray: We object to the admission of the photograph, showing the train, as not being taken by this witness at all.

The witness: It was made under my supervision though.

"X. You were not present, though? A. No, sir."

PENNEWILL, J. Do you offer both of them, or only one, Mr. Knowles?

Mr. Knowles: We will offer them separately. We will withdraw this one showing the train, for the present, and our offer covers the one now without the train.

Mr. Gray continues: "X. Who took this other one? A. I did. X. What time of day did you take it? A. I took that about half past 8 o'clock in the morning. X. Where was your camera posted there? A. I was standing at the southwest corner of Water and French streets."

Mr. Ward: We object to the admission of this photograph, the conditions not being the same as testified to in this case.

PENNEWILL, J. We think this is admissible. The objection is overruled.

The same is marked by the stenographer "Plaintiff's Exhibit D."

Mr. Knowles: We now offer this other photograph in evidence—the one showing the train.

By Mr. Knowles: "Q. Who made that photograph? A. Mr. Wingfield, who is in my employ. Q. Was it made at your request? A. Yes, sir. Q. Is Mr. Wingfield an employé of yours? A. Not at the present time, but was at the time this was made. Q. Was the order for that photograph given to you at your place of business? A. It was. Q. And in accordance with that did you send your employé or representative out to take that photograph? A. I did. Q. Can you identify it as being a photograph of that particular place or station, the camera having been placed at or near the northeast corner of Water and French streets? (Objected to by counsel for defendant, and form of question changed as follows:) Q. You are an expert photographer? A. I am a photographer. Q. How long have you been engaged in that business? A. About 25 years."

Mr. Knowles here states that he desires to examine this witness, to see whether or not, as an expert, he can say where the camera was placed to take the picture or photograph, which he desired to offer in evidence.

PENNEWILL, J. We think this is not a question for expert testimony; and we hold that this picture is inadmissible at this time.

At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence, counsel for defendant moved for a nonsuit, on the ground of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. After said motion had been fully argued by the respective counsel, the court rendered the following opinion overruling the said motion:

PENNEWILL, J. Gentlemen, we have carefully considered the motion for a nonsuit made in this case, and while we have very grave doubt of the plaintiff's right to recover upon the evidence presented, we think the case should go to the jury. Therefore we decline to order the nonsuit.

Mr. Knowles: I ask to note an exception to the remarks of the court in refusing the nonsuit.

LORE, C. J. We do not think this is an exceptionable matter; the question as to a nonsuit being one entirely within the discretion of the court.

Mr. Knowles: May it please the court, I desire to note an exception to the ruling of the court upon my application for an exception to the remarks of the court in refusing the motion for a nonsuit.

LORE, C. J. Let it be noted that you asked leave to except, which was refused.

Frank Hyatt, a witness, being produced, sworn, and examined on the part and behalf of the defendant, testified, among other things, as follows:

By Mr. Gray: "Q. Do you remember the 26th day of May, 1902, the day this man MacFeat was killed? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where were you standing about half past 1 o'clock, or somewhere along there? A. I was standing at Front and the depot—Front and French—on the pavement of the station. Q. Did you see this man who was killed? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where did you first see him? A. The first I seen of him he ran into me. Q. He was running? A. Yes, sir; he was on a zig-zag."

By Mr. Melson: "X. Where was this man, on Front street? A. Front and French. I was standing on the corner."

Mr. Melson: We object to the testimony as to what this man was doing at Front and French streets, or on any other street, or to what he was doing at any time or place other than the time and place of the accident.

Mr. Gray: Their witnesses have testified that they saw this man standing on the south-bound track two or three minutes before the accident. This is to meet that testimony.

PENNEWILL, J. We think it is admissible.

Second. "The law in its beneficence will not allow any trifling with the lives or personal safety of human beings, and therefore exacts great care, diligence, and skill from those to whose charge as common carriers they are committed. * * * This obligation is imposed on them as a public duty and by contract to carry safely, as far as human care and foresight will reasonably admit." *Flinn v. Third. "Carriers are affected by what are called 'legal duties' towards their customers. * * * And these duties of observance towards those employing the carriers, as they grow out of their occupation as public agents, do not require to be proved, on the trial of suits against them, but exist in legal contemplation, and therefore are recognized by the courts without any proof. Among the duties with which carriers are charged by law is that of providing a safe means of ingress and egress. * * * The law, indeed, would be sadly deficient, did it not require this duty at the hand of railroad carriers." Wallace v. W. & N. R. R., 8 Houst. 529, 18 Atl. 818.

Fourth. "Where the arrangement of a station is such that a passenger has to cross a track either before entering or after leaving the cars, he has a right to assume that the track may be crossed safely, and the railway is liable if he be struck by a train moving on that track when he is approaching or leaving the cars or station." Terry v. Jewett, 78 N. Y. 338; Brassell v. N. Y. C. R. R. Co., 84 N. Y. 241; Penn. R. R. v. White, 88 Pa. 327; Klein v. Jewett, Recv'r Erie Ry., 26 N. J. Eq. 474; *B. & O. R. R. v. Fifth. Independent of any ordinance upon the subject, the running of its north-bound express train at a high rate of speed through a station where persons were waiting to take its trains would be evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant. B. & O. R. R. v. State to Use of Chambers, 81 Md. 384, 32 Atl. 201.

Sixth. "The plaintiff would be entitled to recover, notwithstanding there had been some negligence on the part of MacFeat, if it was the negligence of the defendant alone that was the proximate or immediate cause of the injury, provided the negligence of MacFeat was not then continuing and did not at the precise time enter into the accident; in other words, if, notwithstanding the previous negligence of MacFeat, the company could have prevented the accident by the use of ordinary and reasonable care." Cox v. W. O. Ry. Co., 4 Pennewill, 162, 53 Atl. 569; Ford v. Warner Co., 1 Marv. 93, 37 Atl. 39; Chielinsky v. Hoopes & Townsend Co., 1 Marv. 273, 40 Atl. 1127.

Seventh. "As MacFeat is dead, not here to speak for himself, the law clothes him with the presumption, that when using the platforms and passageways of the defendant at the French Street Station on that day, that he did his duty; used such care and precaution as an ordinarily prudent and careful man would use in like case, and by that presumption you are to be governed, unless the evidence, directly or indirectly, rebuts it and shows that he did not use such care and precaution." Martin v. B. & P. R. R., 2 Marv. 130, 42 Atl. 442; Cox v. W. C. Ry. Co., 4 Pennewill, 162, 53 Atl. 569.

Elghth. If, from the evidence, the jury believe that the defendant company started up its shifting engine and cars along and across the platform or that part of the station used and occupied by passengers while waiting for and boarding the north-bound trains, at or about the time the 1:37 train was coming in and up to the station, and that by reason of such action on the part of the defendant company, Walter MacFeat, in making an effort to escape from the danger of the approaching shifter, moved his position on the platform, and in doing so got so near the north-bound track that he was struck by the 1:37 north-bound train while running at a speed in excess of six miles an hour, and, either by the blow of the 1:37 train engine or by the shifting engine which partly ran over him, came to his death, then the defendant company is guilty of negligence, and the verdict of the jury should be for the plaintiff. Cannon v. Pittsburg Trac. Co., 194 Pa. 159, 44 Atl. 1089; Stevenson v. Chic., etc., R. (C. C.) 18 Fed. 493; Wilson v. N. Pac. R., 26 Minn. 278, 3 N. W. 333.

Ninth. The rule as to contributory negligence is that where the deceased even acts erroneously, if he so acts "through fright or excitement induced by the defendant's negligence, or adopts a perilous alternative in the endeavor to avoid an injury threatened, he is not guilty of contributory negligence. And in considering the conduct of the deceased, if the peril seemed imminent, more hasty and violent action was to be expected than would be natural at quieter moments; and such conduct is to be judged with reference to the stress of appearances at the time, and not by the cool estimate of the actual danger formed by outsiders after the event." Gannon v. N. Y., etc., R., 173 Mass. 40, 52 N. E. 1075, 43 L. R. A. 833; Penn. R. v. Kilgore, 32 Pa. 292, 72 Am. Dec. 787; Indianapolis R. v. Carr, Adm'r, 35 Ind. 510; Penn. R. v. Ogier, 35 Pa. 60, 78 Am. Dec. 322; Ward v. Chic. R., 85 Wis. 601, 55 N. W. 771; Chicago v. Hesing, Adm'r, 83 Ill. 204, 25 Am. Rep. 378; Wesley City Coal Co. v. Healer, 84 Ill. 126; Schmidt v. Burlington R., 75 Iowa, 606, 39 N. W. 916; Twomley v. C. Park R., 69 N. Y. 158, 25 Am. Rep. 162; Wilson v. N. Pac. R., 26 Minn. 278, 3 N. W. 333; Iron R. Co. v. Mowery, 36 Ohio St. 418, 38 Am. Tenth. If the defendant "seeks to avoid liability for its negligence upon the ground of contributory negligence on the part of MacFeat, then the defendant must show such contributory negligence on the part of MacFeat by a preponderance of proof, or the plaintiff will be entitled to your verdict." Louth v. Thompson, 1 Pennewill, 156, 39 Atl.

1100; Wilkins v. Wilmington, 2 Marv. 132, 42 Atl. 418.

Eleventh. "If you should believe from the evidence in this case that at the time of the accident the north-bound train which struck MacFeat was running at a rate of speed in excess of six miles an hour in violation of the ordinance of the city of Wilmington, and that such excessive speed was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff. The violation of an ordinance of this city is of itself (per se, as we may say) an act of negligence which, in a legal controversy like this, only requires to be proved to render the wrongdoer liable for any injury resulting from such misconduct." Knopf v. P. W. & B. R. Co., 2 Pennewill, 392, 46 Atl. 747; Robinson v. Simpson, 8 Houst. 400, 32 Atl. 287; Giles v. Diamond State Iron Co., 7 Houst. 453, 466, 8 Atl. 368; Diamond State Iron Co. v. Giles, 7 Houst. 566, 11 Atl. 189; Jones v. Belt, 8 Houst. 563, 564, 32 Atl. 723; Carswell, Adm'r, v. Mayor and Council of Wil., 2 Marv. 360, 365, 43 Atl. 169.

Twelfth. If you find for the plaintiff, "in estimating his damages, you may consider the reasonable probabilities of the life of the deceased and ascertain as nearly as you may the value of that life, including the past losses and such prospective damage as has resulted, or may result from his death." Carswell, Adm'r, v. City of Wilmington, 2 Marv. 360, 43 Atl. 169.

Defendant's Prayers.

The defendant prays the court to instruct the jury as follows:

First. That the jury bring in a verdict for the defendant.

Second. That if the jury believe that Walter MacFeat negligently placed himself in a position of danger and was injured in consequence thereof, the said MacFeat was guilty of such contributory negligence as would prevent his recovery.

Third. That if the jury believe that Walter MacFeat negligently placed himself in a position of danger, and while in such position was confronted with an apparent imminent peril, and in attempting to escape such peril exposed himself to the injury by which he was killed, then the jury must find a verdict for the defendant.

Fourth. That if the jury find that the negligence of MacFeat contributed to and entered into the accident the jury shall return a verdict for the defendant, as MacFeat in that case would be guilty of contributory negligence. Where there is contributory negligence, the law will not attempt to measure the proportion of blame or negligence to be attributed to each party.

Fifth. If the jury find that any negligence, however slight, on the part of the plaintiff contributed to the accident, they must return a verdict for the defendant.

Sixth. If the jury should find that the-defendant, at the time of the accident, was negligent by a violation of running its train at an unlawful speed, the defendant will not be liable if the injury was caused in any degree by the negligence or careless conduct of the plaintiff. The law does not permit any one to recover damages from another for an injury if his own negligence has contributed thereto, or where by the exercise of reasonable care he could have avoided it.

Seventh. If the jury believe that it has not been shown by the preponderance of the testimony that the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff, or if the jury should believe that the negligence of MacFeat himself contributed to the injury complained of, the jury should return a verdict for the defendant.

PENNEWILL, J. (charging the jury). This is an action brought by Alexander L. MacFeat, administrator of Walter MacFeat, deceased, against the Philadelphia, Wilmington & Baltimore Railroad Company, to recover damages for the death of said deceased, which is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of said company on the 26th day of May, 1902, at its French Street Station in this city. The declaration filed in the case consists of numerous counts, but we think the negligence averred therein and relied upon by the plaintiff may be summarized as follows:

That the defendant did not provide or furnish sufficient, suitable, and safe platforms and passageways for the deceased at said station; that the defendant negligently and carelessly failed to properly warn the deceased of the movement of the cars operated and controlled by the defendant by guard, bell, whistle, or otherwise; that the defendant, knowing that deceased was caught and fastened by, under, and beneath its engine, did negligently move, start, and back said engine, thereby crushing and mangling the deceased; that by and through the negligence of the defendant its engine or car was driven or struck against the deceased without any notice or warning being given to him; that the defendant negligently furnished the deceased unsafe ingress to its trains, in that it failed to have the supply train in the proper and usual position, and by reason thereof an engine or car of the defendant was driven and struck against the deceased; that the defendant, knowing of the position of the deceased under its engine or shifter, negligently started, moved, and backed said engine or shifter, thereby wounding and injuring the deceased; that the defendant negligently ran and operated its engine, with the cars thereto attached, at the time and place of the accident, at a speed greater than it was authorized by law to do, to wit, at a speed upwards of six miles an hour.

It is also averred in said declaration that the defendant was negligent in causing one of its trains to approach said station without being stopped before reaching a passenger train that was receiving passengers, and also in failing to have its servants and employees standing at the proper place upon the said platforms and passageways of said station to give proper notice to the deceased of the movement of its trains. It is, however, admitted by the plaintiff that there is no evidence in the case to support either of these last two averments, and they are, therefore, not to be considered by you. In some of the counts of plaintiff's declaration it is alleged that the deceased was a passenger of the defendant company at the time and place of the accident, and in other counts it is alleged that he was on the platforms and passageways of the said company at the time of the accident lawfully or with the knowledge of the defendant.

The defendant company denies that it was guilty of any negligence that caused the death or injury of the said Walter MacFeat, and, moreover, insists that, if there was any negligence, it was the negligence of him, the said Walter MacFeat, and not the negligence of the company.

We have been asked by the defendant to direct you to find a verdict for the defendant. This we decline to do. We say to you, gentlemen, that with the facts or evidence in the case the court have nothing to do. They are for your determination alone. You are the sole judges of the effect and weight of the testimony. You have heard all the evidence, and it is now for your careful consideration and determination, applying thereto the law as we shall declare it to you.

This action is based upon negligence, which has often been defined by this court to be the want of ordinary care; that is, the want of such care as a reasonably prudent and careful man would use under similar circumstances. It is for you to determine from the evidence whether there was any negligence that caused the accident complained of, and, if there was, whether it was the negligence of the defendant or of Walter MacFeat, the plaintiff's intestate. To enable the plaintiff to recover at all, he must show to your satisfaction by a preponderance of the evidence, that the negligence which caused the accident, if any there was, was the fault of the defendant company. The burden of proving such negligence is upon the plaintiff, and the defendant can be held liable only for such negligence as constitutes the proximate or immediate cause of the injury.

There are certain things which amount to negligence in law, whether any positive or active negligence be proved or not. The violation of an ordinance of this city is of itself (per se, as we may say) an act of negligence, which only requires to be proved to render a wrongdoer liable for any injury resulting from such misconduct. In such case, however, the defendant would not be liable unless the violation of the ordinance—that is, the excessive speed of the train—caused the accident complained of; nor would the defendant be liable if the injury was caused by the negligence of the deceased. The law does not permit any one to recover damages from another for an injury if his own negligence has contributed thereto, or where by the exercise of reasonable care he could have avoided it.

The term "ordinary care," when applied to the management of railroad engines and cars in motion, imports all the care which the peculiar circumstances of the place or occasion reasonably require; and this will be increased or diminished according as the ordinary liability to danger and accident and to do injury to others is increased or diminished in the movement and management of such engine and cars. It is the duty of a railroad company to give timely and sufficient warning, by bell, whistle, or otherwise, of the approach of trains, and to run its trains at a rate of speed proper and reasonable under the circumstances; and, if the defendant failed to make use of such usual and appropriate means to warn the deceased at the time and place of the accident, it would be negligence on its part; and, if the accident occurred by reason of its failure so to do, the defendant would be liable, provided the deceased did not by his own negligence or want of care contribute to the accident. But, on the other hand, it is equally well settled that the person injured was also bound at the same time to use ordinary care to avoid the injury, and the care and diligence which he was bound to exercise must be in proportion to the danger to be avoided. It is a general rule that persons crossing railroad tracks are bound to the reasonable use of all their senses for the prevention of accident, and also to the exercise of all such reasonable caution as ordinarily prudent and careful persons would exercise in like circumstances.

As we have before stated, the plaintiff claims in certain counts of his declaration that the plaintiff's intestate, at the time and place of the accident, was a passenger of the defendant company; this, however, being denied by the defendant. It is for you to determine, from the evidence, whether he was such passenger or not. It is not necessary to constitute him a passenger that he should have had a ticket, or that he should have been actually upon the train of the defendant. If you believe that it was the bona fide intention of Walter MacFeat, at the time of the accident, to board the defendant's train, and that the defendant had knowledge of that fact, or that the acts and conduct of the deceased and the other facts and circumstances were such as to reasonably inform or notify the defendant that he intended to board the train, he was entitled to such care and protection on the part of the defendant as is required under the law where the relation of passenger and carrier exists. A common carrier of passengers is liable for injuries to the latter only in case of the carrier's negligence, and not when the passenger could have escaped the injury by the use of such care on his part as a reasonably careful person would take of himself under like circumstances. The law, however, exacts great care, diligence, and skill from those to whose charge as common carriers passengers are committed. Common carriers of passengers are responsible for any negligence resulting in injury to them, and are required, in the preparation, conduct, and management of their means of conveyance, to exercise every degree of care, diligence, and skill which a reasonable man would use under such circumstances. This obligation is imposed on them as a public duty, and by their contract to carry safely, as far as human care and forethought will reasonably admit. Flinn v. P. W. & B. R. R. Co., 1 Houst. 466; Betts v. W. O. Ry. Co. 3 Pennewill, 448, 53 Atl. 358.

When the arrangement of a station is such that a passenger has to cross the track either before entering or after leaving the cars, he has a right to assume that the track may be crossed safely, provided he crosses the track at a proper and reasonable time and is not struck because of his own negligence. The tracks of a railroad company over which frequent trains are passing is a place of danger, and neither a passenger nor other person has a right to go upon them at an improper or unreasonable time. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the law presumes that at the time of the accident the deceased did his duty and did exercise reasonable care and caution. This, however, is merely a presumption of law, and may be rebutted by evidence showing that he did not exercise such care and caution. If the negligence of the deceased, Walter MacFeat, contributed to and entered into the accident at the time the injuries were received, the plaintiff cannot recover, even though the company was also guilty of negligence. In such case the deceased would be guilty of contributory negligence, and the law will not attempt to measure the proportion of blame or negligence to be attributed to each party.

The plaintiff, however, would be entitled to recover, notwithstanding there had been some negligence on the part of the deceased, if it was the negligence of the defendant alone that was the proximate or immediate cause of the accident, provided the negligence of the deceased was not then contributing to and did not at that precise time enter into, the accident; in other words, if, notwithstanding any previous negligence of the deceased, the company could have prevented the accident by the use of ordinary and reasonable care. The plaintiff's right to recover is based upon the negligence of the defendant. The burden is upon the plaintiff to prove such negligence to your satisfaction by a preponderance of the evidence; and, where contributory negligence is set up as a defense, it must be proved by the defendant in like manner.

While a person should not be held guilty of contributory negligence who, in the effort to avoid immediate danger, in the exigency of the moment, suddenly and without time or opportunity for reflection, puts himself in the way of other peril without fault on his part, and particularly so if the defendant has placed the person in such position, yet no one has a right to needlessly place himself in a place of danger; and if a person, failing to observe due care, walks into a danger that the observance of due care would have enabled him to avoid, he is no less guilty of contributory negligence than he who by the observance of due care could extricate himself from danger, but fails to make any effort for his personal safety, and because thereof is injured. One approaching a railroad crossing is bound to know that it is a place of danger, and he must give that attention to the sights and sounds of warning of an approaching train, if any there are, that a man of ordinary caution, under like circumstances, would give.

A pure accident, without negligence on the part of the defendant, is not actionable; and if you should believe that it was of such character, it would come under the head of unavoidable accident, and the plaintiff could not recover.

If you shall believe from a preponderance of the evidence in this case that at the time of the accident the train that struck the deceased was running at a rate of speed in excess of six miles an hour in violation of the ordinance of the city of Wilmington, and that such excessive speed was the proximate cause of the death of the deceased, and shall also believe that the deceased was free from any negligence on his part that contributed to the injury, your verdict should be for the plaintiff. But the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover, because of such excessive speed, if such excessive speed was not the proximate cause of his death.

Or if you should believe that at the time of the accident the defendant was not exercising ordinary care, as we have defined it to you—that is, all the care and circumspection, prudence, and discretion that an ordinarily prudent and careful man would have exercised under the circumstances—and that the want of such care and diligence was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff, and shall also believe that the deceased was free from any negligence that contributed to the accident, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff. But if you should believe that it has not been shown by the preponderance of the testimony that the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the death of Walter MacFeat, or if you should believe that the negligence of Walter MacFeat himself contributed to his death, your verdict should be for the defendant.

If you should find for the plaintiff, your verdict should be for such a sum as you believe from the evidence the deceased would probably have earned in his business during life and left as his estate at the time of his death, and which would have gone to his next of kin, taking into consideration his age, his reasonable probabilities of life, his ability and disposition to labor, and habits of living and expenditure.

Verdict for defendant.

MILLEMAN et al. v. KAVANAUGH et al.
(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

PARTNERSHIP—DEATH OF PARTNER—ACCOUNTING—SUIT BY CREDITORS.

The individual creditors of a deceased partner agreed with the surviving partner and the widow of the deceased, who was his administratrix, that the surviving partner should take the partnership property and pay the partnership debts, and pay the administrator whatever would be due the estate of the deceased partner. He also agreed to furnish the creditors of the partner with a statement of the amount paid. The creditors also made a subsequent agreement with the widow as an individual that, if the interest of the deceased's estate in the surplus, after payment of the debts, was insufficient to pay the individual debts, she would pay them with the profits from a new partnership between herself and the surviving partner. Thereafter the creditors who were not paid filed a bill against the administratrix and the new firm, and the corporation succeeding to it for an accounting with the second partnership. Held that, inasmuch as the creditors' remedy was against the widow as an individual, the bill was properly dismissed.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Butler County.

Bill by H. C. Milleman and J. C. Milleman against Mary S. Kavanaugh and others. From a decree dismissing the bill, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

J. D. Marshall, for appellants. W. H. Lusk and W. D. Brandon, for appellees.

FELL, J. The right which the plaintiffs seek to enforce by the bill filed arises from two agreements made under the following circumstances: William Kavanaugh had been one of three members of a partnership which had been dissolved by his death. Letters of administration on his estate had been granted to his widow, Mary S. Kavanaugh. One of the surviving partners proposed to purchase the property of the partnership; the purchase money to be applied to the payment of the partnership debts, and the balance, if there should be any, to be divided according to the interests of the partners. It was also proposed to form a new partnership, composed of the surviving partners and the widow of the deceased partner, to continue the business. The plaintiffs were creditors of the deceased partner, but not of the partnership, and their assent to the proposed method of closing the affairs of the partnership was desired. Both of the agreements are inartificially drawn, but their meaning is obvious. The first, signed by the plaintiffs and the surviving partner who purchased the property and paid the partnership debts, recites the terms of the purchase and his agreement to pay to the administratrix whatever should be due her husband's estate; and by it he agrees, at the completion of the settlement, to furnish the plaintiffs with a statement of the amounts paid with vouchers. To this method of winding up the partnership the plaintiffs agreed. The second agreement, dated one day after the first, is between the plaintiffs and Mrs. Kavanaugh, as an individual, and not as administratrix. It recites the terms of the sale, the purpose of the surviving partners and Mrs. Kavanaugh to form a new partnership, and by it she agrees that, if the interest of her husband's estate in the surplus after the payment of the partnership debts is not sufficient to discharge the debt of the plaintiffs, she will pay it with the profits she derives from the new partnership. The plaintiffs agree that they will not demand payment of her in any other manner. The bill is against the administratrix, the three members of the new partnership, and a corporation that succeeded to the business of the partnership. Its prayers are for a decree directing the partner who purchased the property and paid the debts of the first partnership to render a statement showing the amounts paid; for an account of the affairs of the second partnership, and a decree that it, pay the plaintiffs the amount due the estate of the deceased partner after the payment of partnership debts and Mrs. Kavanaugh's share of the profits; for a decree that Mrs. Kavanaugh transfer so much of the stock she holds of the corporation as may be required to pay the plaintiffs' claim; for the appointment of a receiver for the corporation. The demurrers are on the ground that the bill sets forth no ground of equitable relief, and that it is multifarious.

The purpose of the first agreement was to secure the consent of the plaintiffs to the sale of the partnership property, and its only effect is to estop them as creditors of a deceased partner from asserting that the price was inadequate, and that more could have been secured by the administratrix if the affairs of the partnership had been wound up and an account rendered by the surviving partners to the administratrix of the deceased partner. By the second agreement they secured an additional security in the personal obligation of Mrs. Kavanaugh to make up any deficiency out of the profits she should receive from the new partnership. She, and she alone, was to pay. The liquidating partner was not to pay them nor to pay her for their use, but to pay her as administratrix for distribution among all the creditors of her husband's estate. There was no substitution of the liability of the liquidating partner nor of the new firm for that of the estate of the deceased partner, nor were assets received by either under a promise to pay. The new partnership had not been formed when the agreement was made, and the only obligation assumed by the partner who purchased the property was to furnish an itemized account, with vouchers, after the settlement of the business of the partnership. It is not averred that the business has been settled, nor that an account has been demanded and refused. The bill shows no right except against one of the defendants, for a breach of her promise to pay the profits arising from the new partnership. The remedy for this at law is plain and adequate. It is unnecessary to consider the other ground of demurrer.

The decree is affirmed, at the cost of the appellant.

In re SOUTHWESTERN STATE NORMAL SCHOOL.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. DEDICATION—SALE ACCORDING TO PLAT.

Where a sale of lots is had according to a plat, on which streets and alleys are shown, it operates as a dedication of them to the public use, which cannot be revoked by the vendor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Dedication, §§ 46, 47.]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN — PUBLIC USE — NORMAL SCHOOLS.

Act July 10, 1901 (P. L. 632), authorizing the condemnation of real estate needed for the use of state normal schools, does not authorize such a school to condemn for a campus streets and alleys dedicated to public use.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Eminent Domain, § 110.]

Appeal from Superior Court.

In the matter of the Southwestern State Normal School. From an order dismissing the petition for approval of a bond, the school appeals to the superior court, and from an order affirming such judgment it again appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

T. F. Birch, for appellant. Norman E. Clark, W. S. Parker, and Winfield McIlvaine, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The facts in this case appear in the opinion of the superior court, 26 Pa. Super. Ct. 99, and need not be repeated here. In its petition to the court below, the Southwestern State Normal School set forth that a plot of 36 lots, known as "Morgan's Addition to California, Pa.," and recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds for Washington county, was lately laid out by Lewis W. Morgan, and lots were sold therefrom with reference to certain streets and alleys marked upon the said plan; that it had purchased twelve of these lots for campus purposes; that through them run Main street, 50 feet wide, and other streets and alleys of different widths, all being on the said plan; that after it had purchased these lots it proceeded to condemn the streets and alleys running through them and adjoining them on the north and south—and prayed, first, for the approval of its bond to secure to the owners of other lots on the plot, having rights of way or easements over the said streets and alleys, the damages sustained by its condemnation of them; and, second, that the title to the real estate, which it held within the boundaries described in its petition, be decreed to be free of any easement or right of way on account of the location of the said streets and alleys thereon, subject to the payment of such damages as may be agreed upon or assessed according to law. The petition was filed under the act of July 10, 1901 (P. L. 632), authorizing the condemnation of real estate needed for the use of state normal schools. Whether the act is invalid for the reason that the ground which it authorizes to be so taken is not for a public use is not the question raised in this proceeding. It is whether the appellant is authorized by the act to do what it has undertaken to do.

The sales of the lots according to the Morgan plan, which showed them to be on streets and alleys, implied a grant or covenant to each purchaser that the streets and alleys should be forever open to the use of the public, and operated as a dedication of them to public use. Such dedication cannot be revoked by the vendor, and the purchaser of each lot abutting on one of the streets or alleys, as well as all other persons purchasing and owning lots on the plan, may assert the public character of the streets and alleys, and the right of the public to use them. Transue v. Sell, 105 Pa. 604; In re Opening of Pearl Street, 111 Pa. 565, 5 Atl. 430; Quicksall v. Philadelphia, 177 Pa. 301, 35 Atl. 609. The finding of the court below is that Main street has been used by the public as well as the lot owners for over 21 years as a way of access to and from the Monongahela river. What the appellant seeks to do is, not to take land belonging to and in the use of a private owner, but is to condemn property already dedicated to public use and used by the public as public highways, and to devote the same to what it claims to be another public use. Property already devoted to public use, including franchises, is subject to eminent domain, and may be taken for other public uses; but, while this is true, it cannot be so taken without legislative authority expressly conferred or arising by necessary implication. Groff's Appeal, 128 Pa. 621, 18 Atl. 481. There is no such express power conferred upon the appellant by the act of 1901, and surely none exists by implication, in view of our cases upon power arising by implication. Of this power it is clearly and forcibly said by Mr. Justice Gordon: "This plea of necessity is so frequently used to cover infractions of both public and private rights that prima facie it is suspicious, and must be closely scrutinized, especially where it is used to carry corporate privileges beyond charter limits. This plea, in the first place, must be tested by the rule, now of universal acceptance, that all acts of incorporation, and acts extending corporate privileges, are to be construed most strongly against the companies setting them up, and that whatever is not unequivocally granted must be taken as withheld. This rule is to be held in all its rigor, where the attempt is so to construe a corporate grant as to interfere with a previous grant of the same kind. Packer v. Railroad Co., 19 Pa. 211. It is true that a franchise is property, and as such may be taken by a corporation having the right of eminent domain, but in favor of such right there can be no implication, unless it arises from a necessity so absolute that without it the grant itself will be defeated. It must, also, be a necessity that arises from the very nature of things, over which the corporation has no control. It must not be a necessity created by the company itself for its own convenience or for the sake of economy. To permit a necessity, such as this, to be used as an excuse for the interference with, or extinction of, previously granted franchises, would be to subject these important legislative grants to destruction on a mere pretense in fact at the will of the holder of the latest franchise." Pennsylvania Railroad Co.'s Appeal, 93 Pa. 150.

For the reason that the appellant has not been authorized to condemn the streets and alleys set forth in its petition, the decree of the superior court affirming the decree of the court below is affirmed, with costs to the appellee.

DILWORTH v. NICOLA.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—SALE OF INTEREST IN PROFITS—ASSIGNMENT.

Where plaintiff purchased a half interest in the profits of a real estate transaction, receiving a receipt for the money as his only evidence of such interest, he may by a bill in equity compel the other party to formally assign such share, though there could be no severance of interest until the transaction was closed, 25 years thereafter.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Bill by H. P. Dilworth against Frank F. Nicola. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, O. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

William Scott and Wm. M. Hall, for appellant. A. M. Imbrie and J. S. & E. G. Ferguson, for appellee.

ELKIN, J. On August 2, 1901, the appellant entered into an agreement with Mary E. Schenley for the purchase of certain property located in the city of Pittsburg for the sum of $2,000,000, payable $100,000 in cash on signing the agreement and the balance on April 1, 1902. The appellee paid one-tenth of the hand money, and took from appellant a receipt in the following language: "Received of H. P. Dilworth $10,000, being the tenth of hand money stipulated in agreement with Mary E. Schenley dated August 2, 1901, and being in payment of one-tenth interest in said agreement." On August 17th following the appellant sold and afterwards transferred the Schenley agreement to H. C. Frick, who agreed to perform the covenants thereof, take title to the property, refund all moneys expended by the appellant, including the $100,000 advanced, and, upon the final sale of the property, whatever money Frick had advanced to be repaid, together with interest thereon, and the balance was to be equally divided between the two parties. Frick subsequently entered into an agreement with the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to sell and convey said property for the sum of $2,850,000, to be paid on or before July 1, 1927, prior to which date the railroad company agreed to pay an annual rental of $99,750. At the time the agreement between Nicola and Frick was made, the interest of Dilworth in the transaction was not disclosed. It is, however, not denied that he is entitled to a one-tenth interest of Nicola in said transaction. The only evidence he has of his interest therein is the receipt above mentioned. This bill was filed in the court below asking for a decree requiring the defendant to execute and deliver to plaintiff a formal assignment of a tenth of his interest in the Frick agreement. Upon a hearing of the case the court below held that he was entitled to the relief prayed for, and entered a decree requiring the assignment to be made.

If it is the subject-matter of equitable jurisdiction, and of this there seems to be no doubt, the decree was properly entered. The appellant admits that the appellee is entitled to a one-tenth interest in the agreement, but contends that he cannot have it severed and set apart until the transaction is finally closed in 1927. We do not agree with this contention. If Dilworth has a tenth interest in the agreement, he is entitled to have some evidence of that interest at the present time. It would be inequitable and unjust that he should be compelled to wait until the final payments are made, 25 years in the future, before he has anything but the receipt to show his interest therein. It is argued that the provisions of the agreement with Frick are such as to make it impossible that there should be a severance of interests. This contention is without merit. The interest of Mr. Frick in the agreement is not affected by the rights and liabilities of the parties to this suit. Under the agreement Mr. Frick is authorized to collect the annual rentals from the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and apply them to the interest and advances made by him until July 1, 1927, at which time he is to collect the purchase money, and after reimbursing himself for his expenditures and advances he is to divide the remainder thereof between himself and Nicola. Dilworth assented to and is bound by that agreement, and is only entitled to receive a tenth of the profits which accrue to Nicola under the terms thereof. How, then, can Frick be injured by the interest that Dilworth has in the transaction? At all events, Frick is entitled to one-half, Nicola to nine-twentieths, and Dilworth to one-twentieth, of the profits. Then, again, the agreement provides that it is to be considered as if made between the parties, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns. It thus appears in the express language of the agreement itself that it is to apply to the assigns thereof. How, then, can Nicola be heard to say that Dilworth is not entitled to have a decree by a court of equity directing an assignment to be made of the interest which it is admitted he has in the transaction?

Decree affirmed, at the cost of the appellant.

COMMONWEALTH ex rel. UNDERWOOD v. SHRONTZ.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. ELECTIONS—QUALIFIED VOTERS—PAYMENT OF TAX.

Where property is actually owned by two members of a firm as tenants in common, but is assessed in the firm name, and the tax has been paid, each of such partners has paid a tax, qualifying each as an elector within the election law.

2. SAME—ERROR OF ASSESSOR.

Where an assessor erroneously assessed real estate in a firm name which in fact belongs to two members of the firm as tenants in common, and the taxes are paid, the error in the form of assessment cannot deprive the electors of their constitutional right to vote, based on the payment of a tax.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Washington County.

Quo warranto by the commonwealth, on relation of Owen C. Underwood, against John F. Shrontz, Jr. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John F. Shrontz, Jr., is a native-born citizen of the United States, 26 years old, and has resided with his father continuously in the Fifth Ward of the borough of Washington, Pa., for more than three years last past. At the borough election held February 21, 1905, he was elected to the office of councilman of the Fifth Ward. On the day of the election his right to vote was challenged on the ground that he had not paid a state or county tax within two years next preceding the day of the election. The election board, after a hearing on the question, accepted his ballot. The receipt which the respondent produced before the election board as written evidence of his having paid the required tax was in words and figures as follows:

|--|---------------------------------|
| No. 1409. | Washington, Pa. Aug. 1, 1904. |
| Treasurer's Office, Washington County. | |
| B'd Debt $1 30 | Received from Shrontz Bros. |
| County Tax 7 50 | State and County tax for 5 ward |
| | Wash. township for 1904 as per |
| Total 9 10 | margin. |
| Abatement 45 | W. H. Ulery |
| | County Treasurer |
| Amt rec'd 8 65 | Per M. |

What oral evidence was produced before the election board we have no way of knowing, but it was conceded that respondent was one of the owners of the property and a member of the firm of Shrontz Bros. against whom the tax was assessed. On August 1, 1904, the respondent's father, being duly authorized thereto by the respondent and his brother, Clark Shrontz, paid the state and county taxes assessed against the said lot for and on behalf of the respondent and his brother. The court entered judgment for defendant on the commonwealth's demurrer to defendant's answer.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

T. F. Birch, Owen C. Underwood, Dist. Atty., Parker, McIlvaine & Clark, and Donnans & Brownson, for appellant. James P. Eagleson and Boyd & E. E. Crumrine, for appellee.

MITCHELL, C. J. On the admitted facts the appellee was a qualified elector, entitled to vote at the election, and therefore eligible to office. He was a natural-born citizen, upwards of 21 years of age, and, having regard to the substance of the qualification by payment of a tax, he had complied with that requirement. The appellant argues that there was a defect in the form of the assessment which destroyed its efficacy. The tax was assessed against certain property in the name of Shrontz Bros., but it was admitted that Shrontz Bros. were the appellee and his brother, who were owners as tenants in common of the land assessed. It also appeared that this fact was known to the assessor and was intended to be truly set forth in the assessment. Even without this, however, the conclusion would have been the same. No error of the assessor, accidental or otherwise, could deprive an elector of his right, if in fact he was qualified. The distinction is well taken by the learned judge that the appellee's vote might have been properly refused at the election because he was not armed with the proper evidence of his right; but in a judicial inquiry into the existence of the right the court is not debarred from ascertaining the actual facts no matter what the prima facie case presented by the tax receipt. The Constitution regards substance, not mere form. It makes no requirement that the tax shall be assessed against the elector by name, or personally, or as owner of property in severalty. If it is against ascertained property, and he, being in fact the owner, pays it, the requirement is fulfilled. As the learned judge below said, if the assessment had been in the names of John F. Shrontz, Jr., and Clark Shrontz individually as tenants in common, there could have been no question about the tax payment, and if the expression Shrontz Bros. in fact meant the same thing the result would be the same. A blunder of the assessor in the form of the assessment could not deprive the elector of his constitutional right.

Catlin v. Smith, 2 Serg. & R. 267, is cited as deciding that the tax must be assessed against the elector individually. That expression is used in the case, but in an entirely different sense from that now sought to be given to it. That was an action against the inspector of an election for refusing the plaintiff's vote. Under the Constitution of 1790 the requirement was that the elector should have paid a tax "which shall have been assessed at least six months before the election." On demurrer to the declaration it appeared that the tax had been laid on the county six months before, but that plaintiff had not been assessed until the day before the election when he had himself put on the list by the assessor and paid the tax. The court held the payment insufficient. The plaintiff, said Tilghman, C. J., "insists that the Constitution intends a tax laid and assessed on property and persons in general at least six months before the election. But this will not accord either with the sense in which the words had been generally used or with the reason for introducing them into the Constitution. The voter is to have paid the tax assessed, not upon others, but himself. A tax assessed upon others is no tax as to him." That is the sense in which the words "assessed upon him individually" were used. There is nothing in that case that touches the question raised now.

Judgment affirmed.

KELLY v. KEYS et al.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. EJECTMENT—TITLE TO MAINTAIN.

Where plaintiff acquired the exclusive privilege to go on land to prospect and mine for oil, the grantor to receive part of the oil mined, he acquires no estate in the land or oil, but is a mere licensee, and cannot maintain ejectment against the grantor, or those claiming under him by a subsequent grant, if he has never been in possession, though at the time of the ejectment oil was being produced in paying quantities.

2. MINES AND MINERALS—GRANT TO MINE FOR OIL—CONSTRUCTION.

Where a grant of an exclusive right to mine for and produce oil has been executed, and oil has been discovered, it is the grantee's right to produce and sever it from the soil, and the oil thus severed belongs to the parties entitled under the terms of the grant as a chattel, and not as a part of the real estate, and only so much as is thus produced and severed passes on the grant.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Washington County.

Action by W. C. Kelly against A. M. Keys and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Eugene Mackey, R. W. Irwin, Isaac Baum, James W. Lee, Cornelius D. Scully, and Ralph R. Lee, for appellants. Samuel Am-spoker, John M. Buchanan, and Arthur E. Barnett, for appellee.

STEWART, J. The defendant Keys, being the owner of a certain tract of land in Washington county, by instrument in writing, duly executed and acknowledged, granted to Kelly, the plaintiff, the exclusive right to mine and produce therefrom petroleum and natural gas, with possession of so much of the land as might be necessary for such purposes, for a term of two years, subject to certain conditions and stipulations which do not here call for recital. Kelly never exercised any rights under the grant, and never entered into possession of any part of the premises. Subsequently Keys, claiming that by reason of a default Kelly had forfeited his rights under the grant, conveyed a like right in the premises to O. D. Greenlee and the Southern Oil Company, the other defendants, who proceeded to explore the property and succeeded in producing oil therefrom in paying quantity. Kelly, averring compliance on his part with all the conditions and stipulations of the grant under which he claimed, and denying a forfeiture, brought this action of ejectment against the defendants to compel surrender of possession to himself. The action resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the decision of the court on a question reserved, viz., whether ejectment in such case would lie. Upon consideration, judgment was rendered upon the reserved point in favor of the plaintiff. The assignment of error that relates to the action of the court on this point is the only one that calls for present consideration.

In reaching his conclusion on the point reserved, the learned judge gave full recognition to the binding authority of Funk v. Haldeman, 53 Pa. 229, and the cases that follow it, wherein it is held that the grant of exclusive privileges to go on land for the purpose of prospecting for oil, the grantor to receive part of the oil mined, as in this case, does not vest in the grantee any estate in the land or oil, but is merely a license or grant of an incorporeal hereditament. This court has found frequent occasion to assert its continued adherence to the doctrine of these cases. Only recently, in the case of Hicks v. American Natural Gas Company, 207 Pa. 570, 57 Atl. 55, 65 L. R. A. 209, it reasserted it without qualification. Once it was determined that the subject of such a grant was an incorporeal hereditament, and not an estate in the land or oil, it logically and necessarily resulted that it would not support an action in ejectment. And this view has been steadily adhered to. In no case has ejectment been sustained under such a grant, except where possession had been acquired by the grantee and he had been wrongfully dispossessed. In the present case disseisin was not, and could not be, asserted. Nor could it be contended that the instrument under which Kelly claimed, though spoken of as a lease, and so denominated in the instrument itself, is in point of fact and law a lease, notwithstanding it allows possession of so much of the surface of the premises as may be necessary to conduct mining operations. This much will be implied without express stipulation; and the stipulation, being expressed, in no way distinguishes this from the cases where such an instrument is held to be merely a grant or license. The court below put no other construction on this, so long as it concerned no one but grantor or grantee; but because the defendants, holding under a subsequent lease, being in possession, had produced and were producing oil in paying quantity, he reached the conclusion that what had been the grant of an incorporeal hereditament, now that the oil had been found and was being produced, was an estate in the land, since oil was a mineral, and therefore part of the land, and that, Kelly being entitled to be put in possession of so much of the estate, ejectment could be brought for such purpose.

This line of argument overlooks the very consideration on which the authorities cited rest. In no case is it held that the grant of an exclusive right to mine for and produce oil, though it be a mineral, is a sale of the oil that may afterward be discovered. When under such a grant oil has been discovered, it is the grantee's right to produce it and sever it from the soil. So much as is thus severed belongs to the parties entitled under the terms of the grant, not as any part of the real estate, however, but as a chattel, and only so much as is produced and severed passes under the grant. As to oil not produced there is no change of property. It is expressly so ruled in Funk v. Haldeman, 53 Pa. 229; and the same ruling was repeated and emphasized in the case next following on the same subject. Dark v. Johnston, 55 Pa. 164, 93 Am. Dec. 732. These were the first cases in which grants of rights to explore for oil were considered and passed upon by this court. The rulings therein have been steadily and consistently followed. In this connection it is only necessary to refer to the case of Union Petroleum Company v. Bliven Petroleum Co., 72 Pa. 173, where the grant was the same as in the present case, with the additional fact that there, as here, oil had actually been discovered and was being produced, and Barnhart v. Lockwood, 152 Pa. 82, 25 Atl. 237. The reason for the rule thus established, is to be found in the peculiar character of mineral oil. This is very clearly indicated in the earlier cases, where the distinction is drawn between minerals which are fugacious in their nature, such as water, gas, and oil, and those which have a fixed situs and are necessarily part of the land; and this distinction has been allowed with controlling significance whenever oil in situ has been the subject of the dispute. Both rule and reason are against the theory that prevailed with the court below, to the effect that, the mineral once discovered, all that was in situ became in law part of the real estate.

With the rights of the appellee thus defined and limited by the cases cited above, it is manifest, without discussion, that he is in no position to maintain ejectment for the property. The question reserved was to this very point, and was raised in the first point submitted by the defendant, denying plaintiff's right to ejectment. The latter should have been affirmed. Its refusal is the subject of the eighth assignment of error, which must be sustained. It is unnecessary to consider the other assignments of error.

Judgment reversed, and judgment is directed to be entered on the point reserved in favor of defendant non obstante veredicto.

MANKEY v. STOCKING et al.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

ARREST—IN CIVIL CASES—BOND—ACTION ON.

On a judgment for slander, a capias ad satisfaciendum was issued, and with the consent of plaintiff's counsel defendant gave bond, as required by Act June 16, 1836 (P. L. 729), to take the benefit of the insolvency law, but did not give the bond provided by Act June 4, 1901 (P. L. 404), and thereafter, without the objection of plaintiff's counsel, took the benefits of the act of 1836. Held, that the surety on the bond was not liable in an action by plaintiff on the ground that the act of 1836 had been repealed by the act of 1901 and that the proceedings were void, as, if they were void, the bond was also void.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Washington County.

Action by Grace Mankey against H. L. Stocking and James S. Stocking. From an order refusing rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

62 A.—58

The following is the opinion of McIlvaine, P. J., in the court below:

"On January 24, 1904, the plaintiff in this case in an action of slander in this court obtained a judgment for $6,200 against H. L. Stocking. On June 28, 1904, the said H. L. Stocking, having been arrested on a capias ad satisfaciendum issued on this judgment, secured his temporary release by giving to Grace Mankey, the plaintiff, a bond in the sum of $10,000, with James S. Stocking as surety. This bond was approved by the prothonotary and filed to the number and term to which the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum was docketed. After its approval the prothonotary gave the sheriff a written notice to discharge the defendant, 'as he has filed a bond sec. leg.' The condition of this bond was 'that if the said H. L. Stocking shall appear at the next term of the court of common pleas of said county and then and there present his petition for the benefit of the insolvent laws of this commonwealth and comply with all the requirements of said law and abide all the orders of the said court in that behalf, or in default thereof and if he fail in obtaining his discharge as an insolvent debtor he shall surrender himself to the jail of the said county, then this obligation to be void; otherwise, of force.' 'The insolvent laws of the commonwealth,' at the date of the execution of this bond, were found either in the enactments of an act of assembly approved June 16, 1836 (P. L. 729), or in an act of assembly approved June 4, 1901 (P. L. 404). The act of June 4, 1901, in section 42 (page 422), provides among other things, for the repeal of the act of June 16, 1836 (P. L. 729), except sections 42-45, none of which related to the matter now before this court. The Congress of the United States in the year 1898 enacted a bankrupt law in which provision for the discharge of insolvents is made, and it is still in force.

"By reason of the doubt existing as to whether the act of 1901 would become operative so long as the national bankrupt law of 1898 remained on the statute books (see Potts v. Smith Mfg. Co., 25 Pa. Super. Ct. 206), the defendant H. L. Stocking evidently gave a bond under and containing the conditions provided for in the act of 1836, and this must have been done with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff's attorney, who objected to a previous bond offered because not given to the plaintiff as provided in the act of 1836. H. L. Stocking, in giving a bond, and in attempting to comply with the conditions of this bond, to wit, 'that he should appear at the next term of the court of common pleas of said county and then and there present his petition for the benefit of "the insolvent laws of the commonwealth,"' had necessarily to determine before he acted what then were 'the insolvent laws of the commonwealth'; and the form of the bond agreed upon after consultation with the plaintiff's counsel clearly indicates that the parties treated the act of 1901 as inoperative, for, if they had thought it was operative, then they would have treated the act of 1836 as having been repealed, and the form of the bond would have been different, and it would have been given under the direction of the court, as is provided for by the fifth section (page 407) of the act of 1901.

"H. L. Stocking, in accordance with the expressed condition of his bond, appeared at the next term of the court of common pleas (August term) and on August 15th (the first day of the term) presented his petition, praying for the benefit of the insolvent laws of the commonwealth, as provided in the act of 1836. The court adjudging the petition to be in proper form, entertained jurisdiction of its subject-matter (evidently under the act of 1836) and made the following order: 'And now, August 15, 1904, the within petition presented in open court and directed to be filed, and Monday, September 19, next, at 10 o'clock fixed as the time for hearing the same in open court; 15 days' notice of the time and place of hearing to be given by the petitioner to his creditors.' Notice of this hearing was given Grace Mankey by handing to her attorney—who had issued the capias, and who had objected to the first bond and had required another bond—a copy of this order of the court. On September 19, 1904, none of the creditors of H. L. Stocking (all of whom had been served with notice) entered an appearance, and on September 20, 1904, on motion of the attorney of H. L. Stocking, made in open court, the court, after asking if there was any one present who objected, made the following order on the said H. L. Stocking's petition: 'And now, September 20, 1904, this case came on for further hearing, and thereupon it is ordered and decreed that the said H. L. Stocking is hereby discharged from further liability for or on account of the capias issued at No. ——— term, 1904; that the said H. L. Stocking shall not at any time hereafter be liable to imprisonment by reason of any judgment or decree obtained for the payment of money contracted, accrued, or occasioned and due before the date of this order.' The attorney for the writ of capias was present when this order was made, and offered no objection to its being made, neither did he appear nor in any way express his consent to such an order being made. It can be fairly inferred, from the suit that was afterwards brought on the bond and the statement that has been filed, that he was silent because he was willing for the defendant in the capias to bring about conditions, as he thought, that would forfeit the bond of the defendant, which would be more benefit to his client than to prevent his discharge and secure his surrender to the custody of the sheriff again.

"On December 18, 1904, suit was brought by Grace Mankey on the bond given on June 28, 1904, and the statement filed by her attorneys avers that there has been a breach of the condition of the bond, in that the said petition of H. L. Stocking presented to the court of common pleas, and all proceedings thereon, are absolutely null and void, and that the surety on said bond of the said H. L. Stocking is liable for the penal sum of said bond, because the regulations of the act of assembly of June 4, 1901 (P. L. 404), had not been complied with. The surety on said bond appeared, and filed an affidavit of defense, and avers, in substance: First, that H. L. Stocking was discharged by this court, and that thereby the conditions of his bond were satisfied; second, that the bond, if taken as given under the act of 1901, is void in toto, as it contains conditions different than those required by that act, and that it was taken for the use of the plaintiff alone and not all of the defendant's creditors, and was not taken under the direction of the court; third, that the act of 1901 was not in force when the bond was given, by reason of the existence of the national bankrupt act of 1898. The plaintiff now moves for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense. The facts in this case are not disputed, and the whole defense can be summed up by saying that the plaintiff's statement fails to show a good cause of action.

"To our minds it is evident that the bond in this case was filed under the provisions of the act of June 18, 1836, and as the plaintiff's counsel wanted the bond taken in the name of the plaintiff and not the commonwealth, and made no suggestion that the court ought to fix the security, he evidently acquiesced in the filing of such a bond, and the temporary discharge of the defendant by order of the prothonotary. The first question, then, that suggests itself in this: Can the plaintiff now claim that all the steps taken by H. L. Stocking under that bond are void because not in accordance with the provision of the act of 1901, and still the bond be good against the surety? To make the claim that all the proceedings taken by the defendant should have been under the act of 1901, is the counsel not in danger of being 'hoisted by his own petard'? If the act of 1836, as to the manner that the insolvent is to proceed, is no longer in force, is it in force as to the form of the bond and the manner in which it is to be given, and, if not, is not the bond given by the defendant just as null and void as any other step that he took in the proceeding to be relieved from imprisonment? It cannot be pretended, under all the facts of the case as they are made to appear in the affidavit of claim and the affidavit of defense, that the bond given was 'the security for his appearance, surrender and compliance with the decrees of the court and the requirements of the act of 1901 such as the court might deem requisite.' The court never saw the bond. It never deemed $10,000 the required sum in which the bond should be given, or that James S. Stocking was a good and sufficient surety. We are therefore of the opinion that the plaintiff cannot blow hot and cold. If the proceedings taken by H. L. Stocking under the act of 1836 to be relieved from arrest as an insolvent are void because taken under that act and not under the act of 1901, then they are wholly void, which would include the giving of the bond as given; and, if the bond is void, then no recovery can be had on it.

"I know there is a class of cases which are authority for the contention that an obligor of a bond given in a proceeding of this kind cannot be relieved from his obligation because of a slight difference between the condition in his bond voluntarily given and that required by an act of assembly, or on account of some irregularity for which he is wholly responsible. But that is not the case at bar. The bond filed by H. L. Stocking, now sued upon, was taken in the name of the plaintiff, as provided in the act of 1836, at the suggestion of her counsel, who objected to the first bond because it was taken in the name of the commonwealth; and the face of the bond itself, and the circumstances under which it was given, was notice to the counsel for the plaintiff that the bond was not the one required by the fifth section of the act of 1901. He knew, or should have known, that H. L. Stocking's counsel were acting under the act of 1836, and treating the act of 1901 as inoperative, and he at least passively acquiesced in the action taken by Stocking to obtain, not only his temporary, but his final, discharge. In other words, the bond in question, when given (and as understood by both the obligee and obligors), meant by the words, to wit, 'the insolvent laws of the commonwealth,' and 'with all the requisition of said laws,' the act of 1836, and not the act of 1901. If, then, the defendant complied with the conditions of his bond by complying with 'all the requisitions of the act of 1836,' and was discharged by the court as an insolvent debtor, how can the plaintiff aver a breach of the condition of the bond because he did not comply with the requisitions of the act of 1901, and say that what he did in complying with the conditions of the bond given under and to comply with the terms of the act of 1836 is 'wholly null and void,' without also saying that the bond which was given to compel him either to do what he did or pay $10,000 is also void? The facts before us certainly make a very different case from those cited in the very exhaustive and able brief of the plaintiff's counsel to show that a bond given by an applicant for the benefits of the insolvent laws of the commonwealth is often held to be valid, even though it may not strictly conform to the requirements of the law as to the manner of giving it or in its conditions. We are therefore of the opinion that if the act of 1836 was repealed, and the act of 1901 was in force when the bond was given, and 'all proceedings thereon' taken by the court at the instance of the defendant in his endeavor to comply with the conditions of the bond 'are absolutely null and void,' then the said bond was also wholly null and void, and the prothonotary's direction to the sheriff to discharge the defendant unauthorized, because he had not 'given a bond "sec. leg.,"' and the plaintiff's remedy was either against the prothonotary for directing the discharge of the defendant until he had given a bond sec. leg., or to appear and resist the final discharge of the defendant and secure his surrender to the sheriff, or to issue an alias capias ad satisfaciendum.

"This brings us to the consideration of another question, and that is the order of discharge made by the court on September 20, 1904. It is certain that the court is given jurisdiction to discharge an insolvent debtor who may have been arrested on a capias ad satisfaciendum, and this is so under both the act of 1836 and the act of 1901, and it had jurisdiction to determine, at the date of the hearing, whether the act of 1901 was inoperative by reason of the national bankrupt act of Congress passed in 1898 and the act of 1836 still in force; and, although no opinion is filed, it must be taken that the court duly considered all questions involved, and after having done so found that the defendant had complied with the requirements necessary to entitle him to a discharge, and thereupon discharged him. If the bond was valid and binding on the defendant, it certainly was the duty of the court, on September 20, 1904, to determine whether he had so fully complied with the conditions thereof as to entitle him to a final discharge from imprisonment on the capias, or whether his failure to comply with these conditions was such that he ought (to avoid paying the penalty of his bond) to surrender himself to the custody of the sheriff to again meet the demands of the capias ad satisfaciendum. The court said: 'You have complied with the conditions of your bond. You can go, and you need not surrender yourself to the sheriff.' The plaintiff now wants the penalty of the bond because the plaintiff did not surrender himself to the sheriff—a thing the court in legal effect told him he need not do. The plaintiff's counsel, who issued the capias, had full notice that this decree would be asked for, was present in court when it was made, and has never taken exceptions to the same nor an appeal therefrom. If the decree was simply voidable or reversible, that fact can be adjudged only on appeal or certiorari, and cannot be set up here. If, on the other hand, the decree was wholly null and void, and all the defendant did to secure his discharge from the grip of the capias was done without authority of law, and this case comes under the class of cases of which Tenan v. Cain, 188 Pa. 242, 41 Atl. 594, cited by counsel, and Insurance Co. v. Tenan, 204 Pa. 332, 54 Atl. 172, are examples, then as we have already said, everything that the defendant did under the act of 1836 was wholly null and void, including the giving of the bond which he gave to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff cannot recover for the breach of a bond that is wholly void. Suit on the bond, under such circumstances, would not be his remedy. It would be to take a new start and issue an alias capias. In other words, if the plaintiff would issue an alias capias on this judgment, and the defendant would set up the decree of September 20, 1904, as a bar against a second arrest, the plaintiff could reply that the bond and all proceedings thereon were wholly void (not voidable or reversible); and if the court found this to be so, and made such a decree as was made in Insurance Co. v. Tenan, 204 Pa. 332, 54 Atl. 172, then the defendant would have to give a proper bond and pursue the proper proceeding de novo to be discharged. In saying this we do not want to be taken as indicating that the court thinks the decree of September 20, 1904, wholly void. We were simply assuming that what the plaintiff claims as to this decree, under the authority of Tenan v. Cain, was correct, and then suggesting the result on certain contingencies. Our opinion, however, is that the decree of September 20, 1904, at most is only reversible by a higher court on appeal on account of error of judgment committed by the court below, and not on account of such a total want of jurisdiction in the court below as would make its decree 'void and of no legal effect,' as was the judgment in the case of Tenan v. Cain, 188 Pa. 242, 41 Atl. 594, and Ins. Co. v. Tenan, 204 Pa. 332, 54 Atl. 172.

"And now, July 12, 1905, rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense discharged."

DOLLAR SAVINGS FUND & TRUST CO. v. PITTSBURG PLATE GLASS CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. CORPORATIONS—STOCK CERTIFICATES.

Any one taking a stock certificate, showing on its face that it will not be valid unless countersigned by a transfer agent, without the signature of such agent, takes it at his peril.

2. SAME—FORGED SIGNATURE—NEGLIGENCE.

Plaintiff lent money on a certificate of stock on which the signature of the transfer agent was forged. It appeared that, after the certificate had been signed by the president and secretary and the seal of the corporation was attached, a clerk who had access to it took it and forged the name of the transfer agent. Held, that the certificate was not valid in the hands of such person, as against the company, on the ground of its negligence.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Action by the Dollar Savings Fund & Trust Company against the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company. Judgment for defendant on demurrer, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of McClung, J., in the court below:

"In the present discussion we must, of course, take as absolutely true every fact well pleaded in the statement, and must also draw therefrom every reasonable inference which a jury might draw in plaintiff's favor. The sixth cause of demurrer is properly criticised as 'speaking' because it involves an inference of fact against the averments of the declaration, and hence we disregard it. Allowing plaintiff every legitimate advantage, we should regard him as averring that the wrong done in issuing the stock certificate was done by C. H. Alward, a clerk or ordinary employé of defendant company. To assume that the certificate was abstracted and Carr's name signed by an outsider would be against plaintiff, because as to such party the responsibility of defendant for his acts would not be as great as it would be for those of an employé. On the other hand, if Alward occupied a higher position, with higher and greater powers with respect to the issue of these stocks, whereby defendant's responsibility for his acts was increased, it was plaintiff's duty to aver these facts in his narr., and this he has not done. We cannot fall in with plaintiff's contention that the name, 'Union Trust Company of Pittsburgh,' printed in the forms with a blank for the signature of the proper officer, is a signature by the trust company without having the blank filled. We take it that the necessity for the signature of some officer is well known in such cases, and plaintiff certainly never looked upon the Carr signature as surplusage. We may treat Carr as the proper officer of the company, because otherwise plaintiff is in no better condition, in that he has not even a pretended signature of the party who was to countersign.

"We are, then, to deal with the following as admitted facts, viz.: (1) The defendant company caused the certificate for 75 shares of stock to be signed by its president and secretary, and the seal of the corporation attached, and left it where Alward, a clerk, had access to it, and could and did take it out of the book, sign the name of Carr in its proper place, thus making it apparently complete, and then transferred it to Lillian K. Alward, who, by pledging it to plaintiff, obtained a large sum of money. (2) This certificate contained, below the signatures of the president and secretary and above the seal, the following, viz.: 'This certificate will not be valid unless countersigned by the Union Trust Company of Pittsburgh, registrar of transfers.' (3) Although the defendant company was notified some months before it was pledged to plaintiff that this certificate had been taken from the book and had not been registered, it did not advertise this fact, nor in any way attempt to warn persons to whom it might be offered for sale or as collateral security. If plaintiff prove all these facts, will she have a case which the court will submit to the jury? We assume that, if these certificates are binding upon defendant as between it and plaintiff, there can be a recovery here of damages either to the amount of the loan or the value of the stock. We need not now concern ourselves as to this.

"Plaintiff contends: (1) That the certificates are valid and binding without countersigning by the registrar; or (2) that, if not, then a jury would legally be justified in finding the defendant guilty of such negligence in dealing with the certificate as to estop it from repudiating it, even if Carr's name was forged by Alward or by his procurement.

"Act June 24, 1895 (P. L. 258), provides that any stockholder of a corporation shall be entitled to receive a certificate of the number of shares standing to his credit on the books, 'which certificate shall be signed by the president or vice president or other officer designated by the board of directors, countersigned by the treasurer and sealed with the common seal of the corporation.' This, however, does not prevent the corporation, if it is willing to give such certificates, from taking such further precautions as it sees fit, to provide against the simulation of such signatures; and if a party who receives a certificate signed and sealed as provided by the act of assembly is at the same time given express notice that the certificate is not good and will not be recognized as a certificate until it has another signature, such party cannot then pay money for such stock and claim that the company is in equity estopped to deny the validity of the certificate, and bound to recognize the party as a stockholder or to pay him damages, if the certificate was in fact fraudulently or improperly issued. In the present case, the notice of this requirement was right on the face of the certificate and preceded the seal of the corporation. It matters not that the good effects of the additional precaution may in this particular case have been nullified, by its leading to the sealing and signing by president and treasurer in blank. The fact still remains that this was not a complete certificate until it had the signature of the Union Trust Company, or practically the signature of James S. Carr. His signature was just as necessary to the completion of the certificate as was the signature of either the president or the secretary.

"This brings us to the main question in the case, viz.: Whether or not the proof of the fact that the president and secretary signed this certificate and sealed it and left it where it could be taken by an employé, and it was so taken, and James S. Carr's signature forged, and the certificate pledged for money advanced by plaintiff, would present such a case as would make it proper to submit to a jury the question of fact as to whether or not defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of plaintiff's loss. We take it that upon the presentation of such a case it would be the duty of the court to say that, even assuming negligence on the part of defendant in dealing with the certificate, the proximate cause of the loss was the failure of plaintiff to verify the signatures to the paper—a duty which rested on it. All the cases show that it is only when a party holds a certificate, to which is attached the genuine signatures of the parties who must sign to make it good, that the question arises as to whether or not the company is liable to him because of negligence, when the certificate is in fact false by reason of having been improperly or fraudulently issued. The doctrine is stated thus in Allen v. South Boston Ry. Co., 150 Mass. 200, 22 N. E. 917, 5 L. R. A. 716, 15 Am. St. Rep. 185, viz.: 'The ground upon which a corporation is held liable to a bona fide purchaser for value of false certificate of its stock issued under its seal signed by the proper officers and apparently genuine, is that the certificates are statements by the corporation of facts which it is its duty to know, and which cannot well be known to the purchasers.' So in Railway Co. v. Citizens' National Bank, 56 Ohio St. 351, 47 N. E. 249, 43 L. R. A. 777, and Railroad Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 30, the obligation of the purchaser to make inquiry as to the genuineness of the signatures is recognized, and it is only when the signatures are found to be genuine that the duty of the company to stand by its representations comes into play, or that its duty to the purchaser to take care as to the issue of the certificate arises.

"These three cases are cited and relied upon by plaintiff: Even the cases of strictly negotiable instruments, where such changes are made in the instrument as to amount to the crime of forgery, and the maker is held liable because he signed negotiable paper in such form as to readily admit of fraudulent alteration, all assume the genuineness of the signature and do not even suggest that any business man owes to another the duty of seeing that a third party does not forge his signature to an instrument of writing. See Zimmerman v. Rote, 75 Pa. 188; Garrard v. Haddan, 67 Pa. 82, 5 Am. Rep. 412; McSparan v. Neeley, 91 Pa. 17. The case of Robb v. Penna. Co., 186 Pa. 456, 40 Atl. 969, 65 Am. St. Rep. 868, does not aid plaintiff, because in that case no one even suggests liability on the part of the ostensible drawer of the check, save upon the assumption that the rubber stamp signature was his genuine signature. Until the plaintiff shows a certificate, to which are attached the genuine signatures of all the parties whose signatures are necessary to its validity, he is not even entitled to enter the lists where the contest as to the negligence of the company is to be fought out. When he has such signatures, he may well say that it is the company's business, not his, to know whether or not its officers used the money received for the stock honestly or dishonestly, or whether or not there was an overissue, or whether the issue of this certificate was in fact without authority, or whether it was by negligence put into circulation unintentionally.

"In the present case, if the certificate had been signed by the president and secretary and sealed and left with Carr, and he had signed it without authority and issued it fraudulently, the company would doubtless be bound to recognize its validity, or if Alward had obtained Carr's genuine signature the result would be the same. But the duty to ascertain the genuineness of the signatures, or the risk of acting without inquiry as to this, rests upon the purchaser, and when he neglects this duty or assumes this risk he has no standing to show negligent conduct on the part of defendant, or any conduct not amounting to an adoption of the forged signature as his own. Possibly if this certificate purporting to have Carr's signature attached had been put upon the market by an officer of defendant company, such as the president and secretary, who, in dealing with the issue of stock, must be regarded as the company, it would be estopped; but we do not have such a case. That 'where one of two innocent persons must suffer from the fault of a third, the loss must be borne by the one whose negligence enabled the third person to commit the fraud' is a generalization sanctioned by use for considerably more than a century; but, like many another excellent rule, its application calls for discretion and discrimination, and when plaintiff falls in a duty of care which he owes to himself, fully as imperative as any owed to him by defendant, and thus, and thus alone, brings himself within the scope of the effects of defendant's negligence, he cannot be heard to say that defendant's negligence, and not his own, was the proximate cause of his loss.

"Nor can it with any propriety be said that one who simply leaves a paper where his employé may complete it by forging a signature is estopped to deny the genuineness of the signature as against one whose duty it was to satisfy himself as to such signature. We cannot see that defendant is estopped by failure to give notice of the fact that a certificate not fully executed had disappeared. Plaintiff is again met by its own failure to take care on its own behalf. Failure to give notice could not make good a certificate void for want of a necessary signature. The authorities cited by plaintiff are simply to the effect, that, when a negotiable instrument is in the hands of some unknown person who cannot recover it, the proper course for the maker to pursue is to attempt to give such notice that it cannot come into the hands of a purchaser without notice, and thus prevent him from setting up his defense. This is only incidental advice, as so common sense a proceeding does not need the sanction of a court's judgment.

"The conclusions arrived at by us are sustained by many cases, amongst them the following, viz.: Penna. Co. for Ins. on Lives, etc., v. Franklin Fire Ins. Co., 181 Pa. 40, 87 Atl. 191, 87 L. R. A. 780; Hill v. Jewett Publishing Co., 154 Mass. 172, 28 N. E. 142, 18 L. R. A. 193, 28 Am. St. Rep. 230; Knox v. Eden Musee Co., 148 N. Y. 441, 42 N. E. 988, 31 L. R. A. 779, 51 Am. St. Rep. 700; Maas et al. v. M. K. & T. Ry. Co., 83 N. Y. 223.

We are of the opinion that the demurrer to the statement of plaintiff should be sustained."

WRIGHT v. MONONGAHELA ST. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

STREET RAILROADS—COLLISION—EVIDENCE.

In an action against a street railroad company for injuries caused to plaintiff by collision between a car of defendant and the team which plaintiff was driving, evidence held to authorize entry of nonsuit.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Action by Mary G. Wright against the Monongahela Street Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of Kennedy, P. J., in the court below:

"This is an action of trespass for the recovery of damages for injuries resulting to the plaintiff, as claimed by her, through the negligence of the defendant company. The accident occurred on September 24, 1901, on Forbes street, in the city of Pittsburgh, and she claims that the accident, and the resulting injury to herself, was caused by the negligence of the defendant company in the management of its car by the motorman. It appears from the testimony that while the car of the defendant company was approaching the vehicle in which the plaintiff was riding, and while it was yet several hundred feet away, the horse drawing the vehicle was observed to rear once and then proceed on its way without further rearing or plunging until it reached the car of the defendant company, and that then it jumped immediately in front of or against it, and the plaintiff was thrown from the vehicle and injured. There is nothing in the testimony which indicated that the driver of the vehicle had lost control of the horse. It is true that one of the witnesses, a boy of 14 years, testified that the horse was jumping; but there is nothing to show that he made more than one plunge before reaching the car, and that while it was a long way distant. The testimony seems to be plain that after this first and only plunge the horse proceeded on its way under control of the driver until it reached the car, and jumped immediately in front of or against it. We do not think that the motorman could be held guilty of negligence, unless the horse was acting in such a way as to indicate to him (the motorman) that the driver had lost control of him, or was likely to do so, and that at a sufficient distance to make it possible for the motorman to avoid the accident. The one plunge or rearing of the horse at the great distance from the car was not sufficient to indicate to the motorman that the driver had lost control of it. To so indicate, the demonstration must be continued as he approached the car. A number of witnesses, called on behalf of the plaintiff, saw the accident, and if more than one plunge or demonstration had been made by the horse, indicating a want of control by the driver, it would certainly have been seen and testified to by some of the witnesses. While the boy stated that the horse did some more jumping, there was nothing in his testimony that would indicate that the driver lost control of him, and all the other witnesses state that the horse proceeded up the street, approaching the car in the usual way, and at a moderate rate of speed.

"The rule to show cause why the judgment of nonsuit should not be taken off must be discharged. It is so ordered."

SPANGLER v. BALTIMORE & O. R. CO.
(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT.

Where plaintiff's husband, an employé of defendant railroad company, was killed in a collision while on an engine of the company, and the accident was caused by the violation by fellow servants of the rules of the company, it was not liable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 84, Cent. Dig. Master and Servant, § 352.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Action by M. E. Spangler against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of Brown J., in the court below:

"This matter arises upon a motion to take off a compulsory nonsuit in an action by Mary E. Spangler against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company to recover damages resulting from the death of her husband, caused by a head-on collision between an east-bound freight engine and a west-bound passenger train. Mr. Spangler was upon the east-bound freight engine operated by the freight crew proceeding to the scene of a wreck upon the Wheeling Branch of said company.

"The undisputed evidence shows: (1) That the telegraphic message (under which the freight engine was proceeding) was subject (a) to the rule and railway schedule of the company giving priority of right of way to passenger trains, and (b) to the rule requiring a flagman approximately a mile ahead of the freight engine to protect its crew against passenger trains. (2) That, in violation of these rules and schedules well known to the employés of the railroad company (of whom Mr. Spangler was one), the freight engine, without any flagman ahead, proceeded easterly several miles to the point of its collision with the west-bound passenger train.

"The violation of these rules by fellow servants, being the proximate cause of the collisions, bars a recovery. The case is ruled by Kennelty v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, 168 Pa. 60, 30 Atl. 1014, in which it is said by Mr. Justice Fell, delivering the opinion: 'It was clearly shown by the testimony produced by the plaintiff that the collision was caused not by an unsafe schedule or defective rules, but that it was due to the reckless disregard of clearly defined and well-understood duties by those in charge of the train. As they were co-employés of the plaintiff's husband, there was nothing to leave to the jury, and the nonsuit was properly entered.'

"Motion overruled."

PARK STEEL CO. v. ALLEGHENY VALLEY RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. RAILROADS—RIGHT TO MAINTAIN TRAMWAY ACROSS TRACKS.

A manufacturing corporation constructed a tramway across railroad tracks; the land occupied by the tramway being a public street. The corporation obtained permission from the railroad company to cross its tracks and had expended money in reliance on such permission, so that the license had become irrevocable. Held, that the manufacturing corporation was entitled to an injunction restraining the railroad company from interfering with or removing the tramway, especially in view of the fact that the railroad company had refused to allow the tramway to be constructed in a manner which would have prevented the delay of which it complained.

2. SAME—CROSSINGS.

Act June 19, 1871 (P. L. 1361), relative to railroad crossings, providing for their regulation by courts, and authorizing such courts to define by decree the mode of such crossing which will inflict the least injury on the rights of the company owning the road, does not apply where the parties have established a crossing and are using it, nor to grade crossings of railroads over ordinary streets and highways.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Action by the Park Steel Company against the Allegheny Valley Railway Company. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Thomas Patterson, for appellant. John S. Wendt and John McCleave, for appellee.

POTTER, J. In this action the Park Steel Company filed a bill in equity against the Allegheny Valley Railway Company, praying for an injunction to restrain the defendant company, its agents, and employes from interfering with or removing a tramway constructed and operated by the plaintiff along Thirty-First street, in the city of Pittsburg, across the tracks of defendant's railroad. The court below, after hearing, granted the injunction prayed for, and further enjoined defendant from unreasonably obstructing or interfering with the operation of the tramway in the hauling of materials to and from different parts of the plaintiff's manufacturing plant. From this decree defendant has appealed.

The tramway is stated by the trial judge in his findings of fact to be a narrow-gauge track, 32 inches in width, extending from the interior of plaintiff's furnace buildings, on the southerly side of Railroad street through said buildings to Thirty-First street, and thence along and close to plaintiff's buildings across the railroad tracks; then along and into the finishing mills lying between Railroad street and the Allegheny river. The car used is a small flange-wheeled iron truck, about 18 inches wide and 42 inches long. The materials hauled are ingots and billets weighing from 1,000 to 7,500 pounds. The average load is about 4½ tons. The car is loaded by cranes and is usually hauled by mules, although sometimes pushed by men, to its destination. In its passage over the tracks of defendant each car is in charge of experienced men. Plaintiff has a watchman stationed at the railroad crossing. Its rules to regulate the use of the crossing are most stringent. The total average crossing of the railroad tracks, both loaded and unloaded, is about 100 times per diem. It also appeared by the testimony that the rails of the railroad company are not cut, and there are no crossing frogs, it being what is termed a "jump crossing." The rails of the tramway are a little higher than the rails of the track, and there is a space left for the flange and tread of the wheels of the railroad cars.

The court below found as facts that public travel is not obstructed by this tramway; that its rules for the regulation of the crossing are all that could reasonably be required of plaintiff; that the use of horses and wagons for this transportation is impracticable and would be an equal damage to the railroad; that from the operation of the tramway no serious accident resulting in either loss of life or personal injury has occurred; that on a few occasions defendant suffered a trifling property loss to its rolling stock by striking derailed trams or their loads; that occasionally, but not frequently, loaded trams are derailed upon defendant's tracks; that defendant's serious complaint is that its trains are delayed by these derailments, which are caused by reason of the construction of the crossing, it being a "jolt" crossing; that a modern frog construction of the crossing would greatly lessen the number of derailments, as well as reduce the time consumed in crossing; but the defendant has refused to allow plaintiff to construct such a crossing; that the construction of a tunnel under the railroad tracks would be difficult, if not impossible, and very expensive; and that an overhead system of conveyance had been tried and proved unsatisfactory and unsuccessful.

The first assignment of error is to the decree of the court below. The second, third, and fourth assignments are to findings of fact. It is sufficient to say with regard to these findings that there is ample evidence to support all of them, and they will not be disturbed. It is very evident that what the defendant company is really complaining of is not the tramway or its rails, for these do not in any way interfere with or injure the defendant's tracks or property, or delay its trains. It was the manner and extent of the use of the grade crossing over its tracks by the plaintiff which the defendant company thought was objectionable, and with which it sought to interfere. Much of the argument for appellant goes upon the theory that the right to cross the tracks at the point in question is based upon a license, or permission, extended by the railway company; and it is contended that the permission given by its president could not ripen into a grant and become an indefeasible right, but is necessarily revocable whenever the railroad company reaches the conclusion that it is inconsistent with the proper management of the railroad and the protection of its trains and passengers.

But this line of reasoning is not relevant to the issue now under consideration, because of the fact that the plaintiff is making use of a public street. The crossing in question is that of a public highway, and the plaintiff has the right to make use of it, as part of the public, and is under no necessity to ask for permission, or seek license to do so, from the defendant company. Whatever inconvenience the railway company may be under from the crossing of its tracks at grade by a public highway, it is bound to submit to, or else take the proper means to abolish a grade crossing. Furthermore, in this particular instance, it appears from the act of incorporation that it is the duty of the railway company to avoid obstructing or impeding the free use and passage of any public roads which it may intersect, and that the duty of constructing causeways over the public roads, in order to enable all persons and vehicles to pass over the railroad with safety and convenience, is placed directly upon the railroad company.

If, however, the question of license were important in this case, we should feel obliged to hold that under the facts the plaintiff company has obtained from the defendant an express license which has become irrevocable. One of our latest cases upon this subject is Harris v. Brown, 202 Pa. 16, 51 Atl. 586, 90 Am. St. Rep. 610, where our Brother Mestrezat says (page 22, of 202 Pa., and page 587, of 51 Atl., 90 Am. St. Rep. 610): "It is undoubtedly true that a mere license without consideration is determinable at the pleasure of the licensor. But that is not the rule in this state where the enjoyment of the license must necessarily be, and is, preceded by the expenditure of money. In such cases the license becomes an agreement on a valuable consideration, and is irrevocable"—citing Rerrick v. Kern, 14 Serg. & R. 267, 16 Am. Dec. 497, and other cases. And as far back as 1868 in Cumberland Valley R. R. Co. v. McLanahan, 59 Pa. 23, Justice Sharswood held that a license to a railroad company to cross private lands, upon the faith of which valuable improvements had been made by the company, was not within the statute of frauds, and was irrevocable, and that such license might be given or ratified by parol. It appears in the testimony in this case, and is found as a fact by the trial judge, and is admitted in the argument for appellant, that the appellee and its predecessors have made valuable improvements to their property in connection with, and in reliance upon, the agreement for this crossing.

The argument that the use of the crossing by the plaintiff company interferes with the discharge by the railroad company of its primary duty to the public is negated by the finding of fact by the court below that the obvious remedy is to permit the plaintiff to put in a modern frog construction, and that having refused to accept a modern up to date crossing, when proffered by the plaintiff, the responsibility for any resulting inconvenience or delay, caused by the use of the antiquated construction, must be borne by the defendant company.

It is also contended that the authorities under the act of June 19, 1871 (P. L. 1361), should be applied to this case. But, even if the act could be extended to such a case as this, it has been expressly held in W. N. Y. & P. Ry. Co. v. Railway Co., 193 Pa. 127, 44 Atl. 242, that it does not apply where the parties have established a crossing and are using it. In Railroad Company v. Upper Darby Twp., 202 Pa. 429, 51 Atl. 1080, it was pointed out that under this act of 1871 the authority of the courts does not extend to the regulation of grade crossings of railroads over ordinary streets and highways.

The assignments of error are overruled, the appeal is dismissed, at the cost of the appellant, and the decree of the court below is affirmed.

McKEE v. CRUCIBLE STEEL CO. OF AMERICA.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES.

In an action by an employe to recover for injuries caused by defects in appliances which could not have been revealed to plaintiff, except by a special investigation, evidence held to sustain verdict for plaintiff.

2. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

Error in admitting evidence which could not have prejudiced defendant, because of the careful instructions given, is not ground for reversal.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Action by George McKee against the Crucible Steel Company of America. Judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

At the trial plaintiff's counsel asked witnesses the following questions: "Q. Mr. Guenther, if you had known there was no bolt here, or that it had been allowed to get out and had not been replaced, would you have regarded that as a safe place to work? (Objected to by Mr. Castle as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not binding upon defendant in this matter. Objection overruled, and bill sealed.) Q. Mr. Baer, if you had known that this bolt, if it ever had been put in, had gotten out, and that there was nothing supporting it except this hanger without any bolt, would you have regarded it as safe? A. I would have gotten it fixed. (Objected to by Mr. Castle: "This is objected to as not the test of negligence." Objection overruled, and bill sealed.) Q. Well, Mr. Holdred, when they were carrying the material out to the end of this rail, would you have considered it safe to have used it, if you had known that the bolt had gotten out and had not been replaced at that end? (Objected to by Mr. Castle: "Your honor will note my objection as before, and in addition, now, we have discovered that the employees are using that for some other purpose than it was evidently designed for. I add that as a further objection." Objection overruled and bill sealed.)"

Verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $4,200. Defendant appealed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Homer L. Castle, for appellant. J. S. Ferguson, John G. Silveus, and William P. Carter, for appellee.

STEWART, J. Defendant company made no attempt to meet the evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiff, but at its conclusion moved the court to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant. The court's refusal to so direct constitutes the principal assignment of error. Plaintiff was employed in defendant's mill, the work assigned him being the removal of steel plates from the anvil after they had been hammered. To facilitate this work a contrivance very simple in its construction was used. An ordinary steel rail some 18 or 20 feet in length was suspended from the beam above, and held in place about 25 feet above the heads of the workmen below by two hangers, one at either end of the rail, or approximately so. Along this rail ran a trolley, an iron rod from which extended down to the anvil, fitted at the lower end with clamps or hooks. It was the business of the plaintiff to adjust these clamps and hooks to the steel plates that had been hammered, and then, as they were suspended from the rail above, push them along the trolley until the place was reached where they were to be deposited. While he was so engaged, the end of the rail farthest from the anvil separated from the hanger on which it rested, with the result that the end being without support fell, striking the plaintiff and inflicting upon him serious hurt. The hanger and rail were not in any way tied together, that is to say, nothing kept the rail in place in the hanger but its own weight. The force of the burdened trolley running against the hanger would almost necessarily have the effect of driving the hanger back towards the end of the rail, and this, if repeated often without correction or readjustment, would, in all probability, result in pushing it entirely clear of the rail. Indeed, this is the only explanation of this particular accident that is suggested, and it is accepted by both sides as the true explanation. The rail inclined somewhat upward from the anvil, and so permitted the trolley to return for its next burden without force being applied. At the lower end of the rail—that is, the end nearest the anvil and beyond the hanger—there was a bolt through the rail which prevented any separation between the hanger and the rail at that end; at the other end there was a place in the rail for the bolt, but it clearly appears that there was no bolt there when the accident occurred, and witnesses testified that, from the appearance of the hole, none could have been there for months. It does not appear that the absence of this bolt would have made the contrivance insecure for the party handling it, except as the trolley was pushed against the hanger. The hanger could only be reached by the trolley by the application of force since it was up-grade to that point.

Was the contrivance, in the condition stated, reasonably safe for the use intended? The court below thought this was a question for the jury, and submitted it to them in a charge so clear and impartial, that no exception is taken but to the fact of submission. We think the facts afforded sufficient basis for the inference of negligence by the jury. This, of itself, without more, would make a submission imperative. The rail along which this trolley ran was about 20 feet in length, including the part that extended outside the hangers. Until about a year before the accident, the plates carried on the trolley were discharged at a point about half the length of the rail from the anvil, and while the work was so conducted, only half the length of the rail being traveled, the hanger or trolley did not come together; but the size of the plates being then increased, greater space was required for their discharge, and it became necessary to use the rail along its entire length, so that the trolley was liable at any time in such use to strike the hanger. In testifying on this point, the witness, Holdred, says: "You had to get away out of the road so a fellow on the back end of the hammer could work, and you had to run it [the trolley] away out." We have here the explanation of how the accident occurred, showing conditions which invited disaster, so long as there was nothing to arrest the outward push of the hanger by the trolley. A simple bolt or rivet would have averted all danger, but neither was there. The defendant company is chargeable with knowledge of the conditions that there existed for so long a period. If it did not know that the increased size of the plates made it necessary to use the rail for its entire length, in order to deposit the plates in the place where they were required, it ought to have known it; if it did not know that there was no bolt or rivet in the end of the rail to keep the hanger in place, it ought to have known that fact, for it was responsible for the changed conditions that made such bolt necessary to safety in the operation of the trolley. It is not simply a case that would warrant an inference of negligence by the jury; it is a case which, upon its admitted facts, would seem to make such conclusion almost unavoidable. The obligation and duty were wholly with the defendant company. No duty rested on plaintiff to investigate whether there was a bolt in the rail; he had a right to assume that something adequate was there to keep the hanger in place. The absence of everything of this kind was not such a manifest and conspicuous fact that he was bound to observe it. It could not have been revealed to him except by very special investigation, for it was at least 20 feet above his head. The witness, Holdred, whose testimony is above referred to, says: "Yes, sir, and you could not see that thing [the connection between the hanger and the rail]; it's about 20 feet high, and it is all steam above the hammer, and sometimes you couldn't see 5 feet up." We refer to this feature of the case only that the actual situation may appear. Whether plaintiff contributed by negligent omission or commission to the accident, was for the jury, and this, with the question of defendant's negligence, was submitted. A verdict for the plaintiff resulted, which it is conceded accords with reasonable compensation for the injury sustained. It was for the jury to say whether, under the law as given by the court, that compensation should be required of defendant.

The other assignments of error relate to rulings of the court with respect to questions put by defendant's counsel to witnesses who were interrogated as to the safety of the trolley appliance. Objection was made that the questions as put admitted and invited answers that regarded absolute safety, whereas all that is required to exonerate the employer is that the machinery be reasonably safe. The objection was well taken. The court should have required counsel to so frame the question that the witness would know the standpoint from which he was to speak; failing to do this the objection should have been sustained. In view of the very careful instructions from the court in its charge, as to the duty that rests on the employer with respect to the machinery he provides, for those in his service, we are satisfied that in this particular case, the defendant could not have been prejudiced by the answers elicited by the questions objected to. But for this, these assignments might seriously imperil the judgment in the court below. It is of course very familiar law to those accustomed to deal with such questions, that it is only reasonable safety that is required in this connection, and all that is necessary to relieve from liability; but it would be a great mistake to assume that the average person who comes into court to testify is acquainted with it. Asked whether it would be safe to work with or about machinery under certain conditions shown to exist, such person, except as he is instructed as to the measure of safety he is to regard, would speak from the standpoint of his own individual notions as to what the law ought to require of the employer, and not what it does, or else from the standpoint of absolute safety. It is enough to know that prejudice would likely result from such a course. The defendant was saved that prejudice by the subsequent action of the court; but the better and safer plan is to avoid the error in the first instance.

The assignments of error are overruled, and judgment affirmed.

McNEIL v. CLAIRTON STEEL CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—INJURY TO THIRD PERSONS.

In an action against a steel company to recover for injuries to an employe of another company, who was putting up structural work at the plant of the company, evidence held to show that the accident was caused by the contributory negligence of plaintiff.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Action by Frank McNeil against the Clairton Steel Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Ralph P. Tannehill and Thos. M. & Rody P. Marshall, for appellant. George E. Shaw, for appellee.

POTTER, J. The appellant in this case complains of the refusal of the court below to take off a judgment of compulsory nonsuit. The action was brought to recover damages for the loss of three fingers of the right hand by the plaintiff. At the time of the accident he was engaged in putting up structural work at the plant of the defendant company. A small car, operated by electricity, ran upon a track past the point where he was at work. In order to permit the car to pass, it was necessary to depress a guy rope temporarily in use, and this the plaintiff did by standing on it. He steadied himself in this position by reaching out to the girder or channel upon which the rails were laid, and in so doing inadvertently put his hand upon the rail. It was clearly unnecessary for him to do this. The car had passed him once before, and he had depressed the rope in the same way, and steadied himself by putting his hand on the flange of the girder below the rail.

The trial judge says, in his opinion refusing to take off the nonsuit: "The rail was laid on a beam which was wider than the base of the rail, and it is plain that there was no necessity for plaintiff putting his fingers over the top of the rail. He could just as well have steadied himself, while standing on the rope to depress it, by placing his hand on or holding to the beam or lower part of the rail, and thus have escaped injury." The rail was not high in the air, but seems to have been only five or six feet from the ground, while the rope which was to be depressed was only about a foot from the ground. The accident was evidently the result of the carelessness of the plaintiff in putting his fingers upon the track, rather than against the flange below the rail. He knew the car was advancing towards him and that it would pass him, for he was depressing the guy rope in order that it might do so. We see no error in the refusal to take off the nonsuit.

The assignment is dismissed, and the judgment is affirmed.

McMULLIN et al. v. REID.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

ACCOUNT STATED—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where, in an action on an account stated, the evidence shows a course of dealing between the parties, a submission of the statement of account to defendant, with demand for payment and notice that collateral pledged would be sold in 15 days, and that there was no answer to such demand, it was a question for the jury whether the account was stated.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Action by M. K. McMullin and E. A. Clark against William Reid. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Shafer, J., filed the following opinion on a motion for a new trial:

"The plaintiffs having brought an action of assumpsit against defendant on an account stated, the defendant filed an affidavit of defense in which he denied that he ever had any dealings with the plaintiffs. The evidence showed that M. K. McMullin had originally dealt as a stockbroker with the defendant and had undertaken to carry for him certain stock; that some time after the transaction was begun between the parties McMullin took into partnership with him a young man in his office named Clark, and that thereafter the style of the firm was M. K. McMullin & Co.; that of this change the defendant had no formal notice, but that at the time of the formation of the partnership the letter heads were changed and the letters thereafter sent to the defendant in relation to the matter were written on the letter heads of McMullin & Co., and were sometimes signed McMullin & Co., and sometimes McMullin; that statements were sent regularly, from time to time, of the condition of the accounts to the defendant, the old printed form being used, and in some instances the words '& Co.' being added to the name of McMullin, and in others this was neglected, and that notes were renewed by the defendant sometimes in the name of McMullin, and sometimes in the name of McMullin & Co.; that after the defendant had been in default for a considerable time in paying interest and notes which had fallen due a statement of account showing a certain balance in favor of the plaintiffs was on June 17, 1904, served upon the defendant at his home in the city of Detroit, Mich., accompanied with a written demand for the payment of the amount, and a notice that, unless payment was made, the collateral held by McMullin & Co. would be sold 15 days thereafter.

"This suit was brought July 11, 1904; no answer of any kind having been received by the plaintiffs from the defendant, and no communication having in the meantime passed between them. The defendant offered no evidence. We are of opinion that there was enough in the evidence to show a course of dealing between the plaintiffs as partners and the defendant upon which an account stated might be founded. There being some parol evidence, although very little, of the dealings of the parties upon which the account stated is founded, there may be some question whether it was proper to leave it to the jury to find whether under all the circumstances an account had been stated between the parties, or whether that should have been determined as a matter of law. The question was submitted to the jury, but this, if erroneous, did the defendant no harm. If the question is one of law for the court, we are of opinion that the circumstances showed an account stated.

"The motion for a new trial is therefore refused."

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Walter Lyon, for appellant. J. S. Ferguson and E. G. Ferguson, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed, on the opinion of the court below.

GROGAN et al. v. PENNSYLVANIA R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

NEGLIGENCE—FENCES—TRESPASSERS.

A railroad company owning real estate abutting on a street is not required to construct a fence sufficiently strong to provide against the contingency of a crowd of trespassers coming on the inclosed property and pushing the fence over on a person walking on the street, though some of the trespassers were the servants of the company.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Negligence, § 67.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Action by Patrick and Mary Grogan against the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

M. W. Acheson, Jr., for appellant. F. C. McGirr and John Marron, for appellees.

ELKIN, J. There can be no recovery of damages in this case without announcing the rule that it is the duty of the owner of real estate abutting on a street or highway to construct and maintain a fence sufficiently strong and adequately safe to provide against a contingency arising by reason of a crowd of trespassers coming upon the property inclosed and pushing the fence over on a person walking on the street. The defendant is the owner of a tract of land abutting on Carson street, in the city of Pittsburg, around which it caused a fence to be erected, one part of which is near the property line which divides the lot inclosed from the street named. The fence was built for the use and protection of the defendant. In the building of the fence it owed no particular duty to any one. Whether it was six feet high or three; whether it was built of stone, boards, or iron, were matters entirely within the discretion of the defendant, and about which the plaintiff and the public had no concern. The defendant was ordinarily under no duty to build a fence of any particular degree of strength, or, indeed, to build a fence at all. On the principle, however, that no one can use or maintain his property in such a dangerous or unsafe condition as to endanger the life, limb, or property of others, the defendant was under the duty of maintaining its fence strong and safe enough to resist such forces or conditions as should have been foreseen by ordinary forecast. In McGrew v. Stone, 53 Pa. 436, Mr. Justice Agnew stated the rule in the following language: "The general rule is that a man is answerable for the consequences of a fault which are natural and probable and might therefore be foreseen by ordinary forecast, while it is true that if his fault happened to concur with something extraordinary, and therefore not likely to be foreseen, he will not be answerable for the unexpected results." Again, Mr. Justice Strong in Phila. & Reading Railroad Co. v. Hummell, 44 Pa. 375, 84 Am. Dec. 457, said: "It is true that what amounts to ordinary care under the circumstances of a case is generally to be determined by the jury, yet the jury cannot hold parties to a higher standard of care than the law requires, and they cannot find anything negligence which is less than a failure to discharge a legal duty."

We concede that under ordinary circumstances it would be for the jury to determine whether the defendant used proper care in the construction and maintenance of the fence. But the defendant company did not owe a legal duty to the plaintiff or any one else to construct and maintain the fence so strong that a crowd of trespassers, wrongfully coming upon its land, could not push it over and thus cause the injury complained of. There can be no negligence in a legal sense, unless there is a violation of the legal duty to exercise care. In the present case the inquiry is, were the consequences such as should have been foreseen by ordinary forecast and provided against? It was not the duty of the defendant company to foresee and provide against the contingency of 40 or 50 trespassers coming upon its land for the purpose of witnessing an arrest by a police officer in the public street, and, while thus gratifying their idle curiosity, climb upon, lean against, and push over the fence, causing the injury for which damages are sought to be recovered. This is a higher standard of care than the law requires, and it is the duty of the court to say so. In this case the defendant stands in the same position as every other owner of real estate. Its rights, duties, and liabilities are no greater and no less. The rule established in this case will apply, not to common carriers as such, but to the real estate owners of the commonwealth. It is conceded that the accident would not have occurred, except for the fact that a crowd of 40 or 50 persons, without authority, came upon the land of the defendant, climbed upon or leaned against the fence, so that it gave way and injured one of the appellees, who was walking on the street below. The direct cause of the accident was the negligent act of these trespassers, which, under the law, it was not the duty of the defendant to provide against.

The contention that some of these trespassers were employes of the defendant, and that their negligent acts can be visited upon the company, is without merit. Their duties as employes did not call them to climb upon or to lean against the fence, or to be at that place in the performance of their work. In these respects they acted entirely outside of their duties as employes, and were trespassers as much as the other persons assembled in that crowd. Our attention has been called to a number of cases relating to questions of concurrent negligence and proximate cause, cited by the learned court below and relied upon by counsel for appellees here. We do not deny the doctrine of these cases, but they apply only where negligence by the defendant is established. If no negligence by the defendant is shown, questions of concurrent negligence and proximate cause do not arise.

Assignments of error sustained, and judgment reversed; and it is now ordered that judgment be entered in the court below for defendant.

MULVANEY v. PITTSBURGH RYS. CO.
(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)
STREET RAILROADS—INJURY TO PERSON ON TRACK.

Where a man 86 years of age was struck by one of defendant's cars near a street crossing at midnight, and the car was so brilliantly lighted that it could be seen for about 300 feet, and there was no evidence of undue speed or failure to give proper signals, a nonsuit in an action to recover for his death is proper.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Action by John Mulvaney against the Pittsburgh Railways Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Rody P. Marshall and James B. Drew, for appellant. James C. Gray, Clarence Burleigh, and Wm. A. Challener, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff's son, 36 years of age, was struck by one of the defendant's cars at midnight, at or near a street crossing. The car was well lighted, and there was no evidence of undue speed or of a failure to give notice of its approach. The only support the plaintiff's case had was the presumption that the deceased had exercised reasonable care and the assumption that the headlight was not burning. The only effect of the presumption was to establish prima facie the absence of contributory negligence, and there was no satisfactory evidence that the headlight at the front of the car was not burning. No witness who saw the accident was called. It was shown that the lights at the front and at the back of the car would not both burn at the same time, and a witness who saw the car at a distance of 250 feet, after the accident, thought, but was not willing to testify, that the light at the back of the car was then burning. Proof that the rear light was burning after the accident, when the car had stopped and the body of the deceased was being removed from the street back of it, was not ground for the inference that the front light was unlit when the car was in motion; nor would the fact, if established by proof, have warranted a recovery, because the car was brilliantly lighted and was seen by a number of witnesses when 250 or 300 feet from it. The plaintiff having failed to establish any ground of recovery, the nonsuit was properly entered.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re TIOGA ST.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREET IMPROVEMENT—CONFIRMATION—MOTION TO RESCIND.

Where proceedings to ascertain and assess damages for grading a certain street had been in progress for 12 years, and one who excepted to the report of the viewers had represented certain property interested, first as agent of the owner and afterwards as trustee, and the same attorney had been counsel for him during the whole period and had notice of the exceptions and participated in the hearing, an order refusing to rescind confirmation, on the ground that such party had no notice of the hearing on exceptions, will not be reversed.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

In the matter of Tioga street. From an order refusing to rescind an order confirming the report of the jury of view, A. L. Rich, trustee, appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

S. W. Cunningham and Sion B. Smith, for appellant. T. D. Carnahan and W. B. Rodgers, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The proceedings in this case were under the remedial act of May 16, 1891 (P. L. 71), to ascertain and assess the damages, cost, and expenses of grading and paving Tioga street. Exceptions were filed to the second report of the viewers by the appellant as agent for the owner in 1898. The owner has since died, and the title to the land has become vested in the appellant as trustee of her estate. In 1904, on notice to counsel of record, who had been in the case from the beginning, and a full hearing by the court, in which he participated, the exceptions were dismissed and the report of the viewers was confirmed. The assignment of error is to the order of the court refusing to rescind the order of confirmation and to allow the appellant to intervene. The allegations in the petition for a rule to show cause are that the appellant had no notice of the hearing on the exceptions, that counsel was not authorized at that time to represent him, and that the city by delay had lost all right and claim against the property. We have no means of knowing what took place at the hearing on the rule; but as the counsel of record, when the report was confirmed, had been in the case 12 years and had once secured a reversal by this court, and as the appellant had filed exceptions, and had represented as agent the same interests he now represents as trustee, we assume it was found that he was represented by counsel and had had his day in court.

The order of the court discharging the rule is affirmed.

DOUGHERTY v. PITTSBURGH RYS. CO.
(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. TRIAL—ARGUMENTS OF COUNSEL.

Where counsel, in summing up in an action for damages, erroneously states that a certain sum is admitted, but, on objection, states that he meant to say that the testimony as to such items of damages was uncontradicted, it is not ground for reversal, when followed by a statement of the court in the charge that no amount had been admitted.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 816.]

2. CARRIERS — INJURY TO PASSENGERS — PRESUMPTION OF NEGLIGENCE.

Where the brakes of a street car fail to work because of a broken chain, and a passenger is injured, the presumption of negligence arises, which is not overcome by evidence that the brakes held on a previous trip of the car.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1290.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Action by Josephine Dougherty against the Pittsburgh Railways Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

At the trial it appeared that the accident was due to the failure of the brakes to work on the car on which the plaintiff was riding as a passenger. The brakes did not work because of a broken chain.

The court charged in part as follows:

"When a passenger gets upon a street railway car and pays his or her fare, a contract is made with him or her to be taken safely to destination. So that in this case all that was necessary for the plaintiff to make out what is called a prima facie case was to prove that she was a passenger for hire on the street railway. The burden of proof is then put upon the defendant to show that there was no negligence at all on its part. As you can see, that rule is a very strict one. As the carrier of passengers must exercise the highest degree of care and use all such appliances as the highest human foresight would suggest under the circumstances, you will see that there are comparatively few cases in which the street car company attempts to show that it is not liable, because there are so few cases where they could escape. Sometimes there is some defective appliance for which they are not responsible, something that they could not have foreseen, some latent defect by reason of which they may escape.

"The case here is in such shape that the defendant has not overcome the burden, or, to use a better expression, has not met his burden of proof. They have shown how the accident happened, that the brake failed to work, but they did not go into details, but put in this evidence so as to show that they were not simply recklessly negligent and careless. They claim it was an accident. Without troubling yourselves about that branch of the case, you have sufficient here on the question of negligence, and the question that you have to determine is, how much this young woman was hurt? and, if she was hurt, what is her damage?"

Argued before FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

James C. Gray, Clarence Burleigh, and William A. Challenger, for appellant. Thomas M. Marshall, Jr., for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The first assignment of error is to the refusal of the court to withdraw a juror because counsel for the plaintiff in his closing address said that the defendant had admitted that damages amounting to $9,000 or $10,000 had been sustained, when, in fact, no admission had been made. Counsel should be held to a strict accountability for language used in addressing the jury, and, where willful or reckless misstatements of the evidence are made, a juror should be withdrawn or a new trial granted, but such action by the court was not called for in this case. There was no contradiction of the plaintiff's testimony as to the loss she had sustained by being unable to work and of the expenses she had incurred because of her injuries, and the evidence produced by the defendant tended to show what treatment might benefit her and the cost thereof. It was in summing up these items that the statement objected to was made. The counsel was interrupted while making the statement, and he at once said that what he meant was that the testimony was uncontradicted as to these items. This was followed by a statement by the court in the charge that no amount had been admitted by the defendant, and that the amount spoken of as admitted was the amount claimed. The error of counsel was thus corrected without having prejudiced the defense.

The remaining assignment is that in charging the jury the court treated the negligence of the defendant as not being in dispute. Where injury to a passenger is caused by a defect in the means of transportation, there is a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier. The plaintiff was a passenger in one of the defendant's cars, and the accident was caused by the failure of the brakes to work because of a broken chain. It was not shown what caused the chain to break, nor what its condition was before the accident. The only proof by the defendant was that the brake held the car on the previous trip. This did not rebut the presumption.

The judgment is affirmed.

BUEL v. BERGMAN.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION — INSTRUCTIONS — BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action for malicious prosecution, where judgment was rendered for defendant, plaintiff alleged as error a failure to instruct that proof that prosecution was instituted to collect a debt put the burden of showing probable cause on the defendant. The proofs were slight and the evidence was conflicting. Held, that the question as to the burden of proof was of so small importance that failure to refer to it in the charge was not error.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Action by Fred Buel, Jr., by his next friend, Fred Buel, Sr., against Daniel A. Bergman.

Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Franklin A. Ammon, for appellant. A. G. Smith and E. L. Kearns, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. This action was to recover damages for a malicious prosecution. The only assignment of error is to the charge. It is conceded that the instruction given as to the law applicable to the action was correct. The ground of complaint is that there was a failure to instruct the jury that proof that a prosecution was instituted for the purpose of collecting a debt imposed on the defendant the burden of showing probable cause. The proofs upon this subject were meager and inferential, and were met by countervailing proofs of at least equal force, and the question did not become one of such importance in the case that the failure to refer to it in the charge was error. If specific instructions were desired, they should have been asked for.

The judgment is affirmed.

REED v. BOROUGH OF TARENTUM.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — SIDEWALKS — MAINTENANCE.

A city is only bound to maintain its sidewalks with reasonable care, and the question as to the plan on which a sidewalk was constructed is, not whether it is the best and safest plan, but whether it is reasonably safe.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 1612.]

2. SAME—DEGREE OF CARE.

Plaintiff sued to recover for injuries caused by the projection of a paving stone above adjoining stones in a sidewalk, and the court instructed that if the stone projected as stated by plaintiff, and if it was negligence for the borough to so allow it to project, and it should have maintained a better and safer sidewalk, considering the size of the place and the number of the foot passengers, then the question was whether the negligence caused the injury, was erroneous, as the question whether the pavement was reasonably safe was to be determined by the standard of ordinary usage, and not by the standard which might be set up by the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 1612.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Action by E. N. Reed against the borough of Tarentum. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

At the trial it appeared that plaintiff's injuries resulted from a fall occasioned by striking his foot against the edge of a paving stone, which projected above the adjoining stones in the sidewalk of a street which was much frequented, but poorly lighted.

The court charged in part as follows: "If you find it did project up as stated by the plaintiff—and some of the defendant's witnesses show pretty much the same state of affairs; of course there is a difference in their testimony—but if you find that that is a negligent thing for the borough to do, and would fix a better standard for the borough, and think that they ought to have maintained a better and safer sidewalk under the circumstances, and that this was a much-traveled street, taking into consideration the size of the place and the number of foot passengers there, then the next question is whether that negligence caused the injury."

Verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $2,510. Defendant appealed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Nelson McVicar, for appellant. Daniel Harrison, for appellee.

FELL, J. The plaintiff's injury was caused by a fall occasioned by his striking his foot against the edge of a paving stone, which projected above the adjoining stones in the sidewalk of a much-used, but poorly lighted, street. The instruction in relation to the duty of the borough to supervise its sidewalks and to maintain them in a reasonably safe condition was free from error, except the part covered by the sixth assignment of error. This part of the charge left it to the jury to fix a standard for the maintenance of sidewalks, and to find the borough negligent if there had been a failure to come up to their conception of what a sidewalk ought to be. The law fixes the standard of duty as reasonable care, and it cannot be left to the judgment or caprice of a jury to establish any other standard. The necessity for and the plan of municipal improvements are matters within the discretion of the municipal authorities. The question of necessity is never for a jury, and the question as to the plan is not whether the best and safest plan has been adopted, but whether that adopted is reasonably safe; and reasonable safety, as in the case of machinery and methods, is to be determined by the standard of ordinary usage. Borough of Easton v. Neff, 102 Pa. 474, 48 Am. Rep. 213; Canavan v. Oil City, 183 Pa. 611, 38 Atl. 1096. The same rule applies as to the duty of maintenance. The question in this case was whether the pavement was reasonably safe. This was to be determined by the standard of ordinary usage, and not by a standard the jury might set up.

The sixth specification of error is sustained, and the judgment is reversed, with a venire facias de novo.

ROLLINS et al. v. ATLANTIC CITY R. CO.
(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 15, 1906.)

1. EVIDENCE—PEDIGREE—ANCIENT DEED.

A recital of pedigree, contained in an ancient deed, is of itself evidence of the matter recited, if the deed was made by one related to a branch of the family which the pedigree concerns.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 1411.]

2. SAME.

Such a recital is evidential, although the deed was not made by one related to the family, if it is supported by a long possession consistent with the fact recited, or supported by the fact that no persons have claimed title adversely to such recital, and by the fact that the ancient deed has been on record for a long time and grants have been repeatedly made by its grantees and successors in title without question.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, §§ 1408, 1411.]

3. SAME—BEST AND SECONDARY.

The trial justice committed no error in overruling a question put to a witness inquiring whether a certain deed had been made to a third person, which deed, if made, would have put the title to the property injured by fire out of the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 471.]

4. PLEADING—VARIANCE.

The date when a fire occurred having been laid under a videlicet, there was no error in permitting it to be proved to have happened upon another date.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, § 1306.]

5. RAILROADS—FIRES SET BY LOCOMOTIVES.

It having been proved that the plaintiff's goods were fired by defendant's engine, and admitted by defendant that it was unable to prove that it had used all practicable means to prevent the escape of sparks from its engine, the question whether the fire was first ignited on or outside of the defendant's right of way, became unimportant.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Action by George F. Rollins and others against the Atlantic City Railroad Company. Verdict for plaintiffs. On rule to show cause why verdict should not be set aside. Rule discharged.

See 58 Atl. 344.

Argued June term, 1905, before the CHIEF JUSTICE and FORT, PITNEY, and REED, JJ.

Collins & Corbin, for plaintiffs. Thompson & Cole, for defendants.

REED, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiffs, as heirs at law of Daniel Rollins, against the Atlantic City Railroad Company, to recover damages for the loss of timber claimed to have been burned through the negligent conduct of the defendant's servants. The first reason assigned upon the argument was that the plaintiffs failed to show title to the property injured. There was no proof of actual possession by the plaintiffs, but they relied upon a title derived from the proprietors. This title was regularly traced to Charles Schumacher, George Ashbridge, Morris Robeson, John Paul, and Joseph Paul, who held undivided interests in the property. All these, except Ashbridge, conveyed their interests to Joseph Ball and Samuel Richards. It is claimed that Samuel Richards got the interest of Ashbridge through a deed executed to him in 1820 by one John S. Condit and Mary, his wife. This deed contained the following recital respecting the pedigree of Mary, the wife: "She being the issue and heir at law of George Ashbridge." It is insisted on the part of the defendants that this recital is not evidence of the fact thus recited, and thus there is no evidence that George Ashbridge's interest ever passed to Samuel Richards. The interest which Joseph Ball held in common with Richards is claimed by the plaintiffs to have passed to Richards by a deed executed May 1, 1882, by one Sarah Hastings. The evidence of her kinship to Ball rests upon a recital in that deed. The deed recites that she, Sarah Hastings is a widow, and that she was formerly Sarah Richards, and the sister of Mary Ball, who was the mother of Joseph Ball, deceased. It is insisted on the part of the defendants that this recital is not competent evidence that Sarah Hastings was entitled to Joseph Ball's interest in the property. If these contentions on the part of the defendants are true, then neither the interests of Ashbridge nor of Ball are proved to have passed to Daniel Rollins, whose heirs are suing. Although the plaintiffs held the other undivided interests in the property, yet, the entire loss occasioned by the fire having been assessed in favor of the plaintiffs, the verdict is obviously irregular.

The rule best sustained by the authorities, says Mr. Freeman, is that although the form of action be such that all the co-tenants should have joined, yet if the action be for the conversion of or injury to the common property, and if one sue alone, and the defendant, instead of pleading the nonjointure in abatement, pleads to the action, the plaintiff will recover for his share of the damages. Freeman on Co-Tenancy, par. 353. Respecting torts to chattels, Mr. Chitty observes that if one of the several part owners sue alone, and the defendant do not plead in abatement, the other part owners may afterward sue alone for the injury to their individual share, and the defendant cannot plead in abatement to such action. In the same connection he states the rule to be that, if a party plaintiff in an action ex delicto be omitted, the objection can only be taken by plea in abatement or by way of apportionment of the damages on the trial. 1 Chitty on Pl. marg. p. 66. So it was said in Wheelwright v. Depeyster, 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 471, 3 Am. Dec. 345, that defendants may give the joint interests of others in evidence in mitigation of damages. In Call v. Buttrick, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 345, which was an action for a nulsance to a well, Metcalf, J., remarked: "If it were certain that the plaintiff is tenant in common of the well, the nonjointure of his co-tenant could be excepted to only by plea in abatement, though he would be entitled to recover damages only pro interesse suo." Putney v. Lapham, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 232, was an action of trespass on the case for an injury to the reversion brought by one of two reversioners. The rule enunciated in the preceding case was reiterated. The case of Hasbrouck v. Winkler, 48 N. J. Law, 431, 6 Atl. 22, cited for the plaintiff, is not in point. The husband was in the actual possession of the chattels destroyed, in which chattels his wife had a part interest. In the present case the plaintiffs were not in actual possession of the injured property, and unless they had a constructive possession of the Ashbridge and Paul interests there was no foundation for the assessment of damages for such injury as resulted to those interests. Schenck et al. v. Cuttrell, 21 N. J. Law, 5.

The question therefore confronts us whether it was proved that the title to those interests was lodged in the plaintiffs. There is no question raised respecting the authenticity of the ancient deeds in which the recitals occur. The only question is whether, regarding them as such, the recitals of pedigree therein are evidential against the defendant. It was held in Saxton v. Fuller, 20 N. J. Law, 61-65, that the recital in an ancient deed or will of any antecedent deed or document consistent with its own provisions, will, after the lapse of a long period, be presumptive proof of the former existence of such a deed or document, and especially where no deed, declaration, act, or claim is shown to rebut such presumption. The ancient will in that case referred to a previous deed for the division of property; and it was held that this reference might raise the inference that the testator had got an estate of severalty in the property by this deed. The plaintiff derived his title from a survey and return under a warrant from the council of proprietors, and the defendant rested his title upon an independent and subsequent survey. In Havens v. Sea Shore Land Co., 47 N. J. Eq. 365, 20 Atl. 497, a recital in an ancient deed made by one Joseph Lawrence was as follows: "Which I bought of John Curtis, which was left to him by his father, David Curtis, deceased, which he bought of Elisha Lawrence, deed bearing date July 9th, 1770"—was held to be competent evidence to show that John Curtis had made a deed to Joseph Lawrence for the land conveyed to Lawrence. This was a partition suit, and the opposite party was a stranger to this title. These cases, as is perceived, do not deal with recitals of pedigree, but only with recitals of muniments of title. The query is whether recitals of pedigree stand upon the same footing, as testimony as recitals of muniment of title.

That pedigree may be proved by hearsay testimony is settled. Such testimony is admitted because of the great difficulty, often impossibility, of proving the fact or degree of kinship between alleged relatives; the subject of inquiry being frequently of an ancient date. Respecting what facts come within the meaning of the word "pedigree," and by whom the declaration reproduced as hearsay must have been made, there was some divergence of opinion in the earlier cases. But it seems to be now settled that a declaration, to be admissible, must not only have been made by a person since deceased, and must have been made ante litem motam, but must also have been made by a person related by blood or affinity with some branch of the family, the pedigree respecting which is in question. In the words of Mr. Phillips: "Some relationship of the declaration to some branch of the family must be shown aliunde the declaration itself. Phillips on Evidence, marg. p. 276. This requirement has been held to appertain, not only to recitals made verbally, but also to recitals in ancient deeds and wills. Thus says Mr. Phillips: "Recitals in deeds, which are not family documents, are receivable if it be shown that the deeds were executed by some member of the family to which the statements have reference." And he proceeds to say that in two modern cases in chancery it has been considered that recitals in deeds were not evidence of pedigree against persons who were strangers to the deed, citing Fort v. Clarke, 1 Russ. 604, and Slaney v. Wade, Mylne & C. 338. Mr. Taylor's language is this: "Recitals of descent and description of parties in deeds or other family instruments will be received, provided the deeds come from the proper custody and are proved, or may from age be presumed to have been executed by some member of the family to which the statement refers; but the execution by a relative is an indispensable requisite." Taylor on Ev. 651. In the case of Fulkerston et al. v. Holmes et al., 117 U. S. 389, 6 Sup. Ct. 780, 29 L. Ed. 915, a deed 60 years old was produced from the custody of the heirs of the grantee. In it was a recital that the grantor was the only child and heir of the patentee of the lands in controversy. Mr. Justice Wood, after observing that the deed was admissible in evidence as an ancient deed, proceeded to discuss the question whether the recital was admissible against the defendant, who did not claim under the deed. He proceeded to say: "The rule is that declarations of deceased persons who were de jure related by blood or marriage to the family in question may be given in evidence in matters of pedigree. The qualification of the rule is that, before the declaration can be admitted in evidence, the relationship of the declarant with the family must be established by some proof independent of the declaration itself. Monkton v. Atty. Gen., 2 Russ. & Myl. 156; Atty. Gen. v. Kohler, 9 H. L. Cas. 660; Rex v. All Saints, 7 B. & C. R. 789. But it is evident that slight proof of relationship will be required, since the relationship of the family might be as difficult to prove as the very fact in controversy."

An examination of the cases demonstrates, however, that evidence that the defendant is of kin by consanguinity or affinity with some branch of the family to which the pedigree relates is not required in all cases to make the recital of pedigree evidential. Where the recital stands alone, it is undoubtedly essential to its competency that it shall be the statement of a deceased kinsman. But there may be other facts which support the credibility of the fact recited, and which, together with the recital, will be sufficient to prove the fact recited. In the case of Fulkerson et al. v. Holmes et al., just mentioned, the facts relied on to support the recital were these: (1) That the name of the declarant was Samuel C. Young, and the name of the person who by his recital conveyed the property in question to one Holmes was Samuel Young; (2) that the patent to Samuel Young was found among his papers after his death; (3) that Samuel C. Young, as grantee, claimed title for 60 years, which never, so far as appeared, had been questioned or challenged by any person claiming under Samuel Young. In that case the title came through a patent made in 1787 from the commonwealth of Virginia to one Samuel Young. The next deed, executed in 1819, was by a person named Samuel C. Young to Holmes, from whom the title was regularly traced. The question was how Samuel C. Young got title from Samuel Young. The deed from Samuel C. Young to Holmes contained a recital of a grant by the commonwealth of Virginia to Samuel Young, and a recital that Samuel Young, the patentee, had died intestate, and that Samuel C. Young was his only child and heir, and that the title to the land had vested in him. The only fact to show relationship was the similarity of the names, Samuel Young and Samuel C. Young. The other two facts were possession of the patent by Samuel C. Young, and the possession of the property consistent with his grant. In his opinion in Fulkerson et al. v. Holmes et al., supra, Mr. Justice Wood said that the conclusion holding that this recital was proof of the fact that Samuel C. Young was the son and heir of Samuel Young was sustained by the case of Deery's Lessee v. Cray, 5 Wall. 795, 18 L. Ed. 653, which he said was directly in point. In Deery's Lessee v. Cray, supra, title to land was shown to have been in one William Brent. The next step in tracing title from him was a deed purporting to have been executed by the executors, of one Samuel Shaw, from whom the title was derived. This last deed recited that William Brent, Sr., deceased, by his will, constituted the grantors his executors and authorized them to sell the land in question, and that William Brent, who united in the conveyance as executor, was also heir at law of William Brent, Sr. The evidence, aside from this recital, consisted in acts of possession by the grantees under a deed of William Brent as heir and as co-executor. Mr. Justice Miller remarked: "Not a single circumstance is to be found inconsistent with the fact that William Brent, one of the grantees in the deed, was the son and heir of William Brent, Sr. * * * That recitals of this kind in an ancient deed may be proof as against persons who are not parties to the deed, and who claim a right under it, is too well settled to admit now of controversy. Such is the doctrine of this court in Carver v. Jackson, 4 Pet. 1, 7 L. Ed. 761, and in Crane v. Morris, 6 Pet. 598, 8 L. Ed. 514, Stokes v. Dawes, 4 Mason, 268, Fed. Cas. No. 13,477, and Garwood v. Dennis, 4 Bin. (Pa.) 814."

Now it is clear that in the mind of Mr. Justice Miller the same kind of testimony that would support a recital of an ancient muniment of title would sustain a recital of pedigree. This appears, not only from the facts of the decided case, but also from the character of the cases cited in support of his conclusion. Stokes v. Dawes, supra, so cited, was tried before Mr. Justice Story. It involved the question whether the person from whom title was derived was the son of Rebecca Stokes. A deed was offered, executed in 1765, by this person, which deed purported to convey all the interest of his grandfather, Benjamin Stokes, and of his mother, Rebecca Stokes. It was proved that one of the grantees under this deed had taken and held possession until 1786, and then by his will devised it, from which devise title was regularly traced. Justice Story held that after a possession of 30 years the fact of heirship stated in the deed was a presumptive fact, and left the question of heirship to the jury. The other three cases cited by Mr. Justice Miller did not involve the question of pedigree at all. Garwood v. Dennis, supra, contained a recital in an ancient deed of the existence of another deed, and it was held that possession was held presumptively under the recited deed, and that the recital was evidence of the existence of the deed so recited. Carver v. Jackson and Crane v. Morris, cases concerning the same title, involved the recital of the execution of a lease contained in a deed of release. Mr. Justice Story in the first case remarked that if the transaction be an ancient one, and that if the possession had been long held under such release and is not otherwise to be accounted for, the recital then of itself, under such circumstances, materially fortified the presumption from lapse of time and length of possession of the original existence of the lease. In line with these cases is that of McKinnon et al. v. Bliss, decided by the Court of Appeals of New York and reported in 21 N. Y. 206. In that case the will of Sir William Johnson recited that George III had given the testator a patent for a tract of land which Sir William devised, under which devise the plaintiffs claimed title. The New York court held that, as there was no proof of long and undisputed possession in accordance with the title claimed, the recital was not evidence. The cases of Doe v. Phelps, 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 169, Jackson v. Lamb, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 431, and Jackson v. Lunn, 8 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 109, were considered, and it was pointed out that in each of these cases there was evidence of long and undisturbed possession consistent with recited muniment of title.

Respecting the question whether this kind of evidence will support a recital of pedigree, the observation of the Master of the Rolls in Fort v. Clarke, 1 Russ. 601, is significant. The bill in that case was filed for specific performance. The title which the purchaser was to take rested upon a recital of pedigree. The recital not having been proved to have been made by a relative, the bill was dismissed. In doing so, however, the Master of the Rolls remarked that, "if evidence of possession had followed and accompanied the recited pedigree, the aspect of the case would have been different." In Little v. Palister, 4 Greenl. 209, it was held that recitals in ancient deeds are good presumptive evidence of pedigree, where no adverse title by inheritance has been set up under the same ancestor, even although the land conveyed by the deeds be the subject of the controversy. This statement was adopted in Bowser v. Cravener, 56 Pa. 182. The case of Jackson v. Russell, 4 Wend. 546, affirmed 22 Wend. 277, is illustrative of the point that a recital of pedigree may be supported by evidence other than that of the kinship of the declarant. In that case there was testimony, aside from the recital supporting the pedigree, as well as evidence of possession; but there was no testimony showing that the person who made the recital was of kin to any branch of the family, the pedigree of which was in question. The rule, I think, may be regarded as settled that a recital, whether of an ancient deed, will, lease, or pedigree, may be supported by any testimony which renders credible the truth of the fact recited.

The remaining query is whether there is any evidence to support the recitals in the deeds now in question. There has been no actual possession by the grantees of the property conveyed by Condit and wife and Sarah Hastings, because the property was not of a character which called for the exercise of possessory acts. The deeds, however, in which the recitals occur, have been on record for 80 years. For 80 years, as far as appears, no other persons claiming the interests of Ashbridge and Joseph Ball have set up any rights in this property. There seem to have been conveyances made repeatedly by the grantees, purporting to convey these interests. Under these conditions, I think the recitals are evidence of the facts recited. I also think that, in the absence of anything to contradict these facts, directly or inferentially, any number of verdicts against the probative force of these recitals would be set aside, and therefore the trial justice was warranted in saying to the jury that the plaintiff had proved title.

It is also insisted that the trial justice erred in overruling the question put to a witness called by the defendant. The witness was Mr. McGrath, and the inquiry of him was whether there was a deed standing in the name of Mrs. McGrath for the locus in quo, which deed was not recorded. Mrs. McGrath had at one time been the holder of a legal title to the property, and she had conveyed to Hood, who conveyed to Daniel Rollins. Rollins had executed a declaration of trust, stating that the property was in law and equity, except as to record title, the property of Mrs. McGrath, and stating, further, that it was to be conveyed to her upon her paying to Rollins $2,500, with interest. This is what occurred at the trial: The question being propounded to Mr. McGrath, who was called by the defendant, "if he knew whether or not there was such a deed," he replied, "I do." This was followed by the question, "Is there?" This question was objected to on the ground that the only way to prove the contents of a deed was by the deed, and the way to get it was by subpoena duces tecum. The counsel for the defendant replied: "I do not know whether there is anything of that sort or not." The court remarked, "The only way to prove the existence of a deed is by the production of the deed," to which the counsel for the defendant replied: "My idea about this is that I am not bound to the line of examination that I would be with an ordinary witness." The question propounded was asked for one of two purposes, either to discover whether a paper existed purporting to be a deed to Mrs. McGrath, or to show title to Mrs. McGrath by parol. For the second purpose the question was, of course, improper. Nor can it be said that the judge was bound to permit the question for the former purpose. The deed, if made, was not made to the witness. The question was merely for the purpose of discovering whether other evidence existed and where it could be found. The question was not asked to explain why certain testimony which the defendant would be expected to produce was not produced. It seems to have been designed merely to put the defendant upon the track of evidence which, if discovered, might thereafter be produced. Besides, the answer to the question as put might have led the jury to misconceive the purport of the answer, and to think that the existence of such a deed was equivalent to proof of transfer of title. I think under the conditions there was not injurious error in the ruling of the judge.

Another reason assigned is that the legal title, if proved in any one, was in the eldest son of Daniel Rollins. The answer to this reason is that there is nothing to show that Daniel Rollins ever had a son, and the stipulation entered into by counsel contains the admission that the plaintiffs are the heirs of Daniel Rollins.

It is assigned as another reason that, inasmuch as the declaration lays the date of the fire as April 1st, it follows that testimony that the fire in question occurred on April 29th was erroneously admitted, over an objection. The date was laid under a videlicet, and the defendant was not required to prove that the fire occurred on the precise date alleged. If, as insisted, this rule works harshly if enforced in actions of this kind, the court could relieve against the harshness only by a continuance of the cause in case of manifest surprise arising from the variance in dates. There was, however, no surprise in this instance; for the cause had been already once tried, and on the former trial the 29th of April was fixed by the witnesses as the date when the fire occurred.

It is further insisted that it was injurious error for the judge to say to the jury that they might assume that the tracks of the defendants were in the middle of the right of way. This observation, we think, was of no material import; for, as the case shaped itself on the trial, it became of no account where the tracks were laid.

The negligence of the defendants was alleged to have been either in leaving its right of way incumbered with combustible materials, which, being first ignited, were the means of spreading the flames to the plaintiffs' property, or in a defective construction or management of the defendants' engines. In either case the jury must have found that the fire was communicated to the plaintiffs' property directly or indirectly from its engines. Upon proof of that fact a liability was imposed upon the defendants, unless they used all practicable means to prevent the communication of fire from their locomotive engines to the plaintiffs' property. This duty included care in the construction and use of such engines, and includes other means within their control by which fire from the engines might be communicated. West Jersey R. R. Co. v. Salmon, 39 N. J. Law, 299, 23 Am. Rep. 214. It having been proved, as it must have been, that the fire was communicated from the engines, the company was liable for its consequences, unless it appeared that they had used all practicable means to prevent such communication. Wiley v. West Jersey R. R. Co., 44 N. J. Law, 247. If the fire began outside of the company's right of way, the company was bound to show a properly equipped and managed engine. If it began inside its right of way, it was equally bound to show a properly constructed and managed engine. It is true, of course, that for a fire kindled inside its right of way it might have been liable, although its engine was perfect in construction and management; but, as a properly equipped and managed engine was one of the practical means for preventing the communication of fire to combustible matter, it was incumbent upon the defendants to show such equipment and management, and a failure to show this left a prima facie case arising from proof of communication of fire from the engine unanswered, whether the fire originated inside or outside of the right of way. Now, it was not shown on the trial whether the engine hauling the cinder train from which the fire had its origin was equipped with all practical means to prevent the escape of fire. The engine was not identified, and the court, without objection, charged that upon that subject the defendant had relieved the jury of difficulty, for that in the argument of the counsel for the defendant he admitted that they had not been able to prove that they used all practical means to prevent the escape of sparks from the locomotive. In this posture of affairs we think it became immaterial whether the fire originated inside, upon, or outside the defendants' right of way.

I am also of opinion that there is no ground for a new trial disclosed by the alleged newly discovered evidence, nor do I think the damages were such as to warrant a new trial.

The rule is discharged.

SCHRAFFT et al. v. FIDELITY TRUST CO.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 15, 1906.)

FRAUD—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—DECLARATION.

Two counts of a declaration in an action for deceit set up that the defendant, for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to sell all his stock in a gas company at $155 per share, falsely represented to plaintiff that defendant was desirous of purchasing all the outstanding stock of the gas company, and that it would pay to the plaintiff any difference between $155 per share and the highest price it should pay for any other stock of the said company. The counts then state that the defendant, at the time it made this representation, was not desirous of purchasing all the outstanding stock of the gas company, but was desirous of purchasing only such stock as it could purchase by contracts similar to the one made with plaintiff, and such stock as it could buy at the same or less price, and was desirous of purchasing as trustee all those shares for which the holders received a price higher than $155 each. The counts then state that defendant had bought shares as trustee paying more than $155 a share.

Held, that the counts stated no cause of action for deceit.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Fraud, § 14.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Action by Robert Schrafft and Frederick H. De Bow, executors, against the Fidelity Trust Company. Demurrer to declaration sustained.

Argued November term, 1904, before the CHIEF JUSTICE, and GARRISON, GARRETSON, and REED, JJ.

William J. Kearns, for plaintiffs. Samuel W. Beldon and Chandler W. Riker, for defendant.

REED, J. The first count in the declaration sets out that Frederick R. Wolters, in his lifetime, was the owner of 165 shares of the stock of the Newark Gas Company, which the defendant requested Wolters to sell to it; that Wolters told them he was unacquainted with the value of the shares, but that he would sell them for their value when the same could be ascertained and agreed upon between him and the defendant. It sets out that the defendant, knowing that Wolters was unacquainted with the value of the shares, fraudulently represented to Wolters that the defendant was desirous of purchasing all of the outstanding stock of the said Newark Gas Company, and that if Wolters would assign his stock to the defendant for the sum of $155 a share the defendant would enter into a contract with Wolters and would covenant, in case any of the outstanding stock of the Newark Gas Company should cost the defendant any more than $155 per share, that the defendant would at once pay to the said Wolters or his representatives such sum of money as would represent the difference between the price so paid and $155 a share. The narr. further sets out that in consequence of such representation, the said Wolters, believing that the defendant was desirous of purchasing all of the outstanding shares of capital stock of the Newark Gas Company, and that he would receive the highest price paid for any of the other outstanding shares, afterwards entered into an agreement for the purpose aforesaid, and the stock of Wolters was delivered to the defendant. The narr. then sets out that the defendant was not, at the time of making such representation, desirous of purchasing the other outstanding stock of the Newark Gas Company in the manner and form and under the terms set forth in the preamble of the said contract; but, on the contrary, the said defendant, before and at the time of the said false representations, was preparing to acquire the said outstanding stock in a manner other than that set forth in the preamble of the contract, as defendant well knew; that the intent of said agreement and covenants was, not that Wolters should receive for his shares a sum equal to the highest price to be paid by the defendant for any other of the outstanding shares, but, as the defendant knew, the intent was to enable the defendant to defraud Wolters by binding him to a covenant which in no way interfered with the fraudulent designs of the defendant. The count then sets out that in the execution of said fraudulent designs the defendant acquired, either in its own right or as trustee, all of the capital stock of the said gas company, except 200 shares, and, for the purpose of defrauding Wolters, by means of the agreement into which Wolters had been fraudulently induced to enter by the false representations of the defendant, the defendant acquired in its own right the shares of those stockholders who it was willing to trust to an agreement similar to the one which Wolters had been induced to enter into or were willing to sell at the same or less price than that set forth in the said agreement, and acquired in trust the shares of those stockholders, who knew the value of the shares and would not sell without having received therefor full consideration; that the defendant bought, as trustee, 720 shares from Zabriskie and 50 shares from Fleming; that Zabriskie received $308 a share and Fleming $305 a share. This count further states that Wolters, by the means set forth, lost the value of the shares over and above the sum of $155 a share. The second count sets out the same representations as those contained in the first count, the same contract, and the delivery of the stock. It then charges that the defendant was not desirous of purchasing all the outstanding stock of the Newark Gas Company, but was desirous only of purchasing such stock as it could by like false representations and pretenses, and such stock as it could purchase at the same or less price, and it was desirous of acquiring as trustee all those shares of stock for which the holders received a higher price than that paid by the defendant to the plaintiff. It then sets out a purchase by the defendant as trustee at a higher price. The first count differs from the second count in that it sets out a desire of the defendant to acquire as trustee or in exchange for other securities, all those shares for which the holders received a price higher than $155 a share. The third count is substantially the same as the second. There is a demurrer to each of the three counts.

The first count is defective, in that it does not charge with certainty what the false intention of the defendant was. It charges that the defendant was not desirous of purchasing the other outstanding stock in the manner and form and in the terms set forth in the preamble of the said contract under its seal as aforesaid; but, on the contrary, was preparing to acquire such stock in a manner other than that set forth in the preamble of the craftily worded contract. There is no contract set out in, attached to, or made a part of the declaration by reference thereto in the declaration. What is meant by the preamble to the contract does not appear. For this reason alone there must be judgment for the defendant upon the demurrer to the first count.

The second and third counts first charge that the defendant, for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to sell all its block of gas stock at a certain price, represented that it was desirous of purchasing all the outstanding stock of the Newark Gas Company, and that it would pay the plaintiff a price equal to the highest price which the defendant should pay for any other of the said stock. The counts then charge that the defendant was not desirous of purchasing all the outstanding stock of the Newark Gas Company, but was desirous only of purchasing such stock as it could purchase by contracts similar to that made with the plaintiff, and such stock as it could buy at the same or less price, and was desirous of purchasing as trustee all those shares of stock for which the holders received a higher price. The counts then charge that the defendant did not buy for itself all the outstanding shares of stock, but bought only such as it could buy for the same or less sum than that paid to the plaintiff, and bought, not for itself, but as trustee, such stock as cost more than the price paid to the plaintiff. If it be assumed that the representations so charged stated a condition of mind in the plaintiff equivalent to an intention to purchase for itself all the stock, the question would arise whether the falsity of that statement, followed by a failure of the defendant to carry out that intention to the injury of the plaintiff, lay a foundation for an action of deceit. It seems to be settled that the false statement of an intention may constitute a fraud for which the courts will grant relief. It is true that Mr. Kerr observes: "As distinguished from the false representation of a fact, the false representation as to a matter of intention, not amounting to a fact, though it may have influenced the transaction, is not a fraud at law; nor does it afford a ground for relief in equity." Kerr on Fraud and Mistake, 88. On the other hand, Mr. Bigelow says: "That to profess an intent to do or not to do, when a party intends the contrary, is as clear a case of misrepresentation and of fraud as could be made." Bigelow on Fraud, 484. The cases cited by Mr. Kerr in support of his text, when analyzed, do not support his observation. The latest case of which I am aware in the English courts is that of Eddington v. Fitz Maurice, 29 Ch. Div. 459. This was an action to recover money paid through the influence of a misrepresentation through a prospectus issued by the directors stating that the object of the company was to spend the money raised for certain purposes, when in fact the purposes stated were not the real purposes. The Court of Appeals held that the misstatement of the intention of the defendant was a misstatement of fact, and the plaintiff was permitted to recover the money paid through the influence of the misrepresentation. Then there is a line of cases holding that, if one purchases property on credit with an intention never to pay for it, he is guilty of fraud. In none of these cases, however, with one exception, did the question arise in an action for deceit. They were all cases resting upon the right to rescind, and to recover the money paid and property delivered on the faith of false representation of intention. In a note to Pollock on Torts, p. 242, it is said that whether an action for deceit would lie for such a false representation of intent is a speculative question. The exceptional case to which I have alluded is Swift v. Rounds, 19 R. I. 527, 35 Atl. 45, 33 L. R. A. 561, 61 Am. St. Rep. 791, in which it was held that an action for deceit, for a false statement of intention to pay for goods sold on credit, would lie.

A further discussion, however, of what would have been the situation had the plaintiff set out a representation by the defendant that it intended to purchase for itself all the stock of the gas company, and that it would pay as much to the plaintiff as it was compelled to pay to any other stockholder, and had then charged that the defendant had no intention, when its declaration was made, to purchase all the stock for itself, and had purchased parts of it, as trustee, at a higher price, would be profitless. Such discussion is out of place, because the representation stated in the counts falls short of that just indicated.

The statement that the defendant was desirous of purchasing all the stock does not amount to a statement that the defendant intended to buy all the stock. Nor does the statement of a desire to buy all the stock, when coupled with a promise to pay to plaintiff any excess over $155 a share which it should pay any other stockholder, signify that the defendant intended to buy all the stock of the gas company. The statement only indicated that the desire of the defendants to purchase was such as might lead it to purchase at a price greater than that paid to the plaintiff. If the defendant had bought for itself at a price higher than $155 a share, the contingent promise would have become an absolute promise by the happening of the contingency. Nevertheless the defendant was not bound to buy such outstanding stock at any price which might be asked for it, nor, indeed, was it bound to buy at all. The pleader's view of the scope of the representation is shown by his allegation of its falsity. The counts do not merely assert that the representation was false, but state in what way it was false. The pleader does not content himself with an assertion that the defendant was not desirous of purchasing all the stock, but sets out what its desire really was. He says it was to buy either by contracts similar to the contract made with the plaintiff, and to buy as trustee whenever it could not buy for itself at $155 or less per share. It seems entirely clear that a subsequent contract to pay another stockholder the same amount as it had agreed to pay plaintiff would not be a violation of the alleged expressed intention to buy all the stock. If, therefore, the intention to do this existed at the time the representation was made, it did not exhibit any falsity in the representation, even if the representation was of an intention to buy all the stock.

But, as already observed, the expression was not so comprehensive. It did not state an intention to buy stock at any price, however great, necessary to obtain it. If the price asked was in excess of what the defendant was willing to pay, there was no representation that it would buy for itself. It follows, therefore, that there was nothing in the representation which destroyed the ability of the defendant, as agent or trustee, to buy for another purchaser who was willing to pay the excessive price. If, therefore, the defendant represented that it was desirous of buying all the gas stock, and if its real intention was that set out in these counts, nevertheless the pleader exhibits no legal injury to the plaintiff resulting from defendant's conduct as charged in the second and third counts.

There should be judgment for the defendant upon each demurrer.

STATE v. HILL.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 15, 1906.)

1. INDICTMENT—DUPLICITY.

A defendant can be charged in the same count of an indictment with uttering and also with exposure to the view of another an indecent picture, in violation of section 53, p. 808, of the Acts of 1898.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Indictment and Information, § 337.]

2. OBSCENITY — INDECENT PICTURES — EVIDENCE.

Evidence of either uttering or of exposing to the view of another of indecent pictures will support a general verdict of guilty upon such a count.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Obscenity, § 5.]

3. SAME.

Where it appears that the defendant took a person into a room in which there was a book containing indecent pictures, and pointing to the book said, "There they are," whereupon the person opened the book and inspected the pictures, held, that the evidence was sufficient to support the charge of exposing the pictures to the view of another; held, that the evidence did not support the charge of uttering the pictures.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Court of Quarter Sessions, Essex County.

George Hill was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

Argued June term, 1905, before the CHIEF JUSTICE, and FORT, PITNEY, and REED, JJ.

Thomas S. Henry, for plaintiff in error.
Henry Young, for the State.

REED, J. This writ of error brings up a judgment entered upon a conviction of the plaintiff in error for a violation of section 53 of the Crimes Act of 1898 (P. L. 1898, p. 808). This section provides that any person who, without just cause, shall utter or expose to the view of another, or have in his possession with intent so to utter or expose to view or to sell the same, any obscene or indecent book, pamphlet, picture, etc., shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. The indictment charged that George Hill did without just cause utter and expose to the view of two persons two obscene pictures.

The counsel for the plaintiff in error asserts that the indictment is defective in charging two distinct offenses, namely, the offense of uttering and also the offense of exposing to view two indecent pictures. If this insistence possessed any substance, it is urged at a stage of the case too late to be cognizable by this court. Larison v. State, 49 N. J. Law, 258, 9 Atl. 700, 60 Am. Rep. 606. But this objection is entirely without substance. The offense of uttering and that of exposing to view could each have been charged in a distinct count. But it is not essential to the validity of the indictment that they should have been so charged. The rule is entirely settled that, if a statute makes it a crime to do this or that, mentioning several things disjunctively, the indictment may, as a general rule, embrace the whole in a single count; but it must use the conjunctive "and" where "or" occurs in the statute, else it will be defective as being uncertain. Bish. Cr. Pro. § 581; People v. Davis, 56 N. Y. 95-101; Comm. v. Grey, 2 Gray, 501, 61 Am. Dec. 476; State v. Price, 11 N. J. Law, 203-215. There are doubtless instances where the offenses disjunctively set out in a statute are so dissimilar in substance that a separate count for each may be necessary. But the offenses created by the statute now under consideration are not of this kind. The acts mentioned in section 53, supra, all belong to the same transaction, each one of which may be considered as representing a phase of the same offense. They could therefore, with entire propriety, be included in one count. State v. Bartholomew, 69 N. J. Law, 162, 54 Atl. 231.

Our attention is next directed to the fact that there was a general verdict of guilty. It is insisted that there was no evidence sufficient to support a verdict for either uttering or exposing to view; and it is further pressed that, if only an exposure to view is proven and not an uttering also, the offense charged is unproven, and judgment should be reversed. The testimony supporting the charges was this, namely: The defendant, Hill, was in a room where there was a book lying upon a bureau. In the book were the indecent pictures. Hill pointed to this book and said to Deering, whom Hill had previously promised to show some pictures: "There they are. There are the pictures on the bureau. When you get through with them turn the gas down low." Deering went over to the bureau, or table, picked up the book and looked at the pictures. In the meantime Hill had gone into another room, but returned just as Deering, after examining the pictures, started to leave the room. Deering then asked Hill what he would charge for one of the pictures. Hill said that he would not sell it. If the jury believe this testimony, it could draw the conclusion that Hill exposed to the view of Deering the pictures, within the meaning of the statute. It is true that Hill did not himself open the book in which the pictures were concealed. But he directed Deering to where the pictures were, and invited him by his words and conduct to inspect them. Hill was the exhibitor on this occasion. If he had taken Deering into a gallery of lewd pictures each covered by a veil, and had told Deering that there were the pictures for his inspection, it would matter nothing that Deering himself pulled aside the veils in making his examination. Hill would still be the showman. He would be the one who, in the language of the statute, exposed the pictures to view. So, in the present case, he exposed the pictures in the book as obviously as if he himself had opened the book and thus exhibited the pictures to the visitor. While there was thus evidence of an exposure to view, we are of the opinion that there was not evidence of an uttering of the pictures within the meaning of the statutory language. The word "utter" means to put out, to pass off. There was no attempt by Hill to do this with these pictures; to the contrary, he refused to part with one of them. It is true that there may be an uttering of forged paper or counterfeit money without an actual tradition of the paper or the money. Such an uttering rests upon a fact which cannot exist in connection with the subject-matter of the present statute. The fact upon which an uttering without delivery may exist respecting spurious money or paper is that the money or paper may be asserted to be genuine when in fact false. When the assertion is made for the purpose of deception and to gain something by leading another to believe in the genuineness of the paper or money, it amounts to an uttering. In the language of Mr. Bishop: "An attempt to cheat by such an instrument [forged instrument] is an indictable attempt. This attempt is called in law an uttering." 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 605. It is at once perceived that there was nothing in the exhibition of the pictures by Hill which was of the nature of a cheat. There was no assertion that the pictures were not what they appeared to be. Indeed, the statute was not dealing with cheats. Those utterings which consist, not in passing away, but in an attempt to use paper or money as a means of deceit, have no analogy with the utterings of indecent pictures. There being no delivery of the pictures or offer to transfer them, the charge of uttering them was not proved. But it cannot be conceded that, because there was evidence to support a conviction for exposure to view only, it follows that there must be a reversal of the judgment entered on the general verdict of guilty. The general rule is that, when an offense may be committed by doing one of several things, the indictment may in a single count group them together and charge the defendant with having committed them all, and a conviction may be had on proof of any one of these things without proof of the commission of the others. 4 Elliot, on Ev. § 2714; Roscoe's Cr. Ev. 763; 3 Russ. on Cr. 105; Reese v. Middlehurst, 1 Burrow, 399; Reese v. Hunt et al., 8 Camp. 583, 584; People v. Rynders, 12 Wend. 480; Harris v. People, 64 N. Y. 148; Bork v. People, 91 N. Y. 5-13; Comm. v. Grey, 2 Gray, 501-508, 61 Am. Dec. 476; Comm. v. Morgan, 107 Mass. 199. The verdict was good, although supported only by evidence of the exposure of the pictures to the view of Deering.

It is objected in the brief of the counsel for the plaintiff in error that the trial judge misstated the evidence in his charge to the jury. The error consisted in the statement to the jury that the state's witnesses had sworn that the defendant, Hill, opened the book and showed the pictures to Deering. This error is not specified among the causes for reversal; the whole record being certified. But it was not an injurious error. The question was whether Hill showed the pictures. In deciding this, it was immaterial whether Hill opened the book or invited Deering to do so. Deering's testimony was equally credible whether he swore to the one or the other of these facts.

There is no other specification requiring remark.

The judgment should be affirmed.

McGUINNESS v. McGuinness.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Feb. 13, 1906.)

DIVORCE—DECREE—ALIMONY—MOTION TO VACATE.

A wife filed a bill against her husband, praying a divorce from bed and board for his extreme cruelty, and also praying the custody of children of the marriage and alimony, etc. The subpoena issued thereon was returned without service, and an order of publication was made, notice of which was served on defendant in an adjoining state. Defendant not having appeared or made defense, the cause was referred to a special master, who reported that the complainant had established by proofs, the allegations of her bill. Thereupon a decree was made for the divorce sought, awarding the custody of the children and fixing the amount of alimony. Property of defendant in this state was afterward sequestered to enforce the decree. Defendant thereafter filed a petition in the cause, praying that the whole decree should be vacated and set aside and that the complainant's bill should be dismissed, on the ground that he had not been served with process within this state.

Held, that he is not entitled to any relief upon his petition.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Divorce, § 535.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Bill by Mary Ellen McGuinness against Thomas McGuinness for divorce. On rule to show cause why service of subpoena and orders for alimony and counsel fees should not be set aside. Discharged.

Clarence Kelsey, for complainant. Howard Carrow, for defendant.

MAGIE, Ch. On July 7, 1899, Mary Ellen McGuinness filed her bill in this court against her husband, Thomas McGuinness, praying for a divorce a mensa et thoro on the ground of extreme cruelty, for the custody of three of the four children of the marriage, and for the support of herself and the children whose custody she sought. A subpoena was issued upon the bill, returnable August 1, 1899, and was returned served by the sheriff of Hudson county. On the 7th of August, 1899, an order, returnable on August 14, 1899, was made, to show cause why an order should not be made for alimony pendente lite and counsel fees. On the hearing of that order a solicitor of this court appeared specially for the defendant, for the purpose of objecting to the sufficiency of the service of the notice of that application. Upon the proofs it was found that the service was good and sufficient for the purpose of the application for alimony and counsel fees, and an order was made directing payment. That order was made on September 11, 1899. On January 15, 1900, an order was made, upon the motion of a solicitor and counselor of this court, appearing for the defendant specially for that purpose, and upon the consent of the solicitor and counsel for the complainant, that the subpoena and return of the sheriff, and the order for temporary alimony and counsel fees, and all proceedings based thereon, should be set aside. Thereupon a new subpoena was issued, tested January 15, 1900, which was returned by the sheriff of Hudson county, with an affidavit of nonresidence, and on February 7, 1900, the usual order of publication was made. Notice of this order was shown to have been personally given to the defendant on February 7, 1900, in the manner required by the statute and the rules of court. The defendant having interposed no defense, the matter was referred to a special master. He reported on January 20, 1901, that the complainant had established her right to the relief she sought. On another and supplemental order the same master made an additional report, on March 13, 1901, upon the faculties of the defendant. Thereupon, on May 13, 1901, a final decree was made, decreeing a divorce from bed and board, giving the custody of the children to the complainant, and fixing the sum which should be paid for the future support of complainant and the three children. A certified copy of the final decree, and of the taxed bill of costs, was served on the defendant personally, on July 9, 1901, and a demand was made upon him for the payment of the costs and the amounts ordered to be paid by the decree, and he refused to comply therewith. Thereupon, on September 27, 1901, an order of sequestration was made, and John S. McMaster, one of the masters of this court, was appointed sequestrator. It appears from the records and files of this court that he has taken charge of some of the defendant's real estate, and has received the rents thereof under the authority of his appointment.

On February 24, 1902, the defendant filed a petition in the cause. It was signed by him and a firm of solicitors of this court. The petition set forth the proceedings, the final decree, and order of sequestration, and averred that the defendant was not, when the bill was filed, a resident of the state of New Jersey, and had not been served with process within this state, and for that reason, charged that not only the order for sequestration, but also the final decree should be vacated and set aside. Its prayers were that the enrollment in the cause be opened, that the final decree and all orders in the cause be opened and set aside; that the subpoena and service, and the writ of sequestration be set aside; that the complainant's bill be dismissed, and that the petitioner should have further relief. The petition was accompanied by affidavits. Upon this petition, an order to show cause why its prayers should not be granted, was advised by a vice chancellor upon the motion of defendant's solicitor and counsel. The order was returnable on March 3, 1902, and service of the order was directed to be made. For some unexplained reason, this order was not brought to hearing, and no service, as required, appears. The matter remained in this condition until April 3, 1905, when the present solicitor of defendant applied for, and obtained, an order substituting him for the firm of solicitors previously appearing for defendant, and thereupon, on his motion, another order to show cause why the prayers of the petition of February 24, 1902, should not be granted, was advised by another vice chancellor. That order was returnable on May 1, 1905. The hearing was adjourned to May 9, 1905, and it was then agreed by counsel that it should be heard by briefs, which were furnished about July 1, 1905. On the part of the defendant, no affidavits, other than those appended to the petition, have been presented. On the part of the complainant no affidavits have been presented. From these recitals, it is obvious that the prayers of defendant's petition are altogether too broad. In respect to some of them, there is not disclosed any ground on which they can be granted. By the files and records in the cause, as well as by the admissions of defendant's petition, it appears that the defendant was notified of the pendency of his wife's suit for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, in the manner which, under our statute and rules, gave jurisdiction to this court to decree a divorce from bed and board for that cause. He was afforded an opportunity to contest her claim if he desired to do so. He failed to present any defense. Thereupon adjudication was made that the cause alleged was proved, and the divorce asked was decreed.

There can be no question of the power of this court to make such a decree. Felt v. Felt, 59 N. J. Eq. 606, 45 Atl. 105, 49 Atl. 1071, 47 L. R. A. 546, 88 Am. St. Rep. 612. The jurisdiction has been exercised in innumerable cases, from the time of the earliest divorce laws, and no serious question has ever been raised thereon. The power to make such decrees, upon such notice to a defendant, has been declared by our Court of Errors to be conferred upon this court, and it has been recognized as the public policy of the state on the subject of divorce. A résumé of the legislation on the subject is contained in the opinion of Vice Chancellor Pitney in Wallace v. Wallace, 62 N. J. Eq. 509, 50 Atl. 788. When that case came before the Court of Errors, it was there declared that, upon our statute, and service of notice of the suit out of the state of New Jersey, a decree of divorce could be made having extraterritorial force. 65 N. J. Eq. 361, 54 Atl. 433. Nor do I think there is any possible doubt as to the jurisdiction exercised in this case in making a decree respecting the children of the marriage. When courts are empowered to separate husband and wife and to break up the family, in my judgment, it necessarily follows that power is given to make provision for the custody of the offspring of the marriage thus interfered with. By section 19 of the divorce act of 1874 (2 Gen. St. p. 1269) the Legislature empowered this court, when it decreed a divorce to take order adjudicating upon the care and maintenance of the children, and still broader powers are now conferred by section 19 of the present divorce act (P. L. 1902, p. 507). Jurisdiction to decree a divorce a mensa et thoro was invoked by complainant's bill, and in my judgment, a decree respecting the custody of children of the marriage, may be supported upon the jurisdiction to decree the divorce and as an incident thereto.

Since the decision of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 565, it has been frequently held that a decree awarding alimony cannot be effectually made against a defendant not served with process within the jurisdiction of the court making the decree. It has been declared in this court that while a decree for alimony, which was purely a decree in personam, would be subject to the doctrine of Pennoyer v. Neff, yet it might be otherwise as to such a decree, if based on the control of the matrimonial status, by a court having jurisdiction over that status. Hervey v. Hervey, 56 N. J. Eq. 168, 38 Atl. 767. That was a case in which a wife sought a decree against a husband for support and maintenance, under the twentieth section of the divorce act, and an interlocutory order had been made for temporary alimony. The defendant, not having been served with process, entered a special appearance to move, and did move, to set aside that order. That motion was denied. Upon an appeal from such denial, the order therefor was reversed, upon the ground that, as the defendant had not been brought in by process served, nor proceeded against by publication and notice as a nonresident, no jurisdiction had been conferred by the twentieth section, to make an order for alimony pendente lite on the ground that the defendant owned property in New Jersey. 56 N. J. Eq. 424, 39 Atl. 762. In a subsequent case, a decree for divorce and alimony had been made upon service of a notice of an order or publication, upon the defendant, in the state of his residence, and the defendant, having come into this state, had been seised and held to bail on a ne exeat. The defendant, having moved to discharge the writ and vacate the order for bail, the motion prevailed on the ground that the decree in such a case was purely in personam, and fell within the doctrine of Pennoyer v. Neff. Elmendorf v. Elmendorf, 58 N. J. Eq. 113, 44 Atl. 164.

It will be observed that the case last referred to is one in which the relief primarily sought, was the complete abolition of the marriage relation between the parties. Alimony was sought as an incident of that kind of relief. Among the numerous cases in which the subject I am now considering has been discussed, and in which the doctrine of Pennoyer v. Neff has been applied to judgments or decrees for alimony, I have failed to find any in which the primary relief did not involve the complete severance of the marriage relation. The case before me is of a different character, and the relief sought by this bill of a less stringent nature. It seeks a divorce from bed and board for extreme cruelty. Under the divorce act then in force, this court was empowered, for such a marital offense, to decree a divorce from bed and board either forever thereafter, or for a limited period, as should seem just and reasonable. Upon such decrees, jurisdiction is conferred on the Chancellor to make orders for the maintenance of the wife and children, and to enforce such orders upon the husband's property which can be reached by sequestration. Decrees of divorce from bed and board do not involve any severance of the marital relation. The parties remain husband and wife. The wife retains her right of dower in the lands of the husband. The husband will not thereby be deprived of curtesy in his wife's lands. Alimony upon such a separation is merely the enforcement of the duty which the husband owes, to support her who is still his wife, and his family. Mr. Nelson declares that an allowance on a decree of separation is equivalent to the award of alimony by the ecclesiastical courts of England upon a decree of divorce a mensa et thoro. 2 Nelson on Divorce, § 902. The distinction between alimony in the two cases seems recognized in the opinion of Mr. Justice Pitney in Lynde v. Lynde, 64 N. J. Eq. 736, 750, 52 Atl. 694, 58 L. R. A. 471, 97 Am. St. Rep. 692. In the case of Bunnell v. Bunnell (C. C.) 25 Fed. 214, which is recognized as a leading case on the subject of the application of the doctrine of Pennoyer v. Neff to decrees for alimony, Mr. Justice Brown suggested that if the state permitted the wife to proceed in her claim for alimony as upon an inchoate lien, the proceeding might be considered as one in rem, and a decree upon a service by publication might be sustained. If it were necessary to the decision of the present motion, I should hold that, considering the peculiar character of this proceeding which leaves the marital relation unbroken and recognizes the right to enforce the husband's duty of support of his wife and family, and the provisions of our statute for enforcing a decree which fixes the amount of such support, upon the husband's property in this state, this decree for alimony, although perhaps not enforceable in another state, is enforceable here.

There is another ground, however, upon which the relief sought by defendant's petition must be denied. It is well-settled doctrine that if a defendant who claims that the court in which the suit is pending has not acquired jurisdiction over him, attacks the jurisdiction, even under a special appearance, he will be held to have submitted himself to the jurisdiction, if under such appearance he seeks some relief upon the merits. The doctrine is recognized by the text-books and illustrated by many cases, the leading case being that of Livingston's Ex'r v. Story, 11 Pet. (U. S.) 351, 9 L. Ed. 746. It was adopted and applied by our Court of Errors to a case where the defendant answered in full on the merits, although he had attempted to reserve an objection to the jurisdiction, which he presented by a plea to the jurisdiction, which had been overruled. Poilemus v. Holland Trust Co., 61 N. J. Eq. 654, 47 Atl. 417. The reason of this doctrine is equally applicable to proceedings to challenge the validity of a judgment on the ground that jurisdiction of the defendant had not been acquired. If, under such proceedings, he ask other relief against the judgment on the merits, he will be held to have submitted himself to the jurisdiction. In Crane v. Penny (D. C.) 2 Fed. 187, Judge Choate, in dealing with an application of a defendant to vacate a judgment taken by default, which included other relief and a stay pending the application, held that the defendant had thereby submitted himself to the jurisdiction, so that all defects therein were cured. In Burdette v. Corgan, 26 Kan. 102, Judge Brewer held that when a party against whom a judgment has been entered, files a motion to vacate it as void, and the motion is based on nonjurisdictional as well as jurisdictional grounds, he thereby enters a general appearance. The doctrine is illustrated by many other cases. Grantier v. Rosecrance, 27 Wis. 488; Anderson v. Coburn, 27 Wis. 558; Alderson v. White (per Dixon, C. J.) 32 Wis. 308; Blackburn v. Sweet, 38 Wis. 578; Dikeman v. Struck, 76 Wis. 332, 45 N. W. 118; Henry v. Henry (S. D.) 87 N. W. 522; Curtis v. Jackson, 23 Minn. 268; Yorke v. Yorke (N. D.) 55 N. W. 1095; Pry v. Han. & St. Jos., 73 Mo. 123.

Defendant's application, which is to vacate, not merely the decree for alimony and its incidents, but the whole decree, although it appears that under the order of publication and service of notice thereof the court acquired jurisdiction to decree divorce and custody of children, must be denied. I come to this conclusion more readily because the case shows that, while the matrimonial domicile was in this state, defendant was guilty of such extreme cruelty as justified his wife seeking the relief afforded by our statute; that although defendant left the state in time to avoid service of process, yet he went only to an adjoining state, and was served there with notice of the pendency of her suit; that although he thus knew of complainant's claim, he made no defense, and after decree and sequestration, waited nearly a year before he filed this petition and procured a rule to show cause, which for three years he failed to bring to hearing, although his property in this state, ample to afford a support for the wife he had ill-treated and the children she has to support, was under sequestration, and has only after this lapse of time and the changed circumstances come forward to interpose this technical defense.

As I think defendant is not entitled to any relief, his rule to show cause will be discharged, and his petition will be dismissed.

SIEGMAN v. KISSEL et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Feb. 10, 1906.)

CORPORATIONS—UNAUTHORIZED PAYMENT OF DIVIDENDS—LIABILITY OF DIRECTOR.

The corporation act (P. L. 1896, p. 286) provides that no corporation shall make dividends except from the surplus or net profits, and that directors, under whose administration a violation of the statute may occur, shall be liable to the corporation and to its creditors. Held that, where a director of a corporation voted for the payment of a dividend, knowing that it was to be paid from capital, the mere fact that a committee appointed by a new board of directors, and the board itself, and a majority of the stockholders, deemed an action against the director in question "inexpedient," was no bar to the maintenance of an action against him by a stockholder.

Suit by Richard Siegman against Rudolph H. Kissel and others. Heard on bill and plea and motion to overrule plea. Motion granted.

R. V. Lindabury, for complainant. James E. Howell, for defendants.

STEVENS, V. C. The question raised by the plea has been very recently twice considered: First, by Vice Chancellor Garrison, in Groel v. United Electric Company (N. J. Ch.) 61 Atl. 1061; and, then, by Judge Lanning, in Siegmán v. Electric Vehicle Company (C. C.) 140 Fed. 117. In both cases the plea was overruled. The case in the United States Circuit Court is identical with the one in hand. Were it not that an appeal is to be taken, I should not think it necessary to write an opinion. As it is, I shall state, as briefly as possible, the ground upon which I think the suit is sustainable.

The complainant bases his case upon section 80 of the corporation act (P. L. 1896, p. 286), which provides that no corporation shall make dividends except from the surplus or net profits arising from its business, and that in case of a violation of the provision the directors under whose administration the same may happen "shall be jointly and severally liable at any time within six years after paying such dividend to the corporation and to its creditors in the event of its dissolution or insolvency." In Appleton v. American Malting Co., 85 N. J. Eq. 375, 54 Atl. 454, the Court of Appeals construed this provision and held that it gave a remedy, not only in cases of insolvency or dissolution, but also in cases where the company was going and solvent. The bill alleges that on April 1, 1889, the board of directors of the Electric Vehicle Company declared a dividend of 8 per cent. on the preferred stock and 2 per cent. on the common stock, and that these dividends aggregated $184,800, and that on June 30, 1899, they declared a further dividend of $140,000. It then alleges that the defendant Rudolph H. Kissel, a director of the company, at meetings of its directors, voted to declare said dividends, and that the same, to the knowledge of Kissel, were declared and paid, not out of the surplus or net profits, but out of capital. Under the decision above cited Kissel thus became liable to make them good. Now the plea does not deny these allegations. What it sets up, and all that it sets up, is this: That after the declaration and payment of these dividends an entirely new board of directors was chosen; that such board, after being requested to sue, appointed a committee to examine and report upon the matter; that the committee reported against bringing suit, and that the board, after examination, approved the report and adopted a resolution that the company should not sue unless a majority in interest of the stockholders, other than the former directors, so ordered; that at the demand of complainant a meeting of stockholders was called, at which complainant was represented, and that by a vote of 124,759 to 650 it was resolved by them that no just ground for suit against the former directors existed, and that, it not being expedient or for the interest of the company to bring suit, the action of the directors in refusing to do so was ratified and approved. This plea does not deny that the dividends in question were declared and paid out of capital, and that Kissel knew that they were; consequently, it does not deny that there was a clear cause of action against Kissel for $324,800. All that it sets up in excuse or justification for not bringing suit is that the present directors and a large majority of the stockholders now think that no just ground exists therefor, and that it is not for the interest of the company to prosecute; in other words, admitting that, under the statute, Kissel is liable to refund the money, it is not thought fair to him or expedient for the company to enforce the liability. Now, as I understand the decisions, and as Judge Lanning, on an identical state of facts, decided, neither of these reasons is good as against dissenting stockholders.

In Dumphy v. Traveler Newspaper Association, 146 Mass. 495, 16 N. E. 428, the court said that it is not always best to insist upon all one's rights; that a corporation acting by its directors or by vote of its members may properly refuse to bring a suit which one of its stockholders believes should be prosecuted; and that in such case the will of the majority must control, but they add, "the court cannot interfere with the management of corporations in matters which are properly within their discretion, so long as their discretion is fairly exercised."

In Corbus v. Alaska Treadwell Gold Mining Co., 187 U. S. 455, 23 Sup. Ct. 167, 47 L. Ed. 256, Mr. Justice Brewer says: "This court will examine the bill in its entirety and determine whether under all the circumstances the plaintiff has made such a showing of wrong on the part of the corporation or its officers and injury to himself as will justify the suit. The directors represent all the stockholders and are presumed to act honestly and according to their best judgment for the interest of all. Their judgment as to any matter lawfully confided to their discretion may not lightly be challenged by any stockholder or, at his instance, submitted for review to a court of equity. The directors may sometimes properly waive a legal right vested in the corporation, in the belief that its best interests will be prompted by not insisting on such right. They may regard the expense of enforcing the right or the furtherance of the general business of the corporation in determining whether to waive or insist upon the right. As said in Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. (U. S.) 344, 15 L. Ed. 401: 'The circumstances of each case must determine the jurisdiction of a court of equity to give the relief sought.'

In the Corbus Case the relief was denied; in the Dodge-Woolsey Case it was granted under the following circumstances: Woolsey was a shareholder in the Branch Bank of Cleveland. The bank was incorporated under an act of the state of Ohio, which provided that it should be taxed in a certain mode. It was subsequently sought to impose a greater tax. The contention on behalf of the bank was that the first act constituted a contract on the subject of taxation which the subsequent legislation impaired, and such was the view taken by the Supreme Court. The directors, it was alleged in the bill, had been requested by Woolsey to take measures by suit or otherwise to assert the franchises of the bank against the collection of the unconstitutional tax, and, while admitting the illegality of the tax, had refused, "because of the many obstacles in the way of testing the law in the courts of the state." Although the case was devoid of any element of ultra vires, fraud, or oppression, the Supreme Court held that the suit was maintainable; in other words, the constitutional right to protection against the imposition of a further tax being adjudged, the stockholder was permitted, as the representative of the company, to override the judgment of the directors on the question of the expediency of testing the right in the courts.

This case appears to me to control the decision of the case in hand. We must, as the pleadings stand, regard the right of recovery against Kissel to be clear, for, as I have said, it is expressly averred in the bill that he knew that the dividends were all paid out of capital, and, notwithstanding this knowledge, voted for their payment. This makes a perfectly clear case against him, however the matter may stand as to the others. The fact that a committee of the directors may have thought that, as to the liability of the directors generally, in office when the dividends were declared, there might be some doubt or question, is immaterial; for, taking the facts to be as alleged by the bill and not denied by the plea, this doubt does not extend to Kissel. Then, the only other ground assigned for not suing is found in the bare statement that suit is inexpedient. But if the circumstances of each case are to determine the question of jurisdiction, then, the right being clear, it ought to appear why it is inexpedient. If Kissel be solvent, and there is no intimation of insolvency, and if the right to recover so large a sum ($324,000) be undoubted, some good reason should be given for not suing. But no reason whatever is given. The case, therefore, as it now stands, must be regarded as falling rather within the ruling of Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. (U. S.) 344, 15 L. Ed. 401, than within that of Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U. S. 450, 26 L. Ed. 827, and Corbus v. Mining Co., 187 U. S. 455, 23 Sup. Ct. 157, 47 L. Ed. 253.

SNEDAKER v. SNEDAKER.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 30, 1906.)

DIVORCE — DESERTION — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

In divorce by the wife, her testimony that defendant left her, stating that when he got work he would send for her, and that he afterwards obtained work but failed to do so, did not establish a desertion at the time of the breach of the promise, where the promise was shown only by her uncorroborated evidence.

Suit for divorce by one Snedaker. Confirmation of master's report in favor of plaintiff denied.

Alfred F. Stevens, for petitioner.

MAGIE, Ch. Having doubted whether the report in favor of the relief sought by this petition was supported by the evidence, I have heard counsel, and reconsidered the proofs. The petitioner's evidence as to the circumstances under which defendant left her is wholly uncorroborated. She states, however, that he told her he was going to Far Rockaway to get work, and promised to send for her when he got work. If her uncorroborated evidence be given probative force, it indicates no then existing intent on the part of the defendant to desert his wife. The proof that he afterward procured remunerative work and failed to send for her will not establish a desertion at the time of such breach of his promise, because the evidence of his promise depends upon her uncorroborated evidence, and the sole proof that defendant obtained remunerative employment fixes the date as about September, 1903. If from that it can be inferred that he then intended to abandon his wife, the period fixed by the statute had not expired when this petition was filed, on May 22, 1905.

The master's report cannot be confirmed.

SPEER v. ERIE R. CO.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 21, 1906.)

1. RAILROADS—ROAD CROSSINGS—USE—COVENANTS IN RIGHT OF WAY GRANT.

A strip of land through a farm was conveyed to a railroad for a right of way by a deed in which the railroad covenanted to provide the grantor with a convenient road crossing. One of the severed portions of the farm was intersected by a road, but there was no method of egress from the other portion, except over the railroad crossing, and through the intersected portion to the road. Held, that the right to use the crossing was not limited to the use of it as a farm crossing, but that the original grantor and his grantees had a right to use it for any purpose to which the land became adapted.

2. SAME—PERSONS ENTITLED.

The right to use the crossing was not restricted to the original grantor and his grantees of the whole tract, but grantees of subdivisions thereof were entitled to use it.

3. SAME—GATES AT CROSSING—RIGHT TO MAINTAIN.

A strip of land through a farm was conveyed to a railroad for a right of way by a deed in which the railroad covenanted to provide the grantor with a convenient road crossing and make necessary fences on both sides of the track. The railroad company erected fences with gates at the crossing composed of sliding bars. Held, that the company had no absolute right to maintain these bars after they had become unnecessary and inconvenient, because the land had ceased to be used for agricultural purposes and been platted and sold for residence lots.

4. SAME—DESTRUCTION OF CROSSING—DAMAGES.

In a suit to enjoin the maintenance by a railroad company of an embankment destroying a crossing to which complainant was entitled under a covenant in his grantor's deed to the railroad company, evidence held to show that complainant was damaged to the extent of $3,000.

Bill by Abram Speer against the Erie Railroad Company to restrain defendant from maintaining an embankment where complainant had a private road crossing the railway tracks. A decree requiring defendant to open a tunnel under the tracks was reversed, with directions to retain the bill for the purpose of assessing complainant's damages. On hearing as to damages sustained.

See 60 Atl. 197.

Mr. Faulks and Mr. Barrett, for complainant. Cortlandt Parker, Jr., and R. Wayne Parker, for defendant.

STEVENS, V. C. The bill in this case was filed to restrain the defendant from maintaining its embankment where the complainant had a road crossing over defendant's railway, between the severed portions of his farm. This court decreed that the company should construct a tunnel or opening through the embankment, substantially at grade, such opening to be not less than 12 feet in height and width. On appeal it was thought that this direction was too onerous. It was held that the complainant's right to a crossing was not destroyed by the elevation of the tracks, but it was thought that the complainant was only, under the circumstances, entitled to damages, and that, if he was willing to have them assessed in this court, the bill might be retained for that purpose. The submission has been made. The question thus presented is not without difficulty, for the amount of damages will depend upon the precise nature of the complainant's right. If the crossing is to be regarded as a mere farm or agricultural crossing, and not a crossing for all purposes, I think that $500 would be an adequate compensation for its destruction. But, if the crossing is to be regarded as a crossing for all the purposes for which the land is or may become adapted, then I think that his damages are considerably greater. In the opinion on the application for injunction, I held that the covenant that the predecessor of the defendant company would "provide the party of the first part with a suitable and convenient road crossing across the track of said railway" gave an unlimited right—a right of passage for all purposes. I do not find in the opinion on appeal any dissent from this view, and further reflection has only confirmed me in its soundness. Speer, the complainant's ancestor, when he conveyed to the railroad company in June, 1870, was the owner of a farm extending easterly from Cliffside avenue to Valley Road, and thence across Valley Road to a line about 800 feet distant therefrom. The railroad, running north and south, cut this farm in two. The tract which lay west of the railroad embankment contained a little more than nine acres, and was completely severed, not only from the land lying east of the embankment and west of the Valley Road, but also from the dwelling house and barn, which lay east of that highway, and could only be reached, without trespassing upon neighboring property, by making a long circuit of three-quarters to seven-eighths of a mile.

Now, Speer's right being a right to pass from the land west of the railway to the land on both sides of Valley Road and to Valley Road itself and back again, can it be said that, if he had built a house or barn on the severed tract, he would not have had the right of passage therefrom to Valley Road? And if he had built two or three houses would not his right have been the same? And suppose he had conveyed the entire farm to two or three, or twenty persons as tenants in common, would they not have acquired the same right? Where do we find it written or implied in the covenant that, when Speer ceased to use the land for agricultural purposes, his right to pass over the crossing terminated? The language of Jessel, M. R., in Newcomen v. Coulson, 5 Ch. Div. 183, is applicable to the situation here. "It was said that the grant conferred a right to use the way only so long as the allotment was used for agricultural purposes. I cannot find any such restriction. The right is to the owner or owners for the time being of the land. Now, land, according to English law, includes everything on or under the soil. All buildings that you may erect on it; all mines that you may sink under it. I have no doubt that the word 'land' was used advisedly. This being so, it appears to me that the right is a general right of way—a right of way to all the houses that may be built on the land in question." That the right as Speer had it passed to his grantees has been conclusively settled in this case; for the suit has been adjudged by the Court of Errors to be maintainable by the present complainant, who is the heir of the original grantee.

But it is contended, further, that, while Speer and his grantees of the entire farm would have the right, a grantee of a lot in the tract west of the railway would not have it, and that consequently the possibility of utilizing portions of the land for building purposes and selling it for those purposes cannot enter into the question of value or of damages. In other words, that, so far as this question is concerned, the land must be regarded as farm land only, for all time to come. The cases relied upon to support this contention are Marino v. Central R. R. Co., 69 N. J. Law, 628, 56 Atl. 306, and the Pipe Line Case, 62 N. J. Law, 254, 41 Atl. 759. In the first case a railroad company, empowered to take by condemnation, was required, by statute, to maintain over or under its road suitable wagonways where the railroad intersected the land of an individual owner "so that he may pass the same." It was held that the owner had a right of way across the railroad, appurtenant to each of his divided tracts, but that his right was not transmitted to a grantee of a portion of the lands lying only on one side of the railroad. Chancellor Magie said: "The right reserved and the duty imposed by that section [section 9 of the charter of the S. & E. R. R. Co.] is only in favor of the person who owned the lands intersected by the railroad when the railroad right was acquired by condemnation, or his grantees of the whole or a portion of said lands still intersected by the railroad." The decision was rested upon the authority of the Pipe Line Case. There one Stewart had conveyed to the Morris & Essex Railroad Company a strip of land on which to lay its tracks, with a reservation of "a suitable wagon road or crossing * * * so as to enable said Stewart to travel and cross freely between his lands on each side of said granted premises." The Stewart title, excepting the strip conveyed to the railroad, became vested in one Meagher. Meagher conveyed to Breckenridge, not the entire farm (see page 275 of 62 N. J. Law, and page 766 of 41 Atl.), but two lots, each 50 by 250 feet, one on the north side and the other on the south side of the lands conveyed to the railroad company. These lots adjoined such lands and extended on each side of them entirely across the passageway. It was conceded in that case that, under the various conveyances, Breckenridge had a right of crossing between these two lots thus severed, but it was held that such right did not give the right to lay oil pipes under the railway. Mr. Justice Depue said: "The laying of these pipes in the roadway in no sense conferred a benefit on the lands to which the way was appurtenant, nor were the pipes adapted to facilitate access between the two parcels of land to which the easement was appurtenant."

I have particularly mentioned these cases because it appears to me that, so far from supporting the position of defendant, they are authorities for the opposite view, at least to this extent: They concede that a grantee of a part of the land has a right of crossing if the land acquired lie on both sides of the crossing and adjoin it; and this, too, in cases where the right is a limited right and not a right of crossing for all purposes. In the Marino Case the right was held to be limited by statute in the same way that in the Pipe Line Case it was held to be limited by the explicit language of the deed. It was not decided in either of those cases that, where the crossing given was a crossing for all purposes, the lot owner, owning on one side, would not have the benefit of it. In the case of United Land Co. v. Great Eastern Railway Co., L. R. 10 Ch. App. 586, cited with approval in the Pipe Line Case, it was held that he would. But I am not obliged to decide whether he would or would not, for the reason that it is quite within the power of the complainant to avoid the question altogether. I must assume that, as a reasonable man, intent upon getting the full value of his property, he would subdivide his land so as to preserve and perpetuate all his rights. The complainant has put in evidence a map or plan. It, and the additional evidence, make it clear that at the time the embankment was built and the crossing destroyed the land in the neighborhood had come into the market for building purposes. New streets had been laid out around the Speer tract and new buildings had been erected. Upper Montclair had reached out to that point. The plan shows a road running east and west through the middle of the tract, touching the crossing east and west of the railway. It also shows lots plotted on both sides of it. Now, it would be easy for the complainant to give to each purchaser of such a lot a right of way along the whole course of this road, or, if that did not satisfy the requirements of the Marino and Pipe Line Cases, he could divide the land over which the road is shown into as many undivided parts as there are lots, and with each lot he could give one of these parts. The grantee of any lot would then own in fee simple land on both sides of the railway continuously from his lot to Valley Road.

But another and somewhat singular point has been raised. The entire clause in the Speer deed reads as follows: "The party of the second part [the railroad company] doth, for itself and its successors, agree to make and maintain the necessary fences on both sides of said tract of land, which shall be built before the grading on said tract is commenced and shall provide the party of the first part with a suitable and convenient road crossing across the track of said railway where the party of the first part may direct." The proof shows that the company made the fences and put in sliding rails at the crossing. The argument is that the company had a right to maintain these rails, that those who might have lawfully crossed would have been obliged to replace them as often as they took them down, and that the lots west of the track would have derived from such a crossing so obstructed little, if any, benefit. The evidence is that, if the lots fronted on a roadway thus barred, they would have less value than they would if the crossing were unobstructed.

The company's right is asserted to have been an absolute right to maintain bars, however inconvenient they might have been to the lot owners. The deed itself is silent on the subject. The general rule is that gates or bars may be placed at the terminus of a way, particularly an agricultural way. It is based on the great preponderance of convenience to the landowner, over the slight inconvenience to the way owner. It ceases when the preponderance of convenience is in favor of the way owner. God. on Eas. 331. In Jewell v. Clement (N. H.) 39 Atl. 582, Wallace, J., says: "From the creation of a way by deed in general terms, without a provision giving the owner of the land over which it passes, the right to erect gates or bars, neither a grant nor a denial of that right is necessarily to be implied. But the right to erect them cannot be implied if they constitute an unreasonable obstruction to the reasonable and proper use of the way. Neither party could have intended that the reserved way was to be subject to any unreasonable obstruction. Whether the erection of the bars by the plaintiff was a proper use of his premises, compatible with the defendant's reasonable enjoyment of the easement or was an unreasonable obstruction of the way is a question of fact." Gates or bars were deemed proper in the following, among other cases: Boyd v. Bloom (Ind. Sup.) 52 N. E. 751; Connerly v. Brooke, 73 Pa. 80; Short v. Devine (Mass.) 15 N. E. 148; Bakeman v. Talbot, 31 N. Y. 366, 88 Am. Dec. 275. The right to maintain them was denied in the following: Smith v. Worn (Cal.) 28 Pac. 944; Devore v. Ellis (Iowa) 17 N. W. 740; Jewell v. Clement (N. H.) 39 Atl. 582; Welch v. Wilcox, 101 Mass. 162, 100 Am. Dec. 113; Williams v. Clark (Mass.) 5 N. E. 802; Dickinson v. Whiting (Mass.) 6 N. E. 92. Williams v.

*Clark was the case of a railroad crossing. H. conveyed to a railroad company by a deed which provided that the company should furnish him with two convenient crossings, to be thereafter designated. One was so designated and a crossing built. Devens, J., said: "While, in terms, it was not provided that this crossing should be unobstructed by gates or bars, yet the fact that it was to be convenient, and that the company itself constructed and for many years permitted the existence of such a one, sufficiently shows that what it intended to grant was a free right of passage. No usage or circumstances such as are shown where one grants a way or right of way over a field devoted to agricultural or other purposes, indicating that the right granted is to be subordinate to the right of the grantor or the use made by him of the premises, here exist. That a crossing obstructed by gates or bars is far less convenient to those entitled to use it is fully conceded by the defendant's argument." In this case gates or bars were not erected in the first instance. In the case at bar they were. But I do not understand that this circumstance was regarded as decisive. It was one to be taken into account. Bakeman v. Talbot, supra, was the case of a way over a farm and wood land, where it was thought that "slip rails" or bars were not an unreasonable obstruction. Denio, C. J., used this language: "There is nothing inconsistent in holding the present arrangements are suitable and sufficient under existing circumstances; and, after these circumstances have changed, and the question shall arise as to what shall then be proper, to determine that a passage perpetually open or a system of gates better adapted to such increased use than the present fences and bars shall be required of the defendants. * * * The doctrine that the facilities for passage where a private right of way exists are to be regulated by the nature of the case and the circumstances of time and place is very well settled by authority." If a way given for all purposes cease to be used for agricultural purposes and become useful for other purposes, it may be adopted to those purposes. It is a well-established rule that, "In doing the works that are necessary for the enjoyment of the easement, the owner of the dominant tenement may do everything that is required for the full and free exercise of his right." Gale on Easements (7th Ed.) 464. In Finlanson v. Porter, L. R. 10 Q. B., 188, the grantee of an easement of drain was allowed to deepen it in order to adapt it to the sewer as altered by the local authority. In Dand v. Kingscote, 6 M. & W. 174, the proprietor of an old colliery who had a right of way to it, granted long before the days of railways, was held entitled to make a railway thereover, for the purpose of transmitting his coals. In* Newcomen v. Coulson, 5 Ch. Div. 138, Malins, V. C., held that a lane that had been used for agricultural purposes might be converted into a meted road for the benefit of newly erected cottages. His judgment was affirmed on appeal. In these cases the cost of the alteration was borne by the owners of the dominant tenement. I see no reason why if sliding rails, because of the changed use, become a source of danger rather than a means of safety, the owner of the dominate tenement may not become entitled to have substituted cattle guards, such as the law prescribes in the case of country roads, but, perhaps, notwithstanding the language of the deed, at his own expense. But whether he should do the work under the supervision of the railway officials or whether they should do it at his request and at his charge, or whether the company should do it at its own costs, is a matter of no consequence here; for the cost, in any event, would be so small that it would not materially affect the result.

This brings me to the question of the amount of damages to be awarded. The supplemental evidence makes it clear that the land is not to be treated as farm land. Excluding the lots on Mountain avenue and Valley Road, the most valuable part of the tract, the highest estimate of the interior land, about 9 acres, by any of the complainant's witnesses is $1,200 per acre, and the lowest estimate of any of defendant's is $300. The depreciation caused by the destruction of the way is variously estimated by complainant's witnesses at from $300 to $700 per acre; that is, from $2,700 to $6,300. These witnesses all agree that gates or bars would materially diminish the value of the land. Of the defendant's witnesses, two, Mr. Crane and Mr. VanDuyne, give an estimate of the value of the interior land on the basis of a crossing obstructed by gates or bars. They do not expressly estimate it on the basis of an unobstructed crossing. Of the other estimates for defendant, Hink thinks that the closing of the way has been of benefit to the property; while Holmes thinks it a detriment to the extent of $50 per acre. He says; "of course, land that has no interior access is not worth as much, ordinarily, as land that has." I do not think it can be doubted that an unobstructed passageway from the lots, as they would naturally be laid out, and as shown on complainant's map, to Valley Road, would be likely to make them more attractive to that class of buyers who would build houses costing from $3,000 to $4,000. The neighborhood is being rapidly improved by the erection of dwellings of that description, and this particular tract appears to be suitable for inexpensive residences. Buyers, without carriages of their own, would regard a direct way to Valley Road, a main thoroughfare with a trolley line on it leading into the heart of Montclair, as a considerable convenience, and as such it could not fail to have its influence upon the price. Such a road would, no doubt, be regarded as preferable to a more roundabout way over neighboring land, if complainant were able to purchase it.

It is necessarily a matter of conjecture as to how much complainant has been injured. Resort must be had to opinion evidence of a somewhat unsatisfactory kind. But it is the best available, and it has been necessitated by defendant's action in destroying complainant's right in the face of actual notice. Under these circumstances it does not seem to me that all doubts should be resolved in defendant's favor. I think the weight of the evidence fairly warrants a finding that the right destroyed is worth $3,000.

SAVIDGE v. MERRILL et ux.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 19, 1906.)

EASEMENTS—OBSTRUCTION OF ALLEY—INJUNCTION.

A preliminary injunction against obstruction of an alley is not justified by a bill alleging a contract by which C. leased the alley to S. for 99 years, each covenanting against obstructing it, with a provision that it was merely for the benefit of the two parties to drive over, the bill further alleging only that complainant bought from S. the portion of his real estate adjoining the alley, with its appurtenances, and not showing that the alley was appurtenant to complainant's land.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Easements, § 141.]

Bill by Reuben L. Savidge against Ella L. Merrill and wife for injunction. Preliminary injunction denied.

A. S. Applegate, for complainant.

BERGEN, V. C. The complainant presents his bill duly verified, and applies for a preliminary injunction. The application is based upon an alleged invasion of complainant's rights through the obstruction by the defendant of an alleyway over which the complainant claims he is entitled to pass and repossess without any interference. The obstructions, as stated in the bill, are the placing of a fence across the alley, and also the turning of surface waters from an old established waterway into the alley. The bill also charges that this diversion of water may injure the adjoining lands of the complainant in times of heavy rains, but as this allegation has no relation to the obstruction of the alleyway I can only consider so much of this part of the case as bears upon the question of interference with the complainant's use.

The complainant bases his right to the writ of injunction upon the following facts, viz.: In 1867 Josiah Cook and Reuben Savidge entered into a written agreement by the terms of which Cook "doth lease unto the party of the second part [Savidge] for the term of ninety-nine years, all that certain lot," etc., describing it by metes and bounds with great particularity. This paper writing contained mutual agreements against placing obstructions on the tract "as the meaning of the said road is just to drive in and out for the benefit of both parties."

The bill further shows that after the death of Reuben Savidge the complainant purchased from his executor that portion of the testator's real estate which adjoined the leased strip or road, with its appurtenances, and under it claims the rights which were conferred on his ancestor in title by the agreement or lease, notwithstanding it was not included in the conveyance to him by any description or reference. If we grant to this agreement a construction sufficient to establish an easement in the original grantee, it can be but an easement in gross, for there is no dominant tenement to which it is attached so far as the bill of complaint shows. As described in the papers, it is not appurtenant to complainant's land, at least the bill of complaint does not make the complainant's title as clear and positive as it should be to justify a preliminary injunction. If, on the other hand, as was held by the Court of Errors and Appeals in Black v. Del. & Rar. Canal Co., 24 N. J. Eq. 455-465, that for all "practical purposes, a lease for 999 years is a conveyance in fee," then the title to this strip of land would not necessarily pass as appurtenant to the adjoining property of the testator. The case made by this bill of complaint does not justify the preliminary writ asked for, but the bill will be held for final hearing, and if upon the coming in of the answer it shall appear that, in order to invoke the aid of this court, the complainant is required to establish his title at law, an opportunity to do so will be afforded him.

The present application is denied, but without prejudice.

PALEN et al. v. OCEAN CITY.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Jan. 26, 1906.)

1. DEDICATION—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether an owner dedicated a wharf to the public, Acid, under the evidence, a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Dedication, § 88.]

2. SAME—ABANDONMENT OF WHARF DEDICATED TO PUBLIC USE.

An owner dedicated to the public a wharf in a city. Subsequently the city adopted an ordinance which provided for a wharf master, and required him to see that vessels did not unnecessarily injure the wharf and to repair any damage thereto and collect from the owner of the vessel the damage done. It also fixed the charges for discharging or taking on cargo at the wharf. Held, that the ordinance did not operate as an abandonment of the public user of the wharf.

3. SAME—AUTHORITY TO DISCHARGE PUBLIC RIGHT IN WHARF—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

P. L. 1897, p. 69, § 48, par. 1, providing that city councils may by ordinance vacate "any street, road, highway or alley," does not, when construed in connection with section 18, par. 7 (page 52), empowering councils to regulate streets, highways, wharves, etc., authorize a city council to discharge the public right in a wharf dedicated to the public; the word "highways" in section 48 not including a wharf.

Ejectment by Elizabeth Palen and another against the Ocean City. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant obtained a rule to show cause why it should not be set aside. Rule made absolute.

Argued November term, 1904, before GUMMERE, C. J., and GARRISON and GARRISON, JJ.

Godfrey & Godfrey, for the rule. John W. Wescott and Keator & Johnson, opposed.

GUMMERE, C. J. This is an action of ejectment. The locus in quo is a wharf at the foot of Fourth street in the city of Ocean City, a seaside resort on the Atlantic Coast. It appeared from the testimony in the case that in the year 1880 the Ocean City Association, having acquired title to a large tract of land in Cape May county, bordering on one of the thoroughfares separating the mainland from the Atlantic Ocean, caused it to be plotted into streets and lots, and a map thereof made and filed in the county clerk's office. Upon this map, at the point where the street designated thereon as Fourth street terminates at the water's edge, a wharf is delineated. In 1888 the association caused another map of this property to be prepared and filed, and upon this map also the wharf at the foot of Fourth street is shown. Many lots of land were sold by these maps to purchasers, and a settlement of considerable size gradually grew up at this place. As early as 1884 the settlement became incorporated as a borough, and the present city is its successor. In 1886 the Ocean City Association conveyed to Dr. Palen a tract of land which, in terms, included the wharf situated at the foot of Fourth street. It appeared from the evidence submitted that, early in the development of this tract of land, a wharf had been constructed at the foot of Fourth street; that it had subsequently been repaired, or restored, by public subscription, and subsequently by the borough or city of Ocean City; and that it had been used, to some extent at least, by the public. It further appeared that the defendant municipality, in April, 1898, passed an ordinance entitled "An ordinance establishing the rate of wharfage and providing for the collection thereof, for Fourth street wharf in Ocean City, New Jersey," by the provisions of which the office of wharf master was created, and the incumbent charged with the duty of seeing that vessels should not unnecessarily injure the wharf, and, in case of damage thereto of causing the same to be repaired in the name of Ocean City, and of collecting from the owner of the vessel the amount of damage done thereto. The ordinance also fixed the charges to be paid by owners or captains discharging or taking on cargo at the wharf, and imposed upon the wharf master the duty of their collection. At the close of the case the trial judge left to the jury to find (1) Whether there had been a dedication of the wharf to the public use, and (2) in case they found there had been such dedication, then whether the defendant municipality, by passing the ordinance of April, 1898, had terminated the public user of the wharf; and instructed them that, if they found that the effect of this ordinance was to put an end to the public user, then the property at once reverted to the plaintiffs, who were devisees under Dr. Palen's will. A verdict for the plaintiffs having been rendered, the defendant applied for and obtained a rule to show cause why it should not be set aside for errors occurring at the trial.

The rule to show cause should be made absolute. The question whether there had been a dedication of the wharf was properly left to the jury to determine. Palen v. Ocean City, 64 N. J. Law, 669, 46 Atl. 774. Assuming that there was such dedication, the question whether the ordinance of April, 1898, operated as an abandonment of the public user was not one of fact to be determined by the jury, but one of law to be determined by the court. Whether the jury concluded from the evidence that no dedication of this wharf to the public use had been shown, or whether they concluded that there had been a dedication, but that there had been an abandonment of the public use by the ordinance referred to, cannot be determined from their verdict. Inasmuch as a new trial of the case must be had for this reason, we deem it proper to point out what seems to us to be the true determination of the latter question. In the first place, there is nothing in the language of the ordinance which suggests an intention on the part of the municipal authorities to abandon the public user; its purpose is to regulate the use of the wharf, and, apparently, to provide a fund for its maintenance and repair. But if the ordinance admitted of the opposite construction, the conclusive answer is that no power is vested in the municipal authorities to discharge the public right; the easement is vested in the public, and the local authorities, as the representatives of the public, are clothed with power to do all acts necessary for the protection of the public right; but the Legislature alone has the power to release the dedicated land, and discharge the public servitude, when it has once attached. No such power exists in a municipality, unless it has been delegated to it by legislative enactment. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co. v. Mayor, etc., of Hoboken, 36 N. J. Law, 540.

Counsel for the plaintiffs do not deny that this is the settled rule, but contend that such authority is found in section 48, par. 1 (page 69) of "An act relating to and providing for the government of cities in this state containing a population of less than twelve thousand inhabitants," approved March 24, 1897 (P. L. 1897, p. 46), the statute under which the defendant municipality is organized. The provision appealed to authorized the common council, "whenever in their opinion the public good requires it, by ordinance, to cause any street, road, highway or alley already laid out, to be vacated," and it is argued that the term "highway" includes a wharf within the intent and meaning of this provision. We are unable to reach this conclusion. The Legislature, by section 18, par. 7 (page 52), of the act, clothed the common council with power to regulate streets, highways, public places, bridges, wharves, and docks. The language of this paragraph makes it apparent, as it seems to us, that the Legislature, in enacting this statute for the government of cities of the class named in the title of the act, considered that a wharf was a thing distinct and apart from a highway, and did not intend that the subsequent provision authorizing the vacation of highways should clothe the municipality with power also to vacate other public places, bridges, wharves, or docks.

The rule to show cause will be made absolute.

STERLING et al. v. IVES et al.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut.
Feb. 7, 1906.)

1. WILLS—SPENDTHRIFT TRUSTS—CREATION.

Testator declared that the rents and income from his residuary estate were for the personal use and benefit of the respective legatees, prohibited anticipation or incumbrance, and provided that, if any person should make any contract by which he or she should be deprived of the personal receipt or use of any sum intended for his benefit, payment should immediately cease, in which event, the trustees were authorized to apply such portion of the income for the support of such beneficiary or his family at their discretion, etc. Held, that such provision was sufficient to create a spendthrift trust.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 1585.]

2. SAME—DEATH OF BENEFICIARY—DISSOLUTION.

Testator bequeathed the residue of his estate to trustees, with directions to pay certain portions of the income to his widow and for the support of his children and their families. To accomplish this he created a spendthrift trust, and also declared that, in case of his widow and children and their families, additions to the income from the principal might be made by the trustees necessary to support such families according to their station, and in this respect preferred his daughter over her brothers. Held, that the provision so made for the family of any particular beneficiary became inoperative on the dissolution of such family by the death of the beneficiary.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 1632.]

3. SAME—DEATH OF BENEFICIARY LEAVING ISSUE.

Testator created a trust of the residue of his estate, and provided that on the death of either of his children the income directed to be paid for the benefit of such deceased child during his life should be paid to and for the benefit of such child's surviving issue until they arrive at the age of 21, when as they arrived at such age they and their heirs were to have in equal proportions forever so much of the principal as was devised to the use of the deceased child, etc. Held that, on the death of one of the children leaving issue, the income of the third of the estate designed for him and his representatives was payable to his widow, and his surviving issue until such issue respectively came of age.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, §§ 1638, 1639.]

4. SAME—VESTING OF ESTATE.

On the death of such beneficiary, his children became immediately vested with their portion of the trust fund, subject only to be divested in case of death under age, as provided by another clause of the will.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 1515.]

5. SAME.

Testator provided that, on the death of one of his children, one-third of the income of his share of a trust fund should be payable "in like manner" for the benefit of his widow for life, and, on her decease leaving lawful issue of testator's son then living, such one-third of the income and principal was to go to such issue in the same manner as the other two-thirds had been decreed. Held, that the phrase "in like manner" was used to designate the mode in which the recipients were to be benefited, and not to describe such recipients.

6. SAME—BENEFICIARIES.

Testator created a trust of the residue of his estate, and provided that one-third of the income of the share of a beneficiary should be paid to his widow for life, and, on her decease leaving lawful issue of such beneficiary then living, such one-third part of the income and principal should go for the benefit of such issue, etc. Held, that the recipients of such remainder were the issue of the beneficiary living at the death of the widow.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 1602.]

7. SAME—REDUCTION OF SHARES.

Testator created a trust of the residue of his estate, bequeathing portions of income to his children for the benefit of their families and ultimately to his grandchildren, and empowered his executors and trustees in their discretion, in case the bequests of income were insufficient for the purpose intended, to appropriate parts of the principal of a certain charitable fund in addition to such income, for the maintenance of such beneficiaries. Held that, on the death of one of the beneficiaries, neither the income nor the principal of his share could be reduced under such clause by appropriations in favor of the families of other beneficiaries.

8. SAME—SPENDTHRIFT TRUSTS—APPLICATION.

Where testator created a trust for the benefit of his widow, children, and a certain charity, directing that the fund should ultimately be distributed among his grandchildren, surviving their parents, such grandchildren were not subject to a spendthrift trust providing that, if "any person" conveyed his share of the income in such a way as to deprive himself of the benefit thereof, his right to such income should cease, etc.

9. SAME—SEVERANCE—TRUSTEES—POWERS.

Where testator created a trust of the residue of his estate for the benefit of his widow and a certain charity, the families of his three children, and ultimately for the benefit of his grandchildren, to be paid to them on their arrival of age, after the death of their parent, who was testator's child, the death of such parent operated as a severance of his share of the trust fund; the remainder only being subject to discretionary powers of the trustees.

10. TRUSTS—POWERS OF TRUSTEE.

Where trustees in their discretion were authorized to draw upon the principal for the purpose of present necessities of the beneficiaries in case the income to which they were entitled under the trust was insufficient therefor, amounts so appropriated should be considered as parts of the income, for which neither the recipients nor their representatives were subsequently required to account.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 47, Cent. Dig. Trusts, §§ 394, 395.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Hartford County; Joel H. Reed, Judge.

Action by John W. Sterling and others, as trustees under the will of Lawson C. Ives, against Caroline P. Ives and others, for the construction of the will. Answers admitting the truth of the allegations of the complaint were filed by all the defendants, and Sophia I. Owen made certain additional allegations in her answer, to which the other defendants demurred. The demurrer was sustained and a judgment rendered construing the will, from which all the defendants, except Sophia I. Owen and those claiming under her, appealed. Reversed.

The testator died in 1867, leaving a large estate, real and personal. His will made certain charitable bequests and contained the following provisions as to his residuary estate: It was devised and bequeathed to trustees and to their successors as joint tenants in fee simple forever. They were to allow the widow to occupy the homestead and use its furniture during her widowhood; furnishing a home therein for her daughter Sophia, while the latter remained unmarried, she paying a reasonable compensation for her board. On the termination of this estate in the widow, Sophia was to have the furniture absolutely and the use of the homestead, so long as she desired, and the trustees deemed it expedient. The property other than the homestead and furniture was to be invested in productive property, and the following directions were given as to the disposition of the income:

"Eleventh. Whereas, I am desirous of devoting to charitable purposes a still larger portion of my estate; and whereas, it appears that the net income of said residue and remainder of my estate may be more than sufficient for the wants of my wife and children and their families: My will is and I do direct that whenever while said residue and remainder of my estate, or any part thereof, may be held in trust as herein provided, the net income of said residue and remainder shall amount to the sum of twenty-five thousand (\$25,000) or more for any one year, and also whenever the net income of so much of said residue and remainder of my estate as may remain in the hands of said trustees undistributed, or not paid over or conveyed in fee to my devisees or legatees under the provisions of this will shall equal or exceed the ratio of twenty-five thousand dollars (\$25,000) per annum for the whole of said residue and remainder, then and in each of said events, the said trustees shall set apart as a charitable fund to be appropriated as hereinafter directed, certain portions of said net income, as follows, viz.: For each year that such net income shall amount to twenty-five thousand dollars (\$25,000) or the above-mentioned proportionate part thereof, but shall be less than thirty thousand dollars (\$30,000) or said ratable part thereof, five (5) per cent. of such net income shall be set apart for said charitable fund. For each year that such net income shall amount to thirty thousand dollars (\$30,000) or the above-mentioned proportionate part thereof, but shall be less than forty thousand dollars (\$40,000) or said ratable part thereof, said trustees shall set apart for said charitable fund ten (10) per cent. of such net income; and for each year that such net income shall amount to forty thousand dollars (\$40,000) or more, or the above-mentioned proportionate part thereof, said trustees shall set apart for said charitable fund twenty (20) per cent. of such net income. In the event of the decease of my said daughter Sophia, either during my life or after my decease without leaving issue surviving her, then I direct that so much of said income as my said daughter under the provisions hereinafter contained would have been entitled to if living, shall be annually or oftener set apart by said trustees and added to said charitable fund for the period of twenty (20) years after the decease of my said daughter in case of her surviving me; and in case of my surviving her, then for the period of twenty (20) years after my decease. And as a tribute to the memory of my two deceased daughters, my will is and I do further direct that after setting apart for said charitable fund the percentage of said net income as above directed, the net income of one-fourth ($\frac{1}{4}$) part of said residue and remainder of my estate shall be annually or oftener set apart by said trustees and added to said charitable fund for the period of twenty (20) years after my decease; the whole of said charitable fund to be disposed of by said trustees as follows, viz.: [Certain incorporated charities were then named as the beneficiaries.]

"Twelfth. From the remainder of the net income of said residue and remainder of my estate I direct that there be paid to my said wife, Mariett T. Ives, the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars ($2500) at the end of every six months from my decease to wit: Five thousand dollars ($5000) per annum, and at that rate for and during the entire term of her natural life, provided she shall remain unmarried and not otherwise. In the event of her marrying again, said annuity is to be paid to her to the time of such marriage only; and upon the decease or marriage of my said wife, then and in either of said events, all payments herein directed to be made to her, and all trusts herein created for her benefit, are forthwith to cease and be determined.

"Thirteenth. My will is, and I direct that all the balance of said net income of said residue and remainder of my estate, together with said annuity to my wife from and after the time of her marriage or decease, and including also the foregoing twenty (20) years appropriations for a charitable fund, whenever and as said appropriations shall respectively cease under the foregoing provisions, be paid over by said trustees semi-annually to all my children equally, to wit: to Philo L., Walter D., and Sophia L. Ives, during the terms of their natural lives respectively, subject however to the conditions and limitations hereinafter set forth, and to the discretionary power hereinafter vested in said trustees respecting such payments.

"Fourteenth. Upon the decease of my said daughter or either or both of my said sons, leaving lawful issue then living, my will is that the income herein directed to be paid to or for the benefit of such deceased son or daughter during his or her life, be paid in like manner equally to or for the benefit of such surviving issue until they arrive at the age of twenty-one (21) years respectively; and as they respectively attain said age, I give, devise and bequeath to them respectively, their heirs and assigns, in equal portions forever, so much of the principal of my estate as is herein devised and bequeathed for the use and benefit of such deceased son or daughter: provided, that such surviving issue are to take per stirpes only and not per capita, and the shares of such as shall have attained the age of twenty-one (21) years at the time of the decease of such son or daughter, their ancestor, to be paid to them respectively immediately upon the decease of such ancestor. And in determining the respective portions so given in fee, my children are to be considered as the beneficiaries and legatees of the percentage of net income hereinbefore conditionally appropriated for a charitable fund. Always provided, however, that in case either of my sons should die leaving a widow, then my will is that one-third ($\frac{1}{3}$) part of the income herein directed to be paid to or for her deceased husband during his life, shall in like manner be paid to her during her natural life. And upon her decease, leaving lawful issue of her deceased husband (my son) then living, said one-third part ($\frac{1}{3}$) income and the principal go to for the benefit of such issue in the same manner as the other two-thirds parts ($\frac{2}{3}$) thereof. And in case of no such issue surviving her, said income and principal to be held and disposed of by said trustees in the manner provided in the clause next following.

"Fifteenth. In case of the death of either or both of my sons during my life without leaving lawful issue surviving me, or in the event that after my decease either or both of my sons should die without leaving lawful issue then living, or in case of the death of any descendant of either of said sons while any portion of my estate is held in trust for such descendant, then and in every such case my will is that so much of my estate as is herein directed to be held for the use or benefit of any son or descendant so deceased shall, upon such decease, be thenceforth held and disposed of by said trustees in the manner and for the purposes following, to wit: said trustees to pay or not at their discretion to or for the benefit of my then surviving descendants, or such of them as said trustees may think best, the whole or any portion of the net income of such estate, so long as any of my grandchildren that may survive me shall be living under the age of twenty-one (21) years, till which time said trustees shall from time to time as the same accrues, set apart and add to said charitable fund to be disposed of as above directed, so much of said income of the estate referred to in this clause as shall not have been paid to my descendants under the above discretionary power. And at the termination of the period above limited, I authorize and empower said trustees at their discretion to distribute and pay over in fee to all or such of my descendants as they may think best and in such proportions as they may deem expedient the whole or any portion of the principal of said estate referred to in this clause. And I do give, devise, and bequeath so much of said last-mentioned principal as said trustees may not deem it best to distribute or pay over to my descendants as above, as follows, viz.: [The same charitable corporations named in the eleventh clause were then designated as the beneficiaries under the fifteenth, which concluded with the following words:] This clause however to be construed subject to the foregoing provision for the widow of a deceased son during her natural life."

"Seventeenth. In the distribution of interest among my children and their families, and in the division of the principal of my estate as herein directed, my will is that any sum or sums of money by me advanced to or paid for the benefit of any of my children and charged to them, or for which I may hold their notes, be estimated as if now forming a part of my estate, or as it is technically called, be brought into hotchpot, so that each of said children and their respective issue will be entitled to so much less interest as would accrue upon said advancements or payments to or for such child (together with interest thereon to the time of my decease) at six per cent. annual interest. And upon the distribution of the principal of my estate herein given for the use of any child or his or her issue, said advancements or payments to or for said child including interest thereon to the time of my decease, are to be deducted from said principal.

"Eighteenth. In case of the decease during my life of any devisee or legatee herein named whose lawful issue shall be living at my decease, then my will is that such issue shall take at my decease the same estate and only the same estate and only the same that such issue would have taken upon the decease of such devisee or legatee had such deceased devisee or legatee survived me. And in case of the happening of any contingency whatever in consequence of which any portion of my estate would but for the provision now to be made become or be treated as intestate estate, then my will is that upon the happening of any such contingency so much of my said estate as would otherwise be treated as intestate shall go to and be held by said trustees for the benefit of my surviving children, with right of representation to the issue of such of my children as may have deceased, in the same manner as is herein provided in respect to property directly given in trust for them.

"Nineteenth. The rents, dividends, interest, and income to be paid under this will, I intend for the personal use and benefit of the respective legatees. I therefore provide that no sum or sums intended to be paid as aforesaid shall in any way be anticipated, aliened, charged, incumbered, or diverted from the use so designated. And if any person I so intend to benefit shall do any act or make any contract or conveyance, or if any proceeding shall be had in law or chancery or otherwise, by reason of which act, contract, conveyance or proceeding he or she would if such trust were to continue in his or her favor be deprived of the personal receipt or use of any sum intended for his or her benefit, then and in every such case, and immediately upon such act, contract, conveyance, or proceeding, the trust for the payment to him or her of such rents, dividends, interest, or income shall cease and be utterly void. In which event I authorize said trustees to apply the amount of such rents, dividends, interest, and income for the support of the person as to whom said trust shall have ceased as aforesaid, or of his or her family, at their discretion, but he or she not to have any legal claim therefor. And furthermore, in case said trustees should at any time have reason to suppose that any interest or income herein bequeathed is applied by any legatee or is suffered by such legatee to be applied to improper uses, or to such as in the judgment of said trustees are not conducive to the comfortable maintenance and support of such legatee or his or her family, then and in every such case, I authorize and empower said trustees at their discretion and for such time or times as they may think best, to suspend payment to such legatee of the whole or any portion of the interest or income herein bequeathed to or for such legatee. And in this event also I authorize and request said trustees to apply the amount of such interest and income for the support of such legatee or his or her family at their discretion, he or she not to have any legal claim therefor during such suspension. My will is, however, and I direct that whenever under the provisions contained in this clause the trust in favor of any legatee or legatees shall cease, and whenever said trustees shall suspend payment of income under the authority herein given, the principal of the estate theretofore held in trust for the person or persons as to whom said trust shall have been suspended under the foregoing provisions, shall still continue to be held and managed by said trustees as before, and for the same term or terms as said estate would have been held by said trustees had this clause 'Nineteenth' not formed a part of my will. The income of such portion of my estate not expended for the person (or his or her family) as to whom the trust shall have ceased or said payments been suspended, to be invested by said trustees from time to time and added to the residue and remainder of my estate. Provided, however, that the investments of said surplus income may from time to time, at the discretion of said trustees, be by them expended for or paid over to those persons or their families who would have been entitled to the same under this will but for the provisions contained in this clause 'Nineteenth.' And in no event are said trustees or any of them to be accountable to any person or tribunal for the manner in which or the extent to which any discretionary power herein given to said trustees may be exercised by them.

"Twentieth. I hereby authorize and empower my executor, alone while acting as executor, and also said trustees, the survivors and survivor of them and their successors in said trust, to sell any and all my real estate at their discretion. And if from any cause the income from my estate which I have appropriated for the support of my said wife and children and their families should at any time be insufficient in the judgment of said trustees for that purpose, then I do authorize and empower and request the said trustees from time to time to appropriate at their discretion such and so much of the principal of my estate or of the above mentioned charitable fund as in their judgment may be necessary in addition to said income for the comfortable maintenance and support of my said wife and children and their families in accordance with their station in life."

The trustees were then made self-perpetuating, and their successors were invested with the same "rights, powers, and duties" assigned to those originally named.

A first codicil made four months later contained this clause: "Fourth. In the event that the income of my estate which is given in and by said will to my daughter Sophia should in the judgment of the trustees under said will be insufficient for the support of the said Sophia and any family she may have, according to her and their station in life, then my will is and I do authorize and direct my trustees from time to time and at their discretion, to pay over to or expend for the benefit of said Sophia and her family, if any she may have, so much as said trustees may deem best of the income if any there be which in and by the clause 'Nineteenth' of my said will is directed 'to be invested by said trustees from time to time and added to the residue and remainder of my estate.' And should said trustees under the discretionary power given them in said will deem it best to appropriate any portion of the principal of my estate for the support of my wife or any of my children or their families, then my will is that such appropriations be first made out of the 'one-fourth ($\frac{1}{4}$) part of said residue and remainder of my estate,' of which the income is by clause 'Eleventh' of my said will set apart as a charitable fund for the period of twenty (20) years after my decease. But except as the same is needed for the support of my wife or any of my children or their families, my will is and I direct that no portion of the principal of my estate of which the income is by said clause 'Eleventh' of said will either absolutely or contingently devoted to charitable purposes for the specific term of twenty (20) years, and no portion of the income of such principal shall be paid or distributed to any of my family or descendants till the expiration of the term for which the said income is so devoted; but at and after such expiration said principal and income to be disposed of in the same manner as if said clause 11th ('Eleventh') had not formed a part of my said will."

The residuary estate was distributed to the trustees in 1877 at a valuation of over $650,000. The testator's widow died in 1869. He left three surviving children, Philo, Walter, and Sophia. Walter died in 1893, leaving a widow born prior to the testator's decease, and three children. Philo died in September, 1904, leaving a widow born prior to the testator's decease, and four children. Sophia is married and has four children. Several of the grandchildren were minors in November, 1904, when this suit was brought. The trustees from time to time have paid over to certain of the testator's children and their families portions of the principal of the estate. Such payments were not equally divided among such children and their respective families. They have filed their accounts from time to time in the proper court of probate, which has approved them; but it was not alleged that such approval was ever given on due notice to the parties in interest. The last account filed shows the present amount of the principal of the trust estate to be about $433,000. In behalf of Sophia and her family an answer was filed containing averments to the following effect: When the testator made his will and codicils his two sons had, as he knew, displayed tendencies toward wasteful and profligate habits, such as gave room for much anxiety concerning their future characters and lives. On the contrary, the testator's daughter, Sophia Ives Owen, had led an exemplary life, had lived at home with her father and was held by him in particular regard and esteem, and this special regard and fondness of the testator for his said daughter is shown by the provisions of the will and codicils. Said trustees from time to time had reason to suppose, and did in fact suppose, that the interest or income bequeathed in said will to said Philo L. Ives and Walter D. Ives and to the legatees in their families was being applied by said legatees or suffered by them to be applied to improper uses, and that said trustees did from time to time suppose, upon reasons that seemed amply to them, that said interest and income was being applied by said legatees or suffered by them to be applied to uses that, in the judgment of said trustees, were not conducive to the comfortable maintenance and support of said legatees and their families; and said trustees, acting under the discretionary powers conferred by clause "Nineteenth" of said will, from time to time did suspend payments to said Philo and Walter and to the legatees in their families of portions of the interest or income bequeathed in said will to said respective legatees, and did from time to time invest portions of said suspended income and add the same to the residue and remainder of the estate. In the judgment of said trustees, the income given by the will to Sophia was insufficient at all times for her support and that of her family, according to her and their station in life, and said trustees, acting under the discretionary powers conferred upon them by clause "Fourth" of the first codicil, did from time to time duly pay over to or expend for the benefit of said Sophia and her family certain portions of the income of said estate which in and by clause "Nineteenth" of said will was invested by said trustees from time to time and added to the residue and remainder of the estate; and also, acting under the discretionary powers conferred by clause "Twenty" of the will, from time to time duly appropriated portions of the principal of said estate and paid the same over to the said Sophia and to her family, in addition to the income paid them under the terms of said will, for their comfortable maintenance and support in accordance with their station in life.

To these allegations the other defendants demurred, because they set up irrelevant matters not germane to the complaint, and not such as tended to explain any ambiguity in the will. The ruling sustaining the demurrer was not assigned as a reason of appeal by any of the appellants.

BALDWIN, J. (after stating the facts). The general intent of the testator was to secure a division, first of the income, and ultimately of the principal, of his residuary estate, subject to specified reservations in favor of his widow and daughter and of certain charities, between his three children or their families in three equal shares. After his widow, his children, were the primary objects of his solicitude, and particularly with reference to their comfortable support and that of the families which each might have. To make this more sure he created, by the nineteenth clause of his will, a spendthrift trust, and by the twentieth authorized, in case of his wife and children and their families, additions to income from the principal, should the trustees think it necessary. So far as his daughter was concerned, he also gave her a certain preference over her brothers in this respect, by the directions in the first codicil. The provisions thus made for the family of any particular beneficiary became inoperative on the death of that beneficiary. The family intended was that of which he was and remained the head. His death would dissolve and destroy it. St. John v. Dann, 66 Conn. 401, 404, 34 Atl. 110.

The death of Walter in 1893, leaving surviving issue, brought the fourteenth clause of the will into operation as respects the third of the estate designed for him and his representatives. Thereafter the income previously payable to him or for his benefit was to be paid in like manner to or for the benefit of his widow and such surviving issue until such issue should, respectively, come of age. For this purpose and until such times, the trustees were to continue in possession of the estate. But the ultimate title to two-thirds of the share, which for convenience we may term Walter's, became vested at his death in his three surviving children, subject only to the provision for the death of any under age made in the fifteenth clause. The testator, after giving them two-thirds of the income which their father had formerly enjoyed until one of them should become of full age, had provided in respect to the principal thus: "As they respectively attain said age, I give, devise, and bequeath to them respectively, their heirs and assigns, in equal portions forever, so much of the principal of my estate as is herein devised and bequeathed for the use and benefit of such deceased son or daughter: provided that such surviving issue are to take per stirpes only and not per capita, and the shares of such as shall have attained the age of twenty-one (21) years at the time of the decease of such son or daughter, their ancestor, to be paid to them respectively immediately upon the decease of such ancestor." Under the settled canon of construction that the law favors vested estates, this gift to them as they, respectively, came of age, being accompanied by a gift, in the case of any who should be minors, of the income meanwhile from their father's death, passed to each, on that event, a vested estate in his proportional share of two-thirds of one-third of the principal of the trust fund. Johnson v. Edmond, 65 Conn. 492, 499, 33 Atl. 503. Such third was obviously what the testator meant by "so much of the principal of my estate as is herein devised and bequeathed for the use and benefit of such deceased son." The postponement of the delivery of possession to any grandchild until he should be of age was intended primarily for his protection, and secondarily to keep the property in the testator's family or send it to charitable uses in case of the legatee's death when a minor.

As to the other third of Walter's share, the fourteenth clause of the will, after providing that one-third of the income payable to or for the benefit of Walter during his life, should after his death be paid, "in like manner," to his widow for life, adds these words: "And upon her decease, leaving lawful issue of her deceased husband (my son) then living, said one-third part ($\frac{1}{3}$) income and the principal to go for the benefit of such issue in the same manner as the other two-thirds parts ($\frac{2}{3}$) thereof. And in case of no such issue surviving her, said income and principal to be held and disposed of by said trustees in the manner provided in the clause next following." The phrase "in the same manner," as thus employed, designates the mode in which the recipients shall be benefited. It cannot be regarded as intended to describe who such recipients are, and thus as sending either income or principal to those in whose favor estates in two-thirds of Walter's share had already been created. The recipients intended are not left to be ascertained by inference, but are clearly designated. They are the issue of Walter who may be living at his widow's decease, and, should none such then survive, both income and principal were to go as the fifteenth clause particularly directs. The phrase "one-third ($\frac{1}{3}$) part of the income herein directed to be paid to or for her deceased husband during his life" must be interpreted with reference to the previous provisions for a severance of Walter's third upon his death. If all his children had been then of age, and neither his wife nor the testator's widow had been living, it is plain that such a severance would have been required, for each child would have been immediately entitled to his share of the principal. Had the testator's widow been then in life, it would have been necessary and proper first to set apart, with the approval of the court of probate, a fund sufficient to produce an income which would satisfy all the provisions of the will in her favor, and to take a third of this fund for the time being out of what would otherwise be Walter's share. In like manner, Walter's widow can now be sufficiently protected by thus setting apart a third of that share to be held by the trustees for her benefit during her life; and the general intent of the will justifies and requires the adoption of that course.

Whether there are in the will any provisions which are invalid under the former statute of perpetuities we have no occasion to inquire, since no advice has been asked by the trustees with respect to that question, nor any claim in regard to it made by any of the parties in interest either in this court or in the court below. In view of these conditions, we intimate no opinion as to the validity of any provision affecting the interest of a grandchild who may die under age. From and after the death of Walter, neither the income nor the principal of his share could be reduced, under any authority given by the twentieth clause of the will, by appropriations in favor of Sophia and her family, or Philo and his family. So long as he remained in life, he or his family might have been benefited by appropriations from the trust fund at the expense of his father's other children and their families, and they at his expense and that of his family. There was thus a mutuality of burden. Each child bore his part of it, and to each it might be a source of benefit. Walter's death cut off any further possibility of such benefits either to him or to his family. This termination of all opportunity for reciprocity in this regard, the provisions for a severance of the principal of his share, and the general intent of the testator to secure equality between his children forbid a construction of the clause in question which would charge the share of any child, when once thus severed by reason of his death, with burdens in favor of any other child or of the family of any other.

We have also come to the conclusion that the nineteenth clause does not apply to the testator's grandchildren. While the language used is sufficiently general to comprehend them, it is controlled by the obvious purposes to secure which the article is drawn, and by the words of absolute gift found in the fourteenth clause. There could be no substantial danger from giving to each minor grandchild the benefit of the entire income of his share. It would naturally be disbursed at ther by the trustees or by his guardian, and in case of the marriage of a granddaughter was, by the sixteenth clause, secured, so far as it might come into her hands, to her sole and separate use. Nor is it consistent with the general intent of the testator to make an equal distribution between the three stocks of descent to bring back the fruits of property once severed from the corpus of the trust to increase that corpus, even conditionally and temporarily. From the date of the severance of Walter's share, which is to be made as of the date of his death, until the death of Philo, the other two shares remained in one undivided and indivisible mass, subject to all the discretionary powers of the trustees which had existed in respect to the entire trust estate prior to the death of Walter. From and after the death of Philo, his third should have been divided and set apart, and the immediate ownership and enjoyment of two-thirds of it then passed of right to his children, if they were all then of age, to be equally divided between them; the other third of it being first set apart to be held by the trustees for the benefit of Philo's widow, for life, and then to go to his issue who may survive her, if any, in the manner already stated with reference to the fund to be set apart for the primary benefit of Walter's widow. During the life of Sophia, the discretionary power given to the trustees, by the twentieth clause of the will, to make appropriations from the principal of the third of the residuary estate remaining after the severance of Walter's third and Philo's third, to secure her comfortable maintenance and that of her family, continues in full force as respects her third. So far as respects any addition to the principal of the trust fund which may have been made under the nineteenth clause, and which remained a part of the principal at the death of Walter, it should, for the purpose of setting apart what represents his share of the principal of the estate, be considered as then fully incorporated into that principal. So far as respects any addition to the principal of the trust fund which may have been made under that clause between the death of Walter and that of Philo, and which remained part of the principal at Philo's death, it should, in like manner, as to those purposes, be considered as then fully and finally incorporated into that principal. All payments of principal made by the trustees in the exercise of their discretionary powers to any beneficiary operate as a withdrawal of the amount so paid finally and forever from the principal of the estate. Such payments the will only authorized for the purpose of securing the comfortable support of those to profit by them. All money thus appropriated was to be used up for present necessities, and not saved to enrich the possessors. They were to take it as part of their income to be spent as such, and neither they nor their representatives can be thereafter held accountable for it, any more than for the disposition of what was received and paid to or for them as part of the regular income of the trust. Inequality of benefit, as respects the three stocks of descent, has thus resulted, but only because it was a leading object of the testator, carefully expressed, to secure to each child for life a comfortable support for himself and his family, whatever differences between the families might exist in respect to the number of persons included in each, or in the scale of expenditure corresponding to the social station in which each might be placed. Had he intended that such appropriations should, on a final reckoning, be treated as made at the expense of any particular share, to go to any particular child or his representatives, it may be safely assumed, in view of the precise directions as to advancements made in the seventeenth clause, that he would have so expressly provided.

It follows that the superior court erred in its conclusions. The material questions asked by the trustees should have been answered as follows:

1. The estate should not be kept intact and held as an entirety and the income applied, as directed by the will and codicils, so long as any of the children of the testator are alive.

3. The widow of neither son is now entitled to a specific portion of the income of the entire estate; but the widow of each is now entitled to the income of a specific portion of the principal, to be set aside for her benefit.

4. The children of Philo, all being of full age, are now entitled to a portion of the principal of the estate, namely, to two-thirds of half of what of right constituted the principal of the trust fund at his death.

6. The children of Walter, although all but one are minors, are now entitled, so far as ownership is concerned, to a portion of the principal of the estate, namely, to two-thirds of one-third of what constituted the principal of the trust fund at his death. Walter Edgar Ives became, on May 24, 1905, absolutely entitled to the possession of one-third of said portion. The others have each a vested interest in one-half of what remains of it, subject to any valid provision that may exist for the contingency of their dying under age.

8. No payments of principal heretofore made to or for the benefit of the respective children of the testator or their families, by virtue of any discretionary powers conferred upon the trustees by the will or codicils, should be counted as a part of the principal of the estate.

9. The trustees have a discretion in future to make or withhold payments of principal or income to or for the benefit of legatees to the following extent: (1) All powers given them by the nineteenth clause continue unabridged as respects Mrs. Sophia L. Owen and her family during her life, with relation to the third of the estate remaining in their hands after Philo's share is severed. (2) All powers given them by the twentieth clause and the fourth clause of the first codicil continue unabridged as respects Mrs. Sophia I. Owen and her family, with relation to said third of the estate last above described.

10. Future payments of principal, if any, made to or for the benefit of Mrs. Sophia I. Owen or her family, by virtue of any of the discretionary powers conferred upon the trustees by the will and codicils, should not be counted as part of the principal of the estate upon any future distribution.

11. The trustees have no discretion to make any payment of principal to the widow of either son. As to the amount of income to be paid to each, they have the discretionary powers given them by the nineteenth clause of the will in respect to other legatees.

There is error, and the judgment of the superior court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to render a judgment in conformity with this opinion. No costs will be taxed in this court in favor of any party. The other Judges concurred.

CARSWELL v. SWINDELL et al.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 9. 1906.)

1. QUIETING TITLE—ESSENTIALS OF RELIEF—POSSESSION OF PLAINTIFF.

In order to maintain a bill for the removal of a cloud from title, plaintiff must affirmatively allege and show that he is in possession of the property, and, unless the defendants are numerous, his title must be established at law or be founded on undisputed evidence of long continued possession.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Quieting Title, §§ 36-45, 74.]

2. SAME—PLEADING—ALLEGATIONS OF POSSESSION.

A bill for the removal of a cloud from plaintiff's title, which alleges that plaintiff entered into possession of the land, but fails to show that such possession is actual, as distinguished from merely constructive possession, is defective.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Quieting Title, §§ 36-45, 73, 74.]

3. SAME—TITLE OF PLAINTIFF—SUFFICIENCY OF ESTABLISHMENT AT LAW.

A decision of the Commissioner of the Land Office denying a patent, on the ground that the land sought to be patented was made land, and that as such it belonged to the riparian proprietor and was not subject to a warrant, was not a judicial determination of the legal title to the land sought to be patented, as between the applicant for the patent and the caveator, who claimed the made land by virtue of his title as prior patentee of an island to which he asserted the made land had become attached by accretion.

4. PUBLIC LANDS—PATENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

The effect of a patent in passing title may be questioned in a suit at law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Public Lands, §§ 324-326.]

5. INJUNCTION—PLEADINGS—IRREPARABLE INJURY—ALLEGATIONS OF FACT.

Where an allegation of irreparable injury is made in a bill to enjoin a trespass, facts showing that apprehension of such injury is well founded must also be stated.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Injunction, §§ 228, 232.]

6. SAME.

Equity will not retain jurisdiction of a bill to enjoin a trespass, which contains no allegations of irreparable injury, nor of the insolvency of defendants, nor anything to show the inadequacy of the legal remedy.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Injunction, §§ 15-17.]

7. SAME—GROUNDS OF RELIEF—INTERFERENCE AND THREATS.

Acts of defendants in claiming and asserting title to land, in entering upon the same, denying plaintiff's title, and threatening to again enter upon the land and destroy a building thereon, are not of themselves sufficient grounds to authorize the issuance of an injunction.

Appeal from Circuit Court of Baltimore City; Thomas S. Baer, Judge.

Bill by Robert S. Carswell against Walter B. Swindell, trustee, and others. From a decree in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

David M. Newbold and Thomas G. Hayes, for appellant. Alexander Preston and John C. Rose, for appellees.

PAGE, J. The appellant filed a bill in the lower court against the appellees praying for an injunction to restrain the latter from asserting any right or title to the land and accretions thereto described in the bill, and also for the purpose of obtaining a decree removing an alleged cloud on the title of the complainant to the land and accretions. The case was submitted upon bill and exhibits. The court refused the injunction, and from the decree this appeal is taken. The facts charged in the bill are as follows: In 1904 the complainant purchased certain land at public sale from David Newbold, Jr., for $1,225, and, after final ratification of the sale, it is alleged that "the complainant entered into possession of said land, the metes and bounds of which" are described in Exhibits Nos. 1 and 2 filed with the bill. The land was originally in part, an island in the middle branch of the Patapsco river, a public navigable water within the limits of Baltimore city, and in part submerged land covered by water. The fast land forming originally said island and included in the patent hereinafter mentioned was about four or five acres, and since the 19th day of October, the date when the original patent from the state of Maryland was issued, the fast land of the said island has extended nearly to the mainland, by imperceptible accretions, forming on the shores of said island and becoming part of it. That the land purchased by the complainant was patented by the state on October 19, 1861, to one Thales A. Linthicum, who on April 19, 1873, sold and conveyed the same to Sidney C. Long, who subsequently, in 1902, executed a mortgage thereon to one David M. Newbold and that said mortgage was subsequently foreclosed, and sold by the trustee thereunder, to the complainant. By the fifth paragraph of said bill, it is charged that the appellant "is now, and has been since he acquired his title to the said land; in possession of all the land" described in his deed from said trustee, as well as that described in the said patent, and that his predecessors in title were also in possession of said land, and it is also averred that he now has a clear legal and equitable title thereto, and that the said title was judicially passed upon by the Commissioner of the Land Office, in a caveat proceeding decided in favor of said Linthicum on November 8, 1873, and a certified copy of the proceeding in the Land Office is filed with the bill marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 4." That the defendants (appellees), "under paper writings purporting to be deeds," claim and assert title to the land and its accretions, but have no title whatever to the same, yet the said assertions of title create a cloud upon the title of the appellants. The appellants filed with their bill exhibits which show that the said defendants have deeded said land, from time to time for many years, and further allege that the appellees have "entered upon said land and accretions and pulled down a portion of the fences surrounding the said land and its accretions, threatening to destroy the building on said land, and so continued on said land until the appellant compelled them to desist from their trespass and leave his said land and premises." That the appellees still deny the title and right of possession of the appellant and threaten to again forcibly enter upon the land, and the complainant "believes and avers that said defendants will immediately attempt to carry into execution said threat, if they are not immediately enjoined and restrained by this court. It further appears from the bill and exhibits that the patent of Thalia, when the same was issued, included only a little over 16 acres of land, of which there were only 4 or 5 acres of fast land, the rest being" submerged land forming the bottom of the Patapsco river; that by subsequent "accretions to shores of the original island," extending nearly to the mainland, the area has increased, until now it includes over 34 acres. Plats are filed with the bill showing the land as granted by the patents and the accretions up to the time the mortgage was given, and also up to the period when the appellant acquired his title. It also appears, from exhibits and plats filed with the bill, that the appellees and others, from whom they derived whatever rights they may have, for many years have claimed title to the said property, showing also that they claim under a deed bearing date in 1872 from James Carroll to their ancestor Charles Ranstead, and since that time it has passed by descent or conveyances to the appellees and bought, sold, mortgaged, and partitioned by them or those claiming under them.

The general principles applicable to a bill of this nature are well settled. It is a proceeding not intended to put an end to vexatious litigation, but brought because the party fears future injury to his rights; and to maintain it the complainant must be in possession of the property; and, except when the defendants are numerous, his title, if a legal one, must have been established at law, or be founded on undisputed evidence of long continued possession. Possession in this class of cases is not a fact to be presumed, but must be affirmatively alleged and shown. Livingston v. Hall, 78 Md. 395, 21 Atl. 49. In Textor v. Shipley, 77 Md. 475, 26 Atl. 1019, this court said, it was a general rule in this class of cases that the bill cannot be maintained without clear proof of both possession and legal title in the plaintiff. If the plaintiff is in actual possession, he cannot have "a remedy at law, and is obliged therefore to seek the aid of a court of equity. If, however, the possession is in another person, his remedy is by action of ejectment, and there is no ground for the interposition of a court of equity, for the reason he has an adequate remedy at law." See, also, Polk v. Pendleton, 81 Md. 118.

The bill in this case alleges that the appellee "entered into possession of said land, etc." There is nothing to show what the character of the possession is, whether an actual possession, or one merely that may exist in contemplation of law without actual personal enjoyment or occupation. 28 A. & E. Ency. of Law, p. 239. Clearly the bill is defective in not setting forth such facts as would show that the appellant was in the actual possession of the property. The decisions cited by the appellant's counsel show that, to maintain a bill quia timet, legal title and possession also must be shown, and not that kind of possession which the law carries by virtue of the legal title, for it may well be that one may have legal title without actual possession. 6 A. & E. Ency. of Law, 159, and cases. Nor does the bill show a legal title which has been established by law, or is founded on undisputed evidence or long continued possession. The foundation of the appellant's title is the patent of Thalia, issued in 1861, for 16 acres, and the claim is that, by imperceptible accretions, this area has been increased to 34 acres. On the side of the appellant it appears that the appellees have been claiming title to the property under a deed from James Carroll dated 6th of January, 1862, and from that date have been asserting their title by dealings with the property during all that time, in dividing it, selling and buying it, and mortgaging it, etc. It is alleged that the appel-lees' title was judicially passed upon in favor of Linthicum, by the Commissioner of the Land Office, in a caveat proceeding in 1873. But reference to a copy of the proceedings filed with the bill does not support the allegation. These proceedings show that one Reed had applied for a patent for "Reed's Island," and its issuance was caveated by Long, upon the ground that the land sought to be patented was the same as that covered by the patent of Thalia issued in 1861. The Commissioner held that this allegation was correct—that it appeared that a large part of the land then sought to be patented was made land, that all accretions belong to the riparian proprietor and not subject to a warrant from the Land Office, etc. The Commissioner does not decide that the accretions were the property of the patentee of Thalia (or some one claiming under him), but that it belongs to the riparian proprietor, whether of the mainland or island does not appear. The effect of the decision is that, as to the accretions, they are not subject to a warrant from the Land Office. There has been no judicial determination of the appellees' legal title, and the whole question as to whom the legal title belongs is not clear, but rests upon the determination of questions of law and fact, peculiarly within the province of a court of law. The effect of a patent in passing title may be questioned in a suit of law, and hence the general rule is to issue the patent where right is doubtful. Jones v. Badley, 4 Md. Ch. 170. The present case is therefore within the rulings in that of Clayton v. Shoemaker, 67 Md. 219, 9 Atl. 636, where this court said: "Here then we are confronted with questions directly relating to the title to land, and, although in some cases where irreparable injury might result from delay a temporary injunction ought to be granted until the legal title can be determined in the proper forum, a court of equity will not pass a decree operating as a final decision of the rights of parties. To do so would be tantamount to a substitution of chancery jurisdiction for that of courts of law deciding questions directly relating to the title to real estate." Park Ass'n v. Shartzner, 83 Md. 13, 34 Atl. 536. The remedy at law for the case presented by the bill is plain and adequate, and, when that is so, the aid of a court of equity cannot be invoked. Hecht v. Colquhoun, 57 Md. 568.

The decree appealed from goes no further than to refuse the injunction prayed for: There are no allegations in the bill of irreparable injury, nor that the damage complained of is intolerable, nor that the mischief goes to the destruction of the thing. If such allegation were made, there must be also such facts stated as show that the apprehension of injury is well founded. White v. Flannigain, 1 Md. 543, 54 Am. Dec. 668. In that case the court said, the bill must "contain a clear statement of the facts upon which the plaintiff relies for relief. * * * in order that it may be seen whether there is a just and proper ground for the application of so summary remedy" as that of injunction. Lamm & Hughes v. Burrell, 69 Md. 274, 14 Atl. 682; Tifel v. Jenkins, 95 Md. 667, 53 Atl. 429; O. & O. C. Co. v. Young, 3 Md. 490. Here the facts alleged do not show a case of irreparable injury. There is no averment of the insolvency of the appellees, nor of their inability to fully respond in damages; nor is the character of the apprehended injuries such as cannot be fully compensated for by a judgment in a court at law. Even if there were such averments, if the facts charged in the bill do not show that the appellant was committing irreparable injury, and the case presented is one for a court of law, a court of equity will not interfere. Pfelts v. Pfelts, 14 Md. 381.

The appellant contends that the vexatious interference by the appellee and the threats averred in the bill are "ample" grounds for the issuing of the injunction and cites to sustain this proposition the case of Shipley v. W. Md. R. R. Co., 99 Md. 116, 56 Atl. 968. That was the case of a railroad company which threatened to take the property of the plaintiff in the construction of its road which had not been condemned or paid for, and it was held that such averments are a sufficient foundation for the issue of a preliminary injunction. But that ruling was based upon the well-established principle that courts will not suffer corporate bodies to take proceedings of an illegal character under the Constitution, whether irreparable or not, and that the authority of the courts to restrain in such cases from an abuse of their powers is well established. Western Maryland R. R. Co. v. Owings, 15 Md. 203, 74 Am. Dec. 563; Am. Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Pearce, 71 Md. 539, 18 Atl. 910, 7 L. R. A. 200.

There being no sufficient ground alleged in the bill, the decree appealed from will be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

BALTIMORE & O. R. CO. et al. v. DECK.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 9, 1906.)

1. WITNESSES—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Defendants, on cross-examination of plaintiff, may not ask whether he heard a certain witness give certain testimony on the former trial; he having, in his examination in chief, made no mention of such witness or the testimony on the former trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, §§ 949, 952.]

2. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

Any error in refusing to allow a certain question on cross-examination is harmless; the witness having later testified fully on the subject.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 4200, 4201.]

8. RAILROADS—INJURIES TO TRESPASSERS—EVIDENCE.

Refusing to allow defendants, in an action against a railroad company and its servant for shooting plaintiff, to ask a witness how often he got messages that gentlemen had drawn pistols on and threatened trainmen, there being testimony that plaintiff and others who were stealing a ride on a freight train had so acted towards the trainmen, and that a message announcing it had been sent to the railroad authorities, is proper; it not appearing how the answer could be material or relevant.

4. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT.

Giving an instruction, in an action against a railroad company and its employé, who also held a commission as policeman from the state, for the shooting of plaintiff by such employé, stating the liability of defendants, if the jury found, among other things, that at the time the employé shot he was attempting to drive trespassers from the train, is erroneous; there being no evidence that he was making such attempt, but merely that he was in the act of arresting plaintiff and others, who were stealing a ride.

5. EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS.

Testimony that after plaintiff was shot, and while he was lying on the ground, defendant's employé, in the presence of plaintiff and another, said, "Yes, if I hadn't shot * * * [him] I would have kicked his ribs in," is evidence against defendant that the employé shot plaintiff.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT—ACT IN SCOPE OF EMPLOYMENT—EVIDENCE.

Whether one who was in the employ of a railroad company as a special officer, and had a commission as police officer from the state, was acting in the scope of his employment with the company when he shot plaintiff, who was stealing a ride on the company's freight train, held a question for the jury, under all the facts and circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 84, Cent. Dig. Master and Servant, § 1275.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas; George M. Sharp, Judge.

Action by Louis Deck against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company and Charles A. Steiner. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Argued before MCSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Duncan K. Brent, for appellants. Gustavus A. Korb and Myer Rosenbush, for appellee.

BURKE, J. This case is before us for the second time. The first appeal is reported in 100 Md. 168, 59 Atl. 650. On that appeal the legal principles which should control the case were established, and we do not feel called upon to restate those principles in this opinion, or to reinforce them by reference to other authorities.

In order to prove the case stated in the declaration, the plaintiff, Louis Deck, testified: That about 12 o'clock on the night of July 1, 1899, he and several companions boarded a Baltimore & Ohio freight train, and rode as far as Oella, where they stayed until about 9 o'clock on the night of July 2, 1899, when they boarded another freight train of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad to return to Baltimore, but, when the train reached the point where the plaintiff was injured, it slowed down, and that he got off and started to walk. That he had walked a short distance when a shot was fired, and the ball struck him in the back. He afterwards heard other shots, but that the first shot he heard hit him. That, while he was lying on the ground, a man named Will Thomas came up with a lantern, and Steiner, one of the defendants, came also, and that Steiner asked what was the matter, and that the plaintiff told him he was shot. Thereupon Steiner said: "Yes; the son of a bitch, if I hadn't shot him, I would have kicked his ribs in." That he was about 15 feet from the train when he was shot. That, as soon as the ball hit him, he dropped right down. And one of the defendants, Charles Steiner, testified that he had been in the employ of the defendant company for about 20 years in various capacities; that he was on duty as a special officer for the defendant company on the night of July 2, 1899, and was paid by that company, and received no pay from any other source than from the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad; that his duties as special officer were to protect the company's cars and property, and drive off trespassers from trains, and arrest them, and keep them off the property; that on the night in question he was at the place of shooting as a policeman of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company to protect its property, and in pursuance of his duty as policeman, commissioned by the state of Maryland for the preservation of law and order. And John J. Hoffman, one of Deck's companions on the night in question, testified that, when they got near the city limits, the train slowed up and Deck got off and said he was going home; that "before the train stopped altogether some one came up and told us to get off there, that we were under arrest, and we were about to get off, and some one fired a shot"; that witness turned in the opposite direction and ran; that he had no pistol, and, as far as he knew, his companions had none; that there was no necessity for firing a revolver, because whoever the man was he could have arrested us without firing a revolver. Herkenhahn, another of Deck's companions, testified that they boarded a freight train of the defendant company at Oella on the night in question to return to Baltimore, and that, when the train got to Mt. Clare Junction, "some man ordered them off and said they were under arrest"; that, when the man ordered them off, he started to shoot at them, and they got off on the opposite side and ran; that he had no pistol and did not shoot. The plaintiff also proved by George J. Carlin that several months after the shooting Steiner told him that he had shot Deck, and by Dr. Smith he proved that Deck was seriously and permanently injured. The defendants offered evidence tending to prove: That on July 2, 1899, when the freight train of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, in charge of Conductor Severn, stopped at Frederick Junction, a station 58 miles from Baltimore, two men got off of the train, Deck being one of them. That, as the train started to leave the station, the men got back on the train, and were ordered off by the conductor. That one of the men drew a pistol and held it in the face of the conductor, and said: "You son of a bitch, if you come up here, I will blow your brains out." That the men afterwards got off of the train. That the plaintiff was next seen at Bartholows, a station seven miles from Frederick Junction, and was then standing on the ground alongside of a freight train in charge of Conductor Willhide. That at Gaithersburg, a station 30 miles from Baltimore, a number of men were found standing on the bumpers of the cars, and were ordered off by Conductor Willhide. That the men told the conductor "to move on, or he would be filled full of lead," and one of the men pushed the witness Schroeder in the back with a pistol, and told him to move on. That Willhide sent a telegraphic message from Gaithersburg to the railroad authorities in Baltimore that tramps had taken charge of the train, and to send relief. That in response to this message Steiner and Higginbotham were sent to the scene of trouble. They met Willhide's train near Sextonville, and the account given by the defendants' witnesses as to the circumstances attending the shooting differ in many important particulars from that adduced in support of the plaintiff's case. The defendants' evidence tends to prove that, when the officers reached the train upon which the men were riding, Higginbotham went to the north side of the train and Steiner to the south; that Steiner attempted to put the men under arrest, and notified them that they were under arrest; that thereupon they pulled their pistols, jumped from the train to the ground, and began to shoot; that they fired a number of shots, and appeared to be shooting at Steiner; that, as soon as they ceased shooting, Higginbotham, who was four or five feet from the men, attempted to arrest them, when Deck jumped in front of him, and was shot in the back by one of the men in the crowd; that the shot which struck Deck was the last one fired; that after being shot Deck staggered across the west-bound track and fell; that immediately afterwards Steiner came over to where the plaintiff was lying, and asked Higginbotham if he "had got any of them"; that it was at this point that the alleged declaration of Steiner, mentioned in plaintiff's evidence, was made. There is an agreement in the record to the effect that the defendant Steiner was an employé of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company on the night the plaintiff was shot, in the capacity of detective, or special officer; that he was on duty as such employé for said company on that night; and that, among other duties of said Steiner's employment, it was his duty to drive trespassers off the trains. These facts, which are the important and controlling ones in the record, are all that need be stated in order to enable us to pass upon the main questions presented upon this appeal.

During the trial four exceptions were taken by the defendants to the ruling of the court upon questions of evidence. We will first consider these exceptions. The defendants' counsel, on cross-examination, asked the plaintiff this question: "Did you hear him [Thomas] in that case, at that trial, he being your own witness, testify that Steiner had not said: 'If I hadn't shot the son of a bitch, I would have kicked his ribs in?'" The court refused to allow this question to be answered. This constitutes the defendants' first exception. The witness had made no mention of Thomas, or the testimony in the former trial in his examination in chief, and we see no reason why the defendants should have been permitted to cross-examine him as to what had been testified to by another witness in the former case. Thomas was present in court, and was afterwards called as a witness, both for the plaintiff and defendants, and testified to the facts sought to be elicited by the question to which the plaintiff's counsel had objected.

The defendants' second exception was abandoned. The defendants' third exception was taken to the refusal of the court to allow the counsel for defendants to ask the witness Steiner, on cross-examination, if he had not been called to the scene of the trouble, because of the notification of riotous and disorderly proceedings. If it be assumed that the trial court erred in this respect, it does not appear that the defendants were injured thereby, as the witness Steiner and others, at a later stage of the trial, testified fully as to the exact circumstances under which Steiner was called to the relief of Conductor Willhide.

The defendants' counsel proposed to ask the witness Andre the following question: "How often do you get messages announcing that gentlemen have drawn pistols upon and threatened trainmen?" The court refused to allow the question to be answered, and this constitutes the defendants' fourth exception. We are unable to see how the answer to this question could be material, or relevant to the issues involved. We therefore find no reversible errors in the rulings of the lower court upon questions of evidence.

The defendants' fifth exception presents for consideration the ruling of the court upon the prayers, and upon the special exceptions interposed by the defendants to the granting of the plaintiff's prayers. By the first prayer of the plaintiff, which was granted, the jury were instructed that if they find that the plaintiff was walking on or near the tracks of the defendant company on or about the night of July 2, 1899, as testified to, and if they further find that the defendant Steiner was in the employ of said defendant body corporate as a detective or special officer, and that while said Steiner was acting within the scope of his authority and in the course of his employment, if the jury so find, said Steiner attempted or was in the act of driving trespassers from a train belonging to the defendant body corporate, said Steiner recklessly and wantonly fired a pistol toward the plaintiff, then their verdict must be for the plaintiff. To the granting of this prayer two special exceptions were filed—one by the defendants jointly, and one by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company—both of which were overruled. The first exception asserted that there had been no evidence offered legally sufficient to show either that Steiner attempted or was in the act of driving off trespassers from a train belonging to the defendant body corporate, or that said Steiner recklessly or wantonly fired a pistol towards the plaintiff. The other exception is to both prayers of the plaintiff, and asserts that "there is no evidence in the case legally sufficient to show, as against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, that the shot by which Deck was hurt was fired by defendant Steiner."

We are not able to find in this record any evidence to support the hypothesis that on the occasion when the plaintiff was injured Steiner attempted or was in the act of driving trespassers from a train of the defendant company. In this respect the case is widely different from the one presented on the former appeal of Deck v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. In that case the defendants showed that Steiner was simply driving trespassers from the train. In this case it appears by every witness, both for the plaintiff and for the defendants, who has spoken upon the subject, that Steiner was in the act of arresting the men on the train for a breach of the criminal law of the state at the time the plaintiff was injured. By the plaintiff's own evidence it appears that he and his companions were guilty of a criminal act, and, if the testimony of the defendants' witnesses be true, they were a band of reckless and desperate lawbreakers. Steiner was a state officer, appointed by the governor under the law, and held a commission from the state. He was also an employé of the defendant company, but whether he was acting as an employé of the company at the time the injury was inflicted, or as a commissioned officer of the state in the exercise of the powers of his office in attempting to arrest, without warrant, the men on the train, who were confessedly violators of the criminal law of the state, were questions which should have been submitted to the decision of the jury. From what we have said it is manifest that the prayer clearly misstated the real act and purpose of Steiner, as shown by the evidence. The legal consequence which would follow from his acts done solely in one capacity would be quite different from that which would result from acts done in the other. We are, therefore, of opinion that the court committed an error in granting the plaintiff's first prayer, because there was no evidence in the case legally sufficient to support the hypothesis that Steiner, at the time the injury was inflicted, was attempting or was in the act of driving off trespassers from the defendant company's train.

We find no error in granting the plaintiff's second prayer. It is one that has been repeatedly approved by this court, and under the facts, as declared by the record, is free from objection.

The first prayer of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company was properly refused. The admissibility of the alleged declaration of Steiner, stated in the prayer, to bind the railroad company, was considered and passed upon by this court on the former appeal. The court, in considering the prayer of the railroad company, granted by the court below at the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, by which the jury was directed to find their verdict for the defendant company, Fowler, J., in delivering the opinion in that case, propounds this question: "Was there any evidence in the case legally sufficient to prove that the defendant Steiner did the shooting complained of?" He was then inquiring whether or not there was any evidence legally sufficient to be submitted to the jury to show, as against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, that Steiner did the shooting. In answer to that question the court distinctly decided that the evidence of the plaintiff that Steiner said, in the presence of Thomas, after the plaintiff was shot, and while he was lying upon the ground: "Yes; if I hadn't shot the son of a bitch, I would have kicked his ribs in"—was evidence to be considered by the jury against the defendant company that Steiner had shot the plaintiff.

There was no error in refusing the defendants' third prayer, because the question whether Steiner was acting in the scope of his employment as an employé of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company at the time the plaintiff was shot was a question for the jury to pass upon, under all the facts and circumstances of the case.

For error in granting the plaintiff's first prayer, the judgment must be reversed.

Judgment reversed, and new trial awarded, with costs to the appellants.

HIRLEY v. HIRLEY et al.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 9, 1906.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—SUSPENSION OF STATUTE—EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—CLAIMS AGAINST DECEDENT.

Under the express provisions of Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 57, § 7, whenever any person dies indebted and his interest in real estate is liable to be proceeded against for the payment of his debts by reason of the insufficiency of his personal estate, the operation of limitations is suspended in relation to the heirs and devisees of the debtor for the period of 18 months from the death of the decedent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Limitation of Actions, §§ 431-438.]

2. SAME—DOMESTIC SERVICES—CONTRACT FOR PAYMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show that domestic services rendered by plaintiff to defendant's ancestor were rendered under promise, and with the expectation of payment, and that plaintiff was accordingly entitled to recover therefor.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Washington County, in Equity; M. L. Keedy, Judge.

Bill by Mary H. Hirley against Elmer H. Hirley and others. From a decree dismissing the bill, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, and JONES, JJ.

Palmer Tennant, for appellant. Roger T. Edmonds, for appellees.

BRISCOE, J. On the 2d day of September 1904, the appellant filed a creditors' bill in the circuit court for Washington county against the appellees, who are heirs at law of one William H. Hirley, late of that county, deceased, to obtain a sale of certain real estate for the purpose of paying his debts. The bill avers that the intestate was, in his lifetime, indebted to the appellant in the sum of $2,094, "for personal attention in nursing, preparing meals, washing, mending clothes, room rent, etc., from April 1, 1893, to July 31, 1899, and from October 1, 1899 to May 24, 1900, at $300 per year." It further charges, that the intestate possessed no personal property at the time of his death but owned certain real estate, situate in Hagerstown, Md., subject to liens by way of mortgages, one for the sum of $200 and another for $100. The prayer of the bill, in addition to the one for general relief, is that the real estate or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose be sold for the payment of the appellant's claim. On the 23d of September, 1904, the appellees, the heirs at law, answered the bill wherein they deny the indebtedness as claimed by the plaintiff, and aver that if any existed, it was fully satisfied and discharged by payment in the lifetime of the intestate. They also rely upon and claim the benefit of the statute of limitations as a bar to the plaintiff's claim. The other matters charged in the bill are admitted by the answer to be true. The appellee Welsh, the assignee of the two mortgages against the property also answered the bill, and asserted the priority of her liens, in case of a sale of the property, but did not admit or deny the contentions of the plaintiff as alleged in the bill. To the answer, the plaintiff replied, "a new promise," to the bar of the statute of limitations, and joined issue on the other defenses made by the answer. The case was heard on bill, answer, and proof, and from a decree of the circuit court for Washington county passed on the 25th day of April 1905, dismissing the plaintiff's bill, this appeal has been taken.

The plea of limitations interposed by the appellees in the case, cannot we think be allowed to prevail to defeat that part of the appellant's claim, revived by the new promise, made in the lifetime of the debtor. Mr. Hirley died on May 24, 1900, and the bill in this case was filed on the 2d day of September, 1904; that is four years and three months after his death. This being a proceeding in equity against the real estate of a debtor for the payment of his debts by reason of the insufficiency of the personalty, the operation of the statute of limitations is suspended in relation to the heirs for the period of 18 months from the death of the decedent; that is the statute is suspended in favor of the creditor as against the heir and devisees for the period named. Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 57, § 7; Shepherd v. Bevans, 4 Md. Ch. 408; Thompson v. Dorsey, 4 Md. Ch. 149; Simms v. Lloyd, 58 Md. 477. The appellant's claim as set out in the record appears to be for personal attention, "in nursing, preparing meals, washing, mending, etc.," from April 1, 1893, to May 24, 1900, a period of 6 years and 11 months. The proof, we think, is sufficient to establish the appellant's claim for services rendered from the year 1896 to 1900, but the remaining portion thereof will be denied.

The undisputed testimony shows that William H. Hirley lived with and was cared for by the appellant from March, 1896, to the date of his death. The witness Margaret A. Rose testified, the intestate said, in her presence as to the services since 1896, "she should be well paid, there wasn't a child that did as much for him as she did." The witness Brogunier testified as to a conversation held with him as late as April, 1900, as follows: "Q. In what way did she attend to him? A. Washing, mending, and everything that he needed. Q. Did he take his meals with her? A. Yes, sir, while I was there. Q. Did he board there and room there? A. Yes, sir. Q. Had a room there? A. Yes, sir, he stayed there. Q. Did you ever have any conversation with him about Mrs. Hirley? A. Yes, sir, I did. Q. What conversation did you have with him? A. He sat down and talked to me when he had nothing to do, and was telling me that it was too hard on Ellie (that's what he always called her); he said it was too much work for her to do, and he said he would pay her and pay her well for it. Q. Did he or not ever talk to you about the services that were rendered by her to him? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did he say? A. He said if it would not be for Ellie he would not live with Charlie, he said he would not stay there with him. He said she would not lose anything by it, he intended to pay and pay her well for it." William Hose testified in answer to the question: "Q. Did you or not ever have any conversation with Mr. William H. Eirley regarding Mrs. Eirley, and the services rendered by her to him? A. Yes, sir. Well, I don't know as I could hardly just tell exactly word for word, we had a talk about Mrs. Eirley taking such good care of him, and in fact he stated that he hardly knew what he would do if it would not be for her as she had taken very good care of him. He told me that he expected to, or intended to, or was going to pay her. I do not remember just exactly what were the words that were used." There was other testimony to the effect that the services were rendered, that the intestate promised from time to time "to pay and to pay her well," and that the appellant expected to charge and to be paid for such services.

In view of this proof, we think it is clear that the appellant is entitled to recover for the services rendered from 1896 to 1900, at the rate of $25 per month. The law bearing upon a case of this kind, has been settled and determined by numerous decisions of this court, and we need not discuss it here. Gill v. Donovan, 96 Md. 518, 54 Atl. 117; Gill v. Staylor, 93 Md. 453, 49 Atl. 650; Hamilton v. Thirston, 93 Md. 213, 48 Atl. 709.

It follows that the decree of the court below will be reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings, in accordance with this opinion.

Decree reversed, and cause remanded, with costs.

STAKE v. MOBLEY et al.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 7, 1905.)

1. CONVERSION—WILLS—CONSTRUCTION.

Testator bequeathed a pecuniary legacy to his grandchild, and the balance of his estate he bequeathed unto his children or heirs, share and share alike, and appointed certain executors, with power to sell and convey all his property, real and personal. His estate consisted largely of real estate. The personal property was insufficient to pay his debts, and the pecuniary legacy and the remaining real estate was not susceptible of division in kind among his eight children. Held, that the will operated as a conversion of the real estate into personalty.

2. CONVERSION BY WILL—MORTGAGE BY HEIRS.

Where a will operated to convert testator's real estate, therein devised to his heirs, into personalty as of the date of the testator's death, a subsequent mortgage executed by one of the heirs on all her right, title, and interest in and to certain of such real estate created no lien thereon.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Washington County, in Equity; M. L. Keedy, Judge.

Bill by William A. Armstrong against Harry H. Mobley and Mary E. Stake, as executrix of the will of Edward Stake, deceased. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant Mary E. Stake as executrix appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, JONES, SCHMUCKER, and BURKE, JJ.

Charles A. Little, for appellant. J. O. Snyder, for appellee.

BOYD, J. The principal question in this case is whether or not the provisions of the last will and testament of Joseph Hoover worked an equitable conversion of all his realty into personalty at the time of his death. He died in 1887, leaving surviving him eight children. On the 28th of August, 1888, Virginia T. Mobley, one of his daughters, and her husband, Harry H. Mobley, executed a mortgage to the late Judge Edward Stake to secure the sum of $512 borrowed from him, in which they "do grant unto the said Edward Stake all right, title, interest and estate in and to the following described property situate in Hagerstown, Maryland, known as the 'Hoover House,' etc. She died in 1891, intestate, leaving her husband and one child, Cecelia M. Mobley, surviving her. On May 31, 1905, William H. Armstrong filed a bill in equity in the circuit court for Washington county, in which he alleged that he had purchased from the executors of Joseph Hoover the property known as the "Hoover House," and that the final account of the executors had been stated in the orphans' court of that county, whereby they distributed the proceeds of the sale of property purchased by him, distributing to Cecelia M. Mobley the share of her mother, although not yet paid to her, and ignored the mortgage to Edward Stake. The bill alleges that the mortgage was a lien on that share, and was a cloud upon the plaintiff's title, and prays the court to construe the will, to direct the executors as to the proper and legal manner of distribution of the estate, and that his title to the property may be relieved of the cloud resting upon it by reason of the mortgage. The cause was heard on an agreed statement of facts and a decree was passed which declared: (1) that the will operated as an equitable conversion of the real estate left by Joseph Hoover into personalty, at the time of his death, and (2) that the mortgage to Edward Stake did not constitute a lien upon the property and was of no effect or validity as a mortgage lien upon said property, or any portion thereof. From that decree, the executrix of Edward Stake appealed.

As the will is short, we will copy it as

It appears in the record, omitting only the formal beginning and conclusion. It is as follows:

"First. After my debts and funeral charges rf paid I bequeth as follows.

"Item. I give and bequeth to my Grandchild Edman Canan five hundre dollars to be used for to educate hin and the bal of my esstate I divide shar and shar alike unto my children or my hairs.

"And lastly I do hereby constitute and appoint my two sons George D. and Elder Hoover to be ny sole Executors with full power to sell and cony all ny property real pursonal and mixed wich I may die posed of of this ny last wil and testament."

It is dated September 28, 1886, and was duly executed. As it is the duty of the court to endeavor to ascertain from the will the intention of a testator, it is always unfortunate when one is drawn as this is; but we must construe it as we find it. There is but little conflict between the authorities as to the general principles applicable to an equitable conversion by will, but the difficulty is in their application to particular cases. When a testator manifests a clear and unmistakable intention that real property belonging to his estate shall be sold and converted into money, it is in equity generally treated as so converted at the time of his death, in the absence of some provision or expression in the will which contemplates a postponement of the time of conversion. The general rule "that lands devised to be sold are thereby turned into money, and construed in equity as personal estate," was recognized by our predecessors many years ago. Hurt v. Fisher, 1 Har. & G. 88. And in Thomas v. Wood, 1 Md. Ch. 296, the chancellor said: "In the eye of a court of equity the will of the testator had converted the real into personal estate, and the actual conversion by a sale could not be necessary to give validity to rights founded upon the equitable principle." That case has often been cited with approval by this court. There is generally little room for controversy when there are mandatory words directing the sale or giving the power of sale in imperative terms, as an absolute imperative direction to sell real property at all events will ordinarily work an immediate conversion. We use the words "generally," "ordinarily," etc., advisedly in stating these rules as there may be exceptions owing to peculiar conditions, such, for example, when land is devised to be sold and the proceeds of sale are directed to be paid upon a trust which is void, the land is not thereby converted into money, or when the purpose for which conversion is directed fails or is no longer necessary, as illustrated by the cases of Rizer v. Perry, 58 Md. 112, Cronise v. Hardt, 47 Md. 433, Orrick v. Boehm, 49 Md. 72, and others that might be cited.

In this will there is no express direction to sell, and the appellant contends that the intention of the testator to convert the realty into personalty cannot be gathered from the will, and that brings us to the real question to be determined. The agreed statement shows that the debts, funeral expenses, costs of administration, and the legacy to the grandchild far exceeded the personal estate of the testator, and that, in order to pay them, it was necessary to sell a part of the real estate. One lot was sold by the executors in 1887 for $300, another in that year for $3,510. After the sale of those properties the debts, funeral expenses, costs, and legacy were paid in full and a balance of $59.10 distributed. The sale of the "Hoover House" was not made until recently, 17 or 18 years after the death of the testator. There was, then, no necessity to sell it in order to pay the debts, etc., and the question is whether the will manifested a clear and unequivocal intention of the testator to have all his real estate sold and converted into money, for any purpose. It would be going quite far to lay much stress on the expression used by the testator "I bequeth as follows," for we cannot fail to see that whoever drew the will was not learned in the law, and hence it would not be an altogether fair inference that the testator necessarily meant by that term to treat all of his estate as personalty. But the fact remains that he did use a term that ordinarily refers to personal property, and hence it at least does not conflict with any other part of the will that might seem to treat the estate as personalty. The testator left eight children and his property consisted of less than a thousand dollars of personalty, and the three parcels of real estate—the two previously sold and the "Hoover House." We do not find in the record what the latter sold for, but it was evidently worth much more than either of the others. The testator knew that some part of his real estate would have to be sold to pay his debts, funeral expenses, and the legacy, and he also knew that the real estate could not be divided into eight parts. He could, of course, have left his real estate to his eight children as tenants in common, but he said (disregarding the spelling in the will) "and the balance of my estate I divide share and share alike unto my children or their heirs." "To divide is to separate and bestow in shares; to part an entire thing; to make partition of among a number." 9 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 678. He evidently did not mean to simply give the balance of his estate to his children as tenants in common, but expressed his intention of dividing it so that each one would have his share, or, to follow the above definition, "to separate and bestow in shares" or "to make partition of" it among his children. If that was all, his intention might be said to be still in doubt. But he gave his executors (again correcting the spelling) "full power to sell and convey all my property, real, personal and mixed which I may die possessed of"— not power to sell a part or so much as was necessary to pay his debts, etc., but all of it. Why give them power to sell all of it, if not for the purpose declared in the item just preceding that clause—so as to divide it between his children? It would seem, therefore, that the only way to carry out the intention of the testator was to sell all his real and personal property, pay his debts, funeral charges, costs of administration, other expenses, and the legacy, and then divide the balance between his children. It may be suggested that he meant "devise," instead of "divide"; but, if he did, he did not say so, and it would be substituting a word which would have an entirely different effect from the one he used, without any reason shown in the will for doing so. He did not use the word "devise" any place in his will, although he did use "bequeth"; and, if we substituted that word, it would make the testator devise his real estate to his children in one clause of the will, and in the one immediately following it authorize his executors to sell it. Unless we do make the substitution suggested above, which we do not feel justified in doing, there is no devise of the remaining real estate, as such. But, when we take the whole will into consideration, we see what seems to us to be a clear manifestation of the testator's intention—that the executors should sell all the real estate, and divide the proceeds between his children after the payment of debts, etc.

In Paisley v. Holzshu, 83 Md. 325, 34 Atl. 832, where it was held that land had been converted into money under the provisions of a deed of trust, this court said of the grantor: "He also mentions the payment of certain gifts, and then directs that the balance remaining shall be divided into seven equal shares. To execute his wishes, and accomplish his poorly expressed purposes as contained in said deed, would be a legal impossibility without a conversion." That is strikingly applicable to this case. In 2 Am. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 86, in the notes to Ingersoll's Estate, there is an excellent discussion of the subject of equitable conversion by will, and a large number of authorities are cited, including many of our own decisions. After discussing this subject under various heads, and speaking of a discretionary power of sale, it is said (on page 90): "The discretion, however, to prevent conversion, must be as to the fact of sale, so that it is optional with the executor or trustee whether he will sell or not. If a sale is contemplated at all events, there will be a conversion, though the time and the manner of sale are left entirely to the pleasure of the executor." And, after citing authorities for that, the annotator adds: "And, if a will contains only a discretionary power of sale, but its provisions cannot be carried out without a sale, the direction to sell will be held to be absolute, and will work an out and out conversion of the realty, at the time of the testator's death." So, in 9 Cyc. 832, it is said: "The intention to convert may be implied, as where a testator authorized his executors to sell his real estate, and it is apparent from the general provisions of the will that he intended such estate to be sold, although the power of sale is not in terms imperative." And this court in Paisley v. Holzshu, supra, quoted with approval from 3 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 1160, where the principle is thus stated: "It is not essential, however, that the direction should be express in order to be imperative. It may be necessarily implied. * * * In fact, the whole result depends upon the intention. If by express language, or by a reasonable construction of all its terms, the instrument shows an intention that the original form of the property shall be changed, then a conversion necessarily takes place." In 7 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law 466, after having stated that the question of conversion is to be determined from the intention of the testator as manifested by the provisions in the will, it is said: "Such intention may be shown by either (1) a positive direction for a conversion; or (2) an absolute necessity to sell in order to carry out the provisions of the will, the conversion arising on the theory that the testator must have intended that everything essential to his scheme should be done; or (3) such a blending of the real and personal estate by the testator in his will as clearly to show that he intended to create a fund out of both real and personal estate and to bequeath the fund as money."

It seems clear from these authorities that when in order to carry out the intention of the testator, as shown by the provisions of the will, it is necessary to sell real estate, a conversion takes place, although the testator only gave the executor a power of sale and did not in express terms direct it, for "the necessity of a conversion of realty into personalty to accomplish the purposes expressed is equivalent to an imperative direction to convert, and effects an equitable conversion." 9 Cyc. 833. When there is an imperative direction to sell, unless the time is qualified in some way, the conversion takes place as from the death of the testator, as is well settled by the authorities, and it must be likewise so when the provisions are such as to be equivalent to an imperative direction to sell. We do not understand the cases of this state, such as Cronise v. Hardt, 47 Md. 433, Orrick v. Boehm, 49 Md. 72, Keller v. Harper, 64 Md. 74, 1 Atl. 65, and Kennedy v. Dickey, 99 Md. 295, 57 Atl. 621, to stand in the way of applying these doctrines to this case. In so far as they may in any wise appear to do so, it is because of the difference between the provisions of these wills and that of Joseph Hoover. Having determined that his intention was that the executors should sell all his property, real and personal, in order to divide the balance (after the payment of his debts, etc.), and that it was necessary to do so in order to carry out his intention, the power of sale under those circumstances is necessarily equivalent to an imperative direction, and must be governed by the principles of law in reference to conversion that would have been applicable if there had been an express direction to sell.

It is to be regretted that this conclusion makes the mortgage of Judge Stake invalid as a lien on Mrs. Mobley's interest in the "Hoover House," but the case of Early v. Dorsett, 45 Md. 462, is decisive of the question. As shown above, this mortgage simply granted "all right, title, interest and estate in and to the following described property," etc. In Early v. Dorsett a decree was passed for the sale of real estate devised by a will, for the purpose of distribution amongst the devisees. Mr. Sasscer, one of the devisees, purchased the property and the sale was ratified, and before he had paid the purchase money in full or had obtained a deed from the trustee he mortgaged the land to Early. He afterwards made default, and a resale was made at the purchaser's risk. In passing on the question, after referring to the law in this state that, when such a sale was ratified and the purchaser had complied with the terms of sale as provided by the decree, a mutation from realty to personalty was complete, it was held that Sasscer's share of the net proceeds of the original sale as one of the distributees was at the time the mortgage was executed a mere chose in action, and not an interest in land, and that it did not pass by the mortgage, and was "simply a conveyance by way of mortgage of all his right, title and interest in the land, which he had purchased under the decree." Judge Miller said the court had examined it to see if it contained any terms capable of effecting an assignment of such share, but found nothing in it "which can operate as a conveyance or assignment of the mortgagor's interest in these proceeds." The language of this mortgage is similar to that in Early v. Dorsett.

As this bill was filed by a purchaser from the executors to remove the cloud on his title, and by our decision his title is relieved, it is not necessary, and would not in our opinion be proper, to determine whether the executrix of Judge Stake could have any relief in a direct proceeding, instituted for the purpose, against this fund, or whether it was necessary to take out letters of administration on the estate of Mrs. Mobley (inasmuch as she entered into the covenant to pay the mortgage and was on the note, and at least to that extent was in debt) in order to pass her share to her husband and daughter. Such inquiries would involve the consideration of the statute of limitations and other questions which cannot properly now be determined, and would not be relevant to the issues raised by this bill and the answers. We only refer to them in order that it may be distinctly understood that we do not mean by this decision of the questions which are before us in any way preclude the executrix of Judge Stake from any proceeding that may be open to her to reach this fund, if that be possible.

Decree affirmed; the appellant to pay the costs.

GENDRON v. ST. PIERRE.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Hillsborough. Dec. 5, 1905.)

1. SLANDER—PLEADING.

A declaration for slander alleged in the inducement that plaintiff had always properly treated and maintained his wife, and alleged that defendant wrongfully stated that when he first visited the woman (meaning plaintiff's wife) defendant became suspicious of insurance fraud, which suspicions were not lessened by the apparent indifference "of the woman's husband and sister with reference to her condition," etc., and that plaintiff's wife died because of his culpable neglect of her in her sickness, etc., Hold, that the declaration was not defective for failure to allege that plaintiff had the exclusive care of his wife and, except in the innuendoes, that the plaintiff's negligence caused her death.

2. SAME.

Where, in an action for slander, in stating defendant's belief that plaintiff's wife died because of his neglect, the alleged slanderous words expressly implied the existence of the marital relation between plaintiff and the woman referred to, and that the wife was sick and needed medical care, maintenance, and nursing, which were absolutely necessary to preserve her life, and want of them caused her death, the allegation that the words were uttered and "published of and concerning the plaintiff" constituted a sufficient allegation that the words were spoken concerning plaintiff in his marital relation to the sick woman, and with reference to the performance of the legal duties he owed to her by reason of such relation.

3. SAME—STATEMENTS OF OPINION.

Where defendant's statements naturally conveyed the impression that the death of plaintiff's wife was caused or hastened by his criminal negligence, they were not rendered harmless because defendant stated the slanderous words in the form of an opinion only.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Label and Slander, §§ 100-102.]

4. SAME — INNUENDOES — EXTENSION OF MEANING.

Where, in an action for slander, the declaration alleged in the inducement that plaintiff had always properly cared for his wife prior to her death, and that defendant had wrongfully stated concerning plaintiff that the wife appeared to be sadly neglected, that he at once became suspicious of insurance fraud, etc., and stated "I think the woman (meaning the plaintiff's wife) was neglected in order that her family might get her insurance" (meaning that she, plaintiff's wife, was culpably neglected in her sickness by plaintiff, so that she, the plaintiff's wife, might die, and he, the plaintiff, might receive the insurance upon her life, etc.), the innuendo so alleged was not objectionable as extending the sense of the words spoken.

5. NEW TRIAL—SUCCESSIVE APPLICATIONS.

The denial of a motion to set aside a verdict and the omission of the defendant to except to such ruling concludes him from making a subsequent motion in the trial court on the same grounds, except on an application for a rehearing by reason of accident, mistake, or misfortune.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, § 14.]

6. TRIAL — INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE — MOTION FOR NONSUIT—WAIVER.

Defendant waives his right to object to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the declaration by submitting the case to the court on its merits, without making a motion for a nonsuit or for an order of judgment in his favor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, §§ 981-985.]

7. SLANDER—WORDS SLANDEROUS PER SE—IMPLIED MALICE.

Where slanderous words are used in such a sense as to impute a crime, malice will be implied.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Libel and Slander, § 111.]

8. SAME—DAMAGES—MALICE.

In an action for slander, consisting of words slanderous per se, the amount of damages to which plaintiff is entitled depends in part on the effect of the malice on plaintiff's mind.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Libel and Slander, § 351.]

9. SAME—EXCESSIVENESS.

Where defendant spoke slanderous words of and concerning plaintiff, imputing to him criminal neglect of his wife contributing to her death, a verdict in plaintiff's favor for $50 was not excessive.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Libel and Slander, §§ 353, 354.]

Transferred from Superior Court; Chamberlin, Judge.

Action by Jules Gendron against Servule St. Pierre for slander. A verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff in the superior court for $50, and the case was transferred for the hearing of defendant's exceptions. Overruled.

The original writ contained two counts. The second count (see 72 N. H. 400, 56 Atl. 915) was struck out by amendment. The first count, as amended since the former transfer of the case, is in substance as follows: In a plea of the case, for that, whereas, the plaintiff is a good, true, and just citizen of said state, and from the time of his birth has always behaved and governed himself as such, and during all that time has never been guilty, nor justly suspected of having been guilty, of cheating, deceit, fraud, or any crime whatsoever; and whereas, said plaintiff, on the 29th day of October, 1900, at said Manchester, was an honest and law-abiding citizen of said Manchester, and has always maintained himself by industrious attention to his business, and supported and maintained his family and treated his wife kindly, giving her of his money and attention all within his power, nevertheless the defendant, not being ignorant of the premises, but fraudulently, maliciously, and wickedly contriving to injure, blacken, and defame the plaintiff in his good name and reputation, and to expose him to pains and penalties prescribed by law, did on, etc., at, etc., in presence of divers good citizens, etc., utter and publish the following false, scandalous, and malicious words of and concerning the plaintiff, to wit: "When I first visited the woman [meaning the wife of said plaintiff] she appeared to be sadly neglected, and I at once became suspicious of insurance fraud. My suspicions were not lessened by the apparent indifference of the woman's husband and sister with reference to her condition. I learned that the magnetic healer who had been treating her had been discharged on recommendation of a priest, who said that the medicines should be thrown away. I examined the remedies the magnetic healer had been using, and was surprised to find that they were all right. I believe that if their use had been continued, the woman [meaning the plaintiff's wife] might have recovered. As it was, she [meaning the plaintiff's wife] went three days without any medical attendance [meaning she was willfully neglected by said plaintiff]. Then I was called. I was told that there was an insurance on the woman's [meaning the plaintiff's wife's] life. Mr. Gadbois came to me yesterday, and I refused to sign the death certificate. The woman's [meaning the plaintiff's wife's] body had been removed from the Orange street house to her home on Church street. I did not know until I investigated whether the woman I had treated was dead, or whether it was some other. Furthermore, I was suspicious with regard to the insurance. I think the woman [meaning the plaintiff's wife] was neglected in order that her family might get her insurance [meaning that she, the plaintiff's wife, was culpably neglected in her sickness by the plaintiff, so that she, the plaintiff's wife, might die, and he, the plaintiff, might receive the insurance upon her life]." The declaration further alleges that by reason of the publication of these words the plaintiff was brought into great infamy and contempt among his fellow-citizens, and has suffered great anxiety of mind and been exposed to pains and penalties prescribed by law. The defendant's demurrer to the declaration was overruled, subject to exception. The defendant's petition for a new trial on account of newly discovered evidence was denied February 21, 1905, after a hearing. At this hearing the defendant's motion to set aside the verdict, because it was against the evidence and because the damages were excessive, and his request that all the testimony be transferred, were denied. It was found by the court that the defendant waived his right to make said motions by not making them at the close of the plaintiff's testimony, or at the close of all the testimony. April 29th the defendant filed a motion to set aside the verdict because (1) upon the evidence, as matter of law, the defendant was not guilty of slander of the plaintiff; (2) the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence; (3) it is wholly unsupported by the evidence; (4) the evidence, as matter of law, did not sustain the allegations of the declaration; (5) the damages assessed were contrary to the law; and (6) they were wholly contrary to the evidence. This motion was denied, subject to exception. The defendant then requested that the evidence relating to the charge of slander and the damages be made a part of the case. The request was denied, and the defendant excepted.

Andrews & Andrews, for plaintiff. Branch & Branch, and John P. Bartlett, for defendant.

CHASE, J. The plaintiff, by his declaration, places his right of action wholly on the ground that the alleged slanderous words per se imputed to him the commission of the crime of killing his wife by his criminal negligence in omitting to perform a duty to her which the law imposed upon him. No question is made that a husband who can supply his wife with the necessities of life, and neglects to do so while she is living with him and is incapable of caring for herself by reason of sickness or other cause, is guilty of the crime of murder or manslaughter, according to the nature and degree of the negligence in respect to premeditation, willfulness, recklessness, and culpability, if her death is caused or hastened by such neglect. Buch v. Company, 69 N. H. 260, 261, 44 Atl. 809, 76 Am. St. Rep. 163; State v. Smith, 65 Me. 257; Lewis v. Georgia, 72 Ga. 164, 53 Am. Rep. 835; Territory v. Manton, 8 Mont. 95, 19 Pac. 387; Regina v. Marriott, 8 O. & P. 425, 84 Eng. C. L. 816; Regina v. Plummer, 1 O. & K. 600, 47 Eng. C. L. 600; Regina v. Nicholls, 18 Cox C. C. 75; 2 Bish. Cr. L. §§ 659, 686; P. S. c. 278, §§ 1-8. The demurrer raises the question whether the declaration sufficiently sets forth an imputation to the plaintiff of the commission of such crime.

The defendant says the declaration is defective because it does not set forth that the plaintiff had the exclusive care of his wife, and does not allege, except in the innuendoes, that the plaintiff's negligence caused her death. It is stated in the inducement of the declaration that the plaintiff "has always * * * supported and maintained his family, and treated his wife kindly, giving her of his money and attention all within his power." This necessarily implies the existence of the relation of husband and wife between him and the woman referred to in the alleged slanderous words, an appreciation by him of the legal duty that pertains to that relationship, and an attempt on his part to fulfill the duty. It states facts showing that the duty was not removed or suspended for any cause, but still rested upon the plaintiff, and that he had the care of his wife, so far as his marital duty required him to assume such care. The alleged slanderous words also expressly state or necessarily imply the existence of the marital relation between the plaintiff—"woman's husband"—and the woman referred to, the legal duty arising from the relation, and that the wife was sick and needed medical care, medicines, and nursing, in fact, that these were absolutely necessary to preserve her life, and the want of them caused her death. The allegation of the declaration that the words were uttered and published "of and concerning the plaintiff," in connection with the other allegation above quoted and the words themselves, show that the words were spoken of and concerning the plaintiff in his marital relation to the sick woman and the performance of the legal duties he owed the woman by reason of that relation. Characterizing the plaintiff's conduct toward his wife as "apparent indifference with reference to her condition"—indifference of such kind and degree as to induce a suspicion of fraud depending for its consummation upon her death—accompanied with the statement that the woman "appeared to be sadly neglected," is an emphatic, though indirect, statement that he was culpably negligent in the performance of his legal duty to her. It falls little, if any, short of charging the husband with deliberate and premeditated negligence with a view of causing or hastening the wife's death. It was not necessary that the plaintiff should have the exclusive care of his wife to render him guilty of the crime, if he himself was criminally negligent. The fact that the wife's sister, the priest, or some other person was also equally guilty, would not relieve the plaintiff from responsibility for his own negligence.

Another objection made to the declaration is that the slanderous words alleged in it are but an expression of a suspicion or opinion that the plaintiff committed the crime referred to; that they do not definitely charge the plaintiff with the crime. According to the defendant's alleged statements, his suspicion relating to insurance fraud was not the cause of his thinking that the wife was neglected. On the other hand, the neglect of her was the cause of his suspicion. He noticed when he first visited the woman that "she appeared to be sadly neglected," and he attributed the motive for this neglect to insurance fraud. He further stated, in substance, that there was neglect in omitting for three days to administer to her the remedies that had been prescribed by the magnetic healer. If this omission was due to the advice of the priest, the fact would not necessarily show that the omission was not negligence of a culpable nature. He further asserted his belief that if the use of the remedies had been continued, the woman might have recovered. He refused to sign a death certificate. These statements, taken together, naturally convey the impression that the wife's death was caused or hastened by criminal negligence. But he seems to have summed up the whole matter in the definite statement: "I think the woman was neglected in order that her family might get the insurance." The definiteness and injurious effect of this statement are not taken away or materially modified by the introductory words, "I think." The expression, "I think A. murdered B.," is quite likely to have the same effect upon the hearers that the expression, "A. murdered B.," would have. If it be regarded as an expression of an opinion, it nevertheless imputes the crime to the plaintiff; and the imputation is supported and made more effective in this case by the fact that the defendant was called as the medical attendant of the wife. At least, a jury might find, from a consideration of the words in the light of the circumstances alleged, that the defendant meant by his statements absolutely to impute to the plaintiff the commission of a felony. Moore v. Butler, 48 N. H. 161; Tozer v. Mashford, 6 Exch. 539; Simmons v. Mitchell, 6 App. Cas. 156.

The defendant further says that the innuendo which follows the words "I think," etc., extends the sense of the words. The innuendo is: "Meaning that she, the plaintiff's wife, was culpably neglected in her sickness by the plaintiff, so that she, the plaintiff's wife, might die, and he, the plaintiff, might receive the insurance upon her life." When the facts recited in the inducement of the declaration, above referred to, and the other statements of the defendant are considered, it appears that the words to which the innuendo applies may have been used in the sense therein stated. As before stated, a jury might find that the defendant meant that the woman was neglected by her husband in order that she might die, and he or his family—it is immaterial which—might obtain the insurance which the defendant supposed was outstanding upon her life. The jury might think that describing such neglect as "culpable" limited, rather than enlarged the idea expressed by the word without qualification. The innuendo does not appear to exceed its proper office. Harris v. Burley, 8 N. H. 256. "It is immaterial whether the words spoken impute an offense to the plaintiff in a direct manner, or indirectly by such hints or modes of expression as are likely to convey the intended meaning to the persons to whom the words are addressed." Sturtevant v. Root, 27 N. H. 69, 72; Tenney v. Clement, 10 N. H. 52; Symonds v. Carter, 32 N. H. 458. The defendant's words appear to have been of this character; and the declaration, though somewhat inartificially framed, contains sufficient recitals, allegations, and innuendoes, if proved, to render the defendant liable in an action for slander. Robinson v. Keyser, 22 N. H. 323. The demurrer was properly overruled.

There was no exception to the denials of the petition, motion, and request made prior to April 29th, and consequently there is no question of law before the court with respect to those matters. The ground of the defendant's motion of April 29th to set aside the verdict is stated in several forms, but, in substance, it is that, upon the whole evidence, the verdict is "against the evidence" and so contrary to law, as to both the defendant's guilt and the damages. It is but a repetition of the previous motion to set aside the verdict. The denial of the first motion and the omission of the defendant to except to it concludes him upon the question presented by the motion, unless, upon an application to the superior court for a rehearing, he shows that he is entitled to it by reason of accident, mistake, or misfortune. If the defendant desired to raise questions of law upon the denial of the motion, he should have done so at that time. Furthermore, the defendant waived his right to object, on account of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the declaration, by his submission of the case to the court upon its merits, without making a motion for a nonsuit, or for an order of judgment in his favor. Elwell v. Roper, 72 N. H. 585, 58 Atl. 507. Non constat that the plaintiff might not have been able and been allowed to introduce evidence to supply the deficiency if such motions had been made. The declaration alleges that the slanderous words mentioned in it were false, and were spoken of and concerning the plaintiff maliciously. If the words were used in a manner and sense to impute a crime, they imply malice; and the amount of the damages to which the plaintiff is entitled depends in part upon the effect of the malice upon the plaintiff's mind. Symonds v. Carter, 32 N. H. 458; Friel v. Plumer, 69 N. H. 498, 43 Atl. 618, 76 Am. St. Rep. 190. It does not appear, as matter of law, that $50 would be excessive damages, even if there was no evidence of malice other than the publishing of the words, if they were found to be used in the sense above mentioned.

Exceptions overruled. All concurred.

IN RE OPINION OF THE JUSTICES.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. NOTARIES—PUBLIC OFFICERS.

Notaries public are governmental officers. [Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Notaries, § 1.]

2. OFFICERS—ELIGIBILITY—WOMEN.

Since, under the common law, women are disabled from holding public office, they are disqualified from appointment as notaries public. [Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Officers, §§ 24, 25.]

Opinion of the justices as to whether a woman can be properly appointed a notary public. Question answered in the negative.

To His Excellency the Governor and the Honorable Council:

"Notaries public shall be appointed by the Governor, with advice of the council." Pub. St. 1901, c. 18, § 1. The question submitted, under date of September 25, 1905, whether a woman is qualified to fill the office of notary public in this state, therefore, involves the power of the executive to appoint such a person notary public, and is, in that aspect, one which it is our constitutional duty to answer, because it is a question of law which the Governor and council may be called upon to determine in the performance of the duties of their office. Opinion of the Justices, 67 N. H. 600, 601, 43 Atl. 1074. As the question is framed, however, it relates to the personal competency to hold the position of a class, individuals among whom, it may be presumed, may desire such an appointment.

Conceiving that there might be such persons, and considering the possibility that such an application for appointment might be the occasion of your request, and not understanding that there was need of an immediate reply, we have delayed returning our answer in order to afford any persons who might desire it an opportunity to be heard before us. We were inclined to this course because the conclusions reached by this court in 1890 upon the application of a woman to be admitted to practice as an attorney seemed to us conclusive upon the present question, and we desired, if possible, to have the aid of counsel if the question were to be reopened. We have not been favored with any argument upon the law, and it does not seem necessary to do more than to state the conclusions then reached after a most exhaustive examination of the authorities. It was then held that at common law, in the absence of enabling legislation, a woman cannot hold a public governmental office. "By our common law, women do not vote in town-meeting. The reason is that voting is an exercise of governmental power. For the same reason, and by the same law, they do not hold public office." Ricker's Petition, 66 N. H. 207, 254, 29 Atl. 559, 583, 24 L. R. A. 740. In that case a distinction is taken between public and private office and between office and employment, and the conclusion reached, contrary to authorities in other jurisdictions cited in the case, that, although an attorney at law is an officer of the court, his employment is not a public governmental office to which the common-law disability of women attaches. Although authorities to the contrary of the latter proposition may be found, there seems to be little, if any, controversy over the main proposition that at common law women are disabled to take part in governmental action, and that to enable them to do so affirmative legislation is necessary. Note, 88 L. R. A. 215. Whether the progress of the age requires that this, as well as other disabilities of the common law with which women have been burdened, should be removed, is not a question for either the executive or the judicial departments of the government. The sole question here is whether a public notary, or notary public, is a public officer exercising some part, however small, of governmental power, executive, legislative, or judicial.

"An office, as defined by Blackstone, is a right to exercise a public or private employment, and to take the fees and emoluments thereunto belonging, whether public, as those of magistrates, or private, as bailiffs, receivers, and the like. 2 Bl. Com. 36. And it is laid down 'that a public officer is one who has some duty to perform concerning the public; and he is not the less a public officer when his duty is confined to narrow limits, because it is the duty, and the nature of that duty, which makes him a public officer, and not the extent of his authority.' 7 Bac. Abr. 280; Carth. 479. And we apprehend that it may be stated as universally true that where an employment or duty is a continuing one, which is defined by rules prescribed by law, and not by contract, such a charge or employment is an office, and the person who performs it is an officer." Shelby v. Alcorn, 36 Miss. 273, 72 Am. Dec. 169, 172; Ricker's Petition, 66 N. H. 207, 232, 29 Atl. 559, 572, 24 L. R. A. 740. "An office is a public station or employment, conferred by the appointment of government. The term embraces the idea of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties." United States v. Hartwell, 6 Wall. 835, 893, 18 L. Ed. 830. "The term 'office' implies a delegation of a portion of the sovereign power to, and possession of it by, the person filling the office; and the exercise of such power within legal limits constitutes the correct discharge of the duties of such office. The power thus delegated and possessed may be a portion belonging sometimes to one of the three great departments, and sometimes to another, still it is a legal power, which may be rightfully exercised, and in its effects it will bind the rights of others, and be subject to revision and correction only according to the standing laws of the state." Opinion of the Justices, 3 Greenl. 481, 482; High, Ex. Rem. § 625. See note. 72 Am. Dec. 179-189.

Tested by these rules, the position or place of notary public is clearly a public office. The appointment is made by the government for a fixed term, and the duties and powers of the place are prescribed by law. Every notary public has, in addition to the usual powers of the office, the powers of a justice of the peace in relation to depositions and the acknowledgment of deeds and other instruments and the administering of oaths. Pub. St. 1901, c. 18, §§ 1, 2. The notary's certificate of protest under his official seal is evidence of the facts stated in the protest and of the notice given to the drawers or indorsers. Id. § 3. His records are public records, which, when he dies or becomes insane, the law requires to be deposited in the archives of the state. The office is of very ancient origin, and has been here recognized as public from a very early day. The Cutt Code (1679-80) provided for the punishment of any "notary or keeper of public records," for the destruction or alteration of "any such record or writing of concernment committed to his keeping and trust," and provided, among other punishments, that "such corrupt officer shall lose his office." 1 N. H. Prov. Laws (Batch. Ed.) p. 19. In 1802 the powers of notaries were enlarged by giving to them certain powers of justices of the peace, and provision was made for the preservation of their records in the office of the Secretary of State (Laws [Ed. 1805] p. 96); while in 1829 it was provided that "all public notaries * * * shall hold their office subject to be removed by the Senate upon an impeachment, or by the Governor with the consent of the council, on the address of both houses of the Legislature and shall be under oath for the faithful performance of the duties of the office" (Laws [Ed. 1830] p. 536, tit. 118). No ground is perceived upon which it can be urged that in this jurisdiction the place of a notary is merely a public employment or a private office; and the distinction under which Mrs. Ricker was admitted to practice as an attorney will not permit women to hold the office of public notaries.

That a notary public holds a public office is the holding of the authorities elsewhere. "That a notary public is a public officer, I do not think to be open to serious doubt. He is one of the 'public officers of this state' concerning whom chapter 5 of the Revised Statutes treats, and he is therein placed 'in the class of judicial officers.' The office of a notary public must be filled by appointment of the Governor of the state, with the consent of the Senate. The appointee, before he enters upon the duties of his office, is required to take and file an oath. * * * His term of office is fixed by law. * * * All their powers are defined by law, and their acts within their legitimate sphere have force and solemnity, because having the express authorization and sanction of statute. The very designation of 'notary public' indicates a relation which the incumbent of the office sustains to the body politic. It is impossible to regard him as other than a public officer." People v. Rathbone, 145 N. Y. 434, 437, 40 N. E. 395, 396, 28 L. R. A. 384. For other authorities to the same effect, see Commonwealth v. Haines, 97 Pa. 223, 39 Am. Rep. 805; Smith v. Meador, 74 Ga. 416, 58 Am. Rep. 438; Kirksey v. Bates, 7 Port. (Ala.) 529, 31 Am. Dec. 722; Governor v. Gordon, 15 Ala. 72; Teutonia, etc., Co. v. Turrell, 19 Ind. App. 469, 49 N. E. 852, 65 Am. St. Rep. 419; State v. Clark, 21 Nev. 333, 31 Pac. 545, 18 L. R. A. 313, 37 Am.

St. Rep. 517; Britton v. Niccolls, 104 U. S. 757, 766, 26 L. Ed. 917; Mech. Pub. Off. § 103. In Massachusetts the court advised the Governor and council that a woman could not hold the office of notary without legislative action (Opinion of the Justices, 150 Mass. 586, 23 N. E. 850, 6 L. R. A. 842), and subsequently advised the House of Representatives that the Legislature could not authorize such appointments because the matter is regulated by the Constitution of the state. Opinion of the Justices, 165 Mass. 599, 43 N. E. 927, 32 L. R. A. 350.

Notaries are not mentioned by name in our Constitution. We have not been able to find any statute authorizing their appointment until the General Statutes of 1867 (Gen. St. c. 16, § 1), though the fact of their appointment is recognized by various acts, to some of which reference has been made. Whether authority to make the appointment is properly derived from the statute or the Constitution is not material upon the present question. Considering it to be derived from the statute of 1867, in the existing state of the law an intent to authorize the appointment of women to the office cannot be inferred in the absence of express language indicating that intent, such as was used in chapter 8, p. 18, Laws 1872, by which female citizens were authorized to hold office in school districts and as school committee in cities and towns. See Gen. Laws 1878, c. 87, § 10; Laws 1879, p. 370, c. 57, § 19; Ricker's Petition, 66 N. H. 207, 230, 29 Atl. 559, 24 L. R. A. 740.

Because by our common law women are disabled from holding public office, and because the place of notary public is a public governmental office, and because we are unable to find any evidence of legislative purpose or intention to change the common law of this state in this respect, if such power exists, a point not considered, we are compelled to answer in the negative the question submitted.

WESTMINSTER NAT. BANK v. NEW ENGLAND ELECTRICAL WORKS et al.
(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Grafton. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. CORPORATIONS — TRANSFERS OF STOCK — CONSUMMATION OF TRANSFER.

The ownership of stock passes from the seller to the buyer by force of the contract of sale and as soon as such contract is fully consummated; but as between the buyer and the corporation, or interested third parties without notice, the buyer does not ordinarily acquire all the rights of a stockholder until the transfer is entered on the corporate records.

2. SAME—TRANSFER OF TITLE—ESTOPPEL TO DENY.

Where a stock certificate recites that the person to whom it is issued is the owner of certain shares of fully paid and nonassessable stock, the corporation is estopped to deny the title of an innocent transferee from the stockholder who has given value for the stock on the faith of the certificate, on the ground that, by the laws of the state creating the corporation, the corporation is prohibited from issuing stock until fully paid and the stockholder has paid nothing for his stock.

3. BANKS AND BANKING—NATIONAL BANKS—POWERS—ACQUISITION OF STOCK.

A national bank, which in the ordinary course of business receives stock as collateral security for a loan, may protect itself from loss by taking the stock in payment of the loan.

4. APPEAL—PRESERVATION OF ERROR—NECESSITY OF EXCEPTION.

Where a party was regularly made a defendant to an action at law, and an amendment changing the action to one in equity was allowed, without defendant's taking any exception, defendant could not claim, after the transfer of the cause to the Supreme Court, that he was not as fully a party defendant as when he appeared in the action at law.

5. CORPORATIONS—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—RIGHT TO SUE.

The courts will entertain jurisdiction at the suit of a foreign corporation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 12, Cent. Dig. Corporations, §§ 2563-2567, 2595-2600.]

6. SAME—RIGHTS OF STOCKHOLDERS—TRANSFER OF STOCK.

Where stock is valid in the hands of a transferee on the ground of estoppel against the corporation, notwithstanding its invalidity in the hands of the transferor, the transferee has the right to have the stock transferred to him on the books of the corporation, although the law of the state creating the corporation (Civ. Code S. C. 1902, § 1894) provides that no transfer shall be valid, except as between the parties, until the same shall have been regularly entered upon the books of the corporation.

7. SAME—ENFORCEMENT OF RIGHT—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS.

The right of a transferee of stock in a corporation to have the same transferred on the books of the corporation is a contractual right, the enforcement of which does not involve an interference with the internal affairs of the corporation, and which consequently may be asserted through the courts of another state than that creating the corporation.

8. SAME — REFUSAL TO TRANSFER STOCK — REMEDIES OF TRANSFEE.

A transferee of corporate stock is not confined to an action for damages for the refusal of the corporation to transfer the stock to him on its books, but may require the corporation, by bill for specific performance, to transfer the stock to him, especially where the real and prospective value of the stock depends on the future development and management of the corporate enterprise.

9. SAME — ACTIONS TO COMPEL TRANSFER — LACHES.

A transferee of stock in a corporation is not guilty of laches as a matter of law in delaying suit to compel the corporation to transfer the stock to him on its books, where it does not conclusively appear that his delay has been unreasonable or that the corporation has been in any way prejudiced thereby.

10. EVIDENCE — ADMISSIONS — CORPORATE OFFICERS — CONCLUSIVENESS ON CORPORATION.

There is no presumption of law that a vice president and director of a bank is, by reason of his official relation to the bank, authorized to bind the bank by his admissions.

Transferred from Superior Court; Pike, Judge.

Bill in equity by the Westminster National Bank against the New England Electrical Works and others. There was an order in favor of plaintiff, to which defendants excepted, and the case was transferred from the superior court. Exceptions overruled.

The suit was begun as an action at law, but was afterwards amended by the filing of this bill, the object of which is to compel the issuance of a certificate of stock to plaintiff. Some of the stockholders of the electrical works were also made defendants. The plaintiff corporation is located and does business in Massachusetts. The electrical works was incorporated under the laws of South Carolina, but has its principal place of business in this state. About the time of the formation of the corporation a regularly signed certificate for 350 shares of the stock of the defendant corporation was issued to one Bibber, for which he paid nothing. In June, 1899, Bibber pledged this certificate to the plaintiffs as collateral security for a loan, and they held it as such security until February 25, 1901, when, by an arrangement between Bibber and the plaintiffs, he formally transferred the certificate to them in part payment of the loan. In these transactions the plaintiffs acted in good faith, having no knowledge of any defect or infirmity in the issuance of the stock.

May 1, 1902, the plaintiffs notified the defendant corporation that they owned the Bibber certificate, and asked for information in regard to the company, and on July 13, 1903, they requested the electrical works to transfer the certificate to their name, but the request was not granted. The certificate stated that the shares were fully paid and nonassessable, and that they were transferable only upon the books of the corporation. By the Code of South Carolina (Civ. Code, 1902, § 1894) it is provided that "no stock shall be issued by any corporation until fully paid; * * * and no transfers of stock shall be valid except as between the parties thereto, until the same shall have been regularly entered upon the books of the corporation." The business of the electrical works has not been thoroughly developed, and its future is problematical. The plaintiffs believe that the stock will ultimately be much more valuable than it now is. January 3, 1903, certain stockholders of the defendant corporation began proceedings in the Supreme Court of New York against Bibber, the Westminster National Bank, and the electrical works, and obtained an order restraining Bibber from transferring his certificate of stock, and restraining the electrical works from making any transfers thereof on the books of the corporation. The plaintiff bank was not served with process in that suit and did not appear, although it received information of the pendency thereof. The defendants offered testimony of what one Greenwood, a director and vice president of the bank, had said in regard to the way the bank received the stock. The evidence was excluded upon the ground that it did not appear that Greenwood had authority to make admissions against the bank, and the defendants excepted. The court ordered the electrical works, upon presentment of the Bibber certificate properly indorsed, to issue to the plaintiffs a new certificate for the same number of shares, unless the New York judgment is a legal bar to such an order. To this order the defendants excepted.

Henry F. Hollis, for plaintiff. Ben S. Webb and George F. Morris, for defendants.

WALKER, J. No question is made that, as against Bibber, the bank became the owner of the stock in February, 1901, when Bibber transferred and assigned to it his certificate. He did all it was possible for him to do to vest the absolute title to the stock in his vendee. "It seems too clear for argument that the ownership of the shares passes from the seller to the buyer by force of the contract of sale, and not by operation of law; and, if that be so, the buyer's title, so far as the seller is concerned, attaches the moment this contract is fully consummated between them." Scripture v. Soapstone Co., 50 N. H. 571, 585; Meredith Village Savings Bank v. Marshall, 68 N. H. 417, 44 Atl. 526. But, so far as the corporation and interested third parties without notice are concerned, the vendee ordinarily does not acquire all the rights of a stockholder until the transfer is entered on the corporate records. The right to become such a stockholder after an assignment of the certificate is a valuable right, constituting in a very material sense a part of the consideration for the vendee's purchase. Without such a right enforceable in the courts of law, the sale of stocks would be seriously hampered, resulting in much commercial and industrial inconvenience and embarrassment.

The bank, when it purchased the Bibber stock, was entitled to believe that by complying with certain reasonable regulations it would be recognized as, and in fact become, a stockholder in the corporation, possessing all the rights of other stockholders. Bibber's certificate which he assigned to the bank contained the solemn statement of the corporation, by its authorized officers and agents, that Bibber was the owner of 350 shares of its stock, and that the stock was fully paid and nonassessable. The principal reason now assigned by the corporation for refusing to register the transfer to the bank and to issue to it a new certificate is that Bibber paid nothing for the stock, and that under the laws of South Carolina he was not for that reason the owner of the stock represented by his certificate. If that conclusion of law is correct so far as Bibber is concerned, and if, while he held the certificate, he could not legally act as a stockholder or claim to be the owner of the stock, it would be most inequitable to hold that his vendee, having no notice of any infirmity in his title, and relying upon the unequivocal assertion of the corporation contained in the certificate that he was the owner of the stock represented thereby, should be deemed to be in the same position with reference to the corporation that Bibber occupied. Under such circumstances the most obvious principles of equity and justice require that the corporation should be estopped from denying the title of the innocent vendee who has given value for the stock. "The reason arises from the nature of a share certificate, which, as already stated, is a continuing affirmation of the ownership of the specified amount of stock by the person designated therein, or his assignee, until it is withdrawn in some manner recognized by law; and a purchaser in good faith has a right to rely thereon and to claim the benefit of an estoppel in his favor as against the corporation." 2 Thomp. Corp. § 2590. "If the certificates state upon their face that the shares have been fully paid up, the corporation will be estopped from denying the truth of this representation, and cannot charge the purchaser and transferee with further liability, although the shares have never in fact been paid up." 1 Mor. Corp. § 306; 2 Cook, Corp. § 416 Scripture v. Soapstone Co., supra; Boston & Albany R. R. v. Richardson, 135 Mass. 473; Holbrook v. Zinc Co., 57 N. Y. 610; State v. McIver, 2 S. C. 25; Fraser v. Charleston, 11 S. C. 486; Moore v. Bank, 111 U. S. 156, 165, 4 Sup. Ct. 345, 28 L. Ed. 385. As no suggestion is made that the certificate was not regular in form and properly executed by the officers of the corporation, or that the corporation lacked the power to issue the stock for any purpose, it is not important to inquire whether the stock was legally and regularly issued to, or acquired by, Bibber. The corporation and the stockholders whom it represents are estopped to interpose that defense in this suit; and, unless some other reason exists for its refusal to permit the record of the transfer to be made on its books and to recognize the bank as a stockholder, it would seem that the bank has established its right.

The fact that since the plaintiff is a national bank it has no authority or power to invest its funds in the stock of other corporations does not demonstrate its inability, or want of corporate power, to become a stockholder in another corporation upon receiving the stock in payment of a legitimate claim against the former owner of it. "In the honest exercise of the power to compromise a doubtful debt owing to a bank, it can hardly be doubted that stocks may be accepted in payment and satisfaction, with a view to their subsequent sale or conversion into money so as to make good, or reduce, an anticipated loss. Such a transaction would not amount to a dealing in stocks." First Nat'l Bank v. Bank, 92 U. S. 122, 128, 23 L. Ed. 679. In California Bank v. Kennedy, 167 U. S. 362, 366, 17 Sup. Ct. 831, 833, 42 L. Ed. 198, the court say: "No express power to acquire the stock of another corporation is conferred upon a national bank, but it has been held that as incidental to the power to loan money on personal security, a bank may in the usual course of doing such business accept stock of another corporation as collateral, and by the enforcement of its rights as pledgee it may become the owner of the collateral and be subject to liability as other stockholders. National Bank v. Case, 99 U. S. 628, 25 L. Ed. 448." See, also, Concord First Nat. Bank v. Hawkins, 147 U. S. 364, 19 Sup. Ct. 739, 43 L. Ed. 1007. The plaintiff bank, having in the ordinary course of business received the stock as collateral security for a loan to Bibber, afterward sought to protect itself from loss by becoming the owner of the stock. It enforced its lien on the security, and thus became the owner thereof. So far as appears from the case, it was not dealing in stocks as a primary business; but, as incidental to its general business of loaning money, it acquired Bibber's title to the stock, as, upon the authorities, it had a right to do. How long it may hold the stock under the national banking laws it is unnecessary to inquire. The fact of the good faith of the transaction, so far as material, was established by the finding of the superior court, to which no exception was taken.

As the plaintiff's right to relief, either legal or equitable, seems to be clear, it becomes necessary to consider whether the superior court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit. No claim is made that the defendant was not regularly a party at the beginning of the litigation. Hence it thereby became amenable to such orders as justice might require. Justice required the allowance of the amendment by which the action at law became an action in equity. To the ruling allowing the amendment the defendants took no exception; and they cannot now claim that they are not as fully parties defendant as they were when they appeared in the action at law. Nor is the position tenable that the court will not entertain jurisdiction in behalf of a foreign corporation. Kidd v. Traction Co., 72 N. H. 273, 283, 56 Atl. 465, 66 L. R. A. 574. Both parties are properly in court. But it is argued that, as the defendant corporation was chartered under the laws of another state, this court has no power to grant the relief sought, because it relates to the internal affairs of the corporation, which it is the peculiar and exclusive province of the courts of the incorporating state to supervise and regulate. It may be conceded that the courts of one state either have not the power, or deem it injudicious to exercise the power, of determining rights dependent upon the essentially internal management of the affairs of a corporation chartered by the laws of another state. The forum of the latter state, it is held, affords the most appropriate place for such litigation, principally for the reason that ordinarily it alone possesses power adequate for the enforcement of all orders and decrees that justice may require. 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7904. While there is not entire unanimity in the cases as to the correct definition of the expression "internal affairs" (Beale, For. Corp. § 307; Clark & Marsh. Priv. Corp. §§ 864, 865), it cannot be controverted that a foreign corporation, legally made a defendant in an action upon a contract which it had apparent authority to make, cannot escape liability thereon upon the mere ground that it is a foreign corporation. In such a case it enjoys no immunity or privilege not possessed by domestic corporations or individuals. If it has legally bound itself by a contract with a plaintiff who sues in his own right, and not as a stockholder or director of the corporation, the jurisdiction of the court to pronounce judgment against it cannot be questioned. The determination of its liability involves its external legal relations to one not in any way officially connected with it. If, having the power to do so, it issues its promissory note or bond, which is regularly transferred to the plaintiff in the ordinary course of business, it cannot escape liability in the courts of another state where it is properly made a defendant, though the construction of the contract may involve a consideration of the statutes and decisions of the state of its incorporation. Limerick Nat. Bank v. Howard, 71 N. H. 13, 51 Atl. 641, 93 Am. St. Rep. 489. The question relates, not to its internal management or affairs, but to its obligations to others arising from the prosecution of its legitimate business; and ordinarily those obligations are enforceable wherever the corporation can be made a party to the action. 19 Cyc. 1238.

"In the exercise of these functions, any crimes committed, penalties, fines, or forfeitures incurred in violation of our laws, or any contractual liability to a citizen incurred, may be redressed in our courts, and in such case the jurisdiction does not depend on whether the corporation is doing business generally in this state, but the jurisdiction attaches in the one case to enforce a public law of the state against the offender, and in the other to enforce a contract, and in any case falling under either of these classes it is wholly immaterial from what foreign state or government the company derives its chartered powers, or to what extent it is doing business in this state. But where the act complained of affects the complainant only in his relation as a shareholder or officer of the corporation, and no public right is involved, then the controversy must be said to relate to the internal affairs of the company; and in case of a foreign corporation the great weight of authority is opposed to the jurisdiction of the court of equity." Bradbury v. Mining Co., 113 Ill. App. 600, 608. See, also, March v. Railroad, 43 N. H. 515; Kansas, etc., Co. v. Company, 135 Mass. 34, 46 Am. Rep. 439; Madden v. Company, 181 Pa. 617, 622, 37 Atl. 817, 38 L. R. A. 638; North Star Mining Co. v. Field, 64 Md. 151, 20 Atl. 1039; Gulford v. Telegraph Co., 59 Minn. 332, 61 N. W. 324, 50 Am. St. Rep. 407.

The plaintiff is not a stockholder of the defendant corporation in the full and proper sense of that term. When it became the owner of the stock, it occupied the position of a stranger to the corporation; and what it now seeks is the enforcement of the obligation then incurred, if at all, of the corporation to recognize it as a stockholder. As the corporation is estopped to urge as against the bank that the stock was not legally issued, it must be treated as valid stock when the bank became the owner of it. The case, then, stands as though the stock was valid and binding on the corporation in the hands of Bibber when he sold it to the bank. In that aspect, the plaintiff acquired a right by the transaction to have the stock transferred on the books of the corporation, so that it would possess as against the corporation and as against the world all the privileges of a stockholder, which it is conceded are valuable. 1 Cook, Corp. § 442. The right to a transfer of the stock on the books of the corporation was one of the rights acquired by the bank at the time of the sale. The corporation had in effect agreed to make such transfer upon the presentation of the former certificate by a bona fide vendee and a demand for such transfer. In order to make its stock conveniently salable, and thus enhance its value as an investment, it represented to all who might desire to purchase its stock, and to all stockholders who might wish to sell their stock, that it would invest the purchasers thereof with all the rights of stockholders by making a record on its books of the fact of each sale as made. Having made such representations and assumed such obligations, it would be highly inequitable for it to repudiate the same to the prejudice of innocent purchasers of its stock.

In this respect the law of South Carolina is not peculiar. The statute of that state, providing that "no transfers of stock shall be valid except as between the parties thereto, until the same shall have been regularly entered upon the books of the corporation." (Civ. Code 1902, § 1894), was not intended to limit the power of a corporation to agree with a bona fide purchaser of its stock to enter the transfer on its books upon demand and notice, when no legal reason exists for its refusal. Such a construction of the statute would render stock issued by corporations of that state of little value as investments in commercial dealings. For some purposes, and as against parties having prior claims or liens on the stock, an unrecorded transfer may be invalid, and is so regarded in South Carolina. State Bank v. Cox, 11 Rich. Eq. 344, 78 Am. Dec. 458; State v. McIver, 2 S. C. 25; Parker v. Bank, 53 S. C. 583, 31 S. E. 673, 69 Am. St. Rep. 888; Eldred v. Land Co., 55 S. C. 78, 32 S. E. 758, 897; White v. Bank, 66 S. C. 491, 494, 45 S. E. 94, 97 Am. St. Rep. 808. This statutory provision, if not complied with, does not prevent a valid sale for some purposes, or justify the corporation in capiously refusing to allow an entry on its books which shall make the sale valid for all purposes, or which shall amount merely to a performance of its agreement to permit such record. Clark & Marsh. Priv. Corp. §§ 585, 586; Scripture v. Soapstone Co., supra. This limitation is effective only so far as its enforcement is supported by reasons of commercial utility and fairness. To authorize the issuance of stock, and to declare the validity of its sale, even as against the corporation, to depend upon the caprice of the corporate officers in recording or refusing to record the transfer, would be an unreasonable construction of the purpose of the Legislature in empowering the corporation to place its stock upon the market and to make it salable. It would, in effect, authorize the corporation to repudiate its contractual obligations. The defendant was not disqualified to bind itself to permit the record of the transfer of the Bibber stock to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff's right to a transfer, therefore, depends on the contract of the corporation. The bank is merely seeking the enforcement of a contractual obligation. It is not attempting in this proceeding to interfere with the essentially internal affairs of the corporation. It asks merely that the corporation—a party to the suit—shall recognize it as a stockholder by virtue of its representation to the bank at the time of the sale that it would do so. The court is not asked to determine what the rights of a stockholder may be in this foreign corporation, or to exercise a discretion in behalf of the plaintiff in regard to the corporate management of the defendant. The relief sought is merely the enforcement of a contractual right which accrued to the plaintiff when it bought the stock of Bibber. It then impliedly promised that it would permit the transfer. Clark & Marsh. Priv. Corp. § 603; Pinkerton v. Railroad, 42 N. H. 424; Bond v. Iron Co., 99 Mass. 505, 97 Am. Dec. 49. "A certificate of stock is not necessary to the complete ownership of the stock. * * * But the corporation is bound upon demand to issue a certificate of stock to one who is entitled to it; and, if it refuses, the stockholder may bring a suit in equity to compel its issuance, or he may sue it in an action at law for damages." 1 Cook, Corp. 24.

It is further argued in behalf of the defendants that the New York judgment against Bibber bound the plaintiff, in other words, that the plaintiff, although not in fact a party to that suit, is concluded thereby, because according to the books of the bank Bibber alone was the owner of the stock in controversy, and because the sale of the stock, under the statutes of South Carolina, vested no title in the bank. But the last reason, in view of the foregoing discussion, is not supported by reason or authority. The entire title which Bibber had to the stock passed to the bank at the time of the sale, February 25, 1901. May 1, 1902, the bank notified the defendant corporation that it was the owner of the Bibber stock, so that the defendant corporation was apprised of the claim of ownership by the bank long before January 3, 1903, when the New York suit was instituted. The bank's title to the stock for all purposes, then, depended upon the mere formality of a record, since, as above suggested, the corporation had no legal ground for objecting to the record. Under such circumstances at least it cannot be said that the bank had no legal title to the stock in January, 1903, as against the corporation; and since Bibber was not only not the owner of the stock at that time, but was not in any sense the agent or representative of the bank—the true owner—in that litigation, the binding effect of the New York judgment upon the plaintiff is not apparent. The effect of the defendants' contention is to deprive the plaintiff of valuable vested rights by a judgment against a third party in a suit to which it was not a party, either directly or indirectly. It is unnecessary to cite authorities to show that such a result cannot be sustained. Holbrook v. Zinc Co., 57 N. Y. 616.

It is also contended that the plaintiff is not entitled to a decree for specific performance, since he has a plain and adequate remedy at law. In view of the authorities to the contrary, that proposition does not demand extended discussion. "It is contrary to the overwhelming weight of authority. An action for damages does not always afford an adequate remedy for the refusal of a corporation to recognize a person as a stockholder; and it is well settled, therefore, that if a corporation wrongfully refuses to recognize and register a valid transfer of stock, and issue a new certificate to the transferee, he may maintain a bill in equity to compel it to do so." Clark & Marsh. Priv. Corp. § 605; 1 Cook, Corp. § 24. It is to be observed that this is not a proceeding to compel a vendor of stock to assign and deliver his certificate to the vendee under a contract of sale (Eckstein v. Downing, 64 N. H. 248, 9 Atl. 626, 10 Am. Rep. 404), but to compel the corporation to perform a merely clerical act for the benefit of a vendee who has already purchased and now holds the certificate. To deny him relief by specific performance, upon the ground that he could recover damages at law, would be, in effect, to compel him to sell what he already owns at such a price as a jury might think it was worth. And especially ought a court of equity to decree specific performance, when, as in this case, the real and prospective value of the stock depends upon the future development and management of the corporate enterprise.

So far as the claim that the plaintiff is guilty of laches in not bringing its suit sooner presents a question of fact, it has been found untenable by the superior court; and so far as a question of law is involved it is sufficient to say that it does not conclusively appear that the plaintiff's delay in this respect was unreasonable, or that the defendants have been prejudiced thereby in any respect. Douglass v. Railroad, 72 N. H. 26, 31, 54 Atl. 883.

The exception to the exclusion of the testimony of the witness relating to an admission made by Greenwood, a director of the bank, who was also its vice president, is unavailing. The ruling of the court was based upon the fact that it did not appear that the official of the bank was authorized to bind the bank by the proffered admission. Since there is no presumption of law that his official relation to the bank furnished or proved such authority (Low v. Railroad, 45 N. H. 370, 381; Wait v. Association, 66 N. H. 581; 23 Atl. 77, 14 L. R. A. 356, 49 Am. St. Rep. 630; New Boston Fire Ins. Co. v. Upton, 67 N. H. 469, 36 Atl. 366), the exception presents no error.

Exceptions overruled. All concurred.

BICKNALL v. BICKNALL

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Jan. 12, 1906.)

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—ANSWERING FOR DEFAULT OF ANOTHER—NOVATION.

Where a mortgagee, who had given a loan on security falsely represented to be a first mortgage, and had brought an action for the deceit, discontinued the action on the oral promise of the mortgagor's father to pay the debt, but did not release the mortgage nor the debt of the mortgagee, but only the claim for the deceit, there was no such novation as to render the promise of the mortgagor's father binding under the statute of frauds.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Frauds, Statute of, § 48.]

and defendant petitions for a new trial. Granted.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DUBOIS, BLODGETT, and JOHNSON, JJ.

James A. Williams, for plaintiff. Christopher M. Lee and Job S. Carpenter, for defendant.

DUBOIS, J. This is an action of the case wherein the plaintiff declares that she brought her action of deceit to recover the sum of $1,000 damage against Edward J. Bicknall, the father of the defendant, and that the defendant, before the return day of the writ in said action, assumed to pay the plaintiff the said sum in consideration that she would discontinue and abandon her said suit against his father. She further avers that she agreed to discontinue, and did abandon, said suit upon the promise of the defendant to pay said sum; and, furthermore, that she released said Edward J. Bicknall from all claims and demands which she had against him, and accepted the promise of the defendant in lieu of her claim against his father. To this the defendant pleads, first, the general issue, and, secondly, actio non, because he says that the promise declared on is a special promise to answer for the debt, etc., of another, which must be in writing; to which the plaintiff replies precludi non, because the promise declared on was not a special promise to answer for the debt, etc., of a person other than the defendant, but was a direct and unequivocal assumption of the said debt, by the said defendant, as and for his own debt, in consideration of her forbearance to prosecute her suit against his father. After verdict for the plaintiff, the defendant filed his petition for a new trial, upon the following grounds: First, because the verdict was contrary to law and against the evidence and the weight thereof; second, because the court erred in refusing to charge the jury as requested by the defendant, which refusal so to do was excepted to by the defendant; third, because the defendant did not have a full, fair, and impartial trial.

The question that arises for determination in this case is whether a completed contract of novation has been proved by the plaintiff; for such a novation is universally held not to be within the statute of frauds. 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 675. Novation is the substitution of a new obligation for an old one, which is thereby extinguished. Bouv. Law Dict. Since novation is the extinguishment of one obligation and the foundation of another, it requires the assent of all the parties to both the old and the new obligations; for, unless all the parties to the old assent, it cannot be extinguished, and, unless all the parties to the new assent, it cannot be created. Id.; Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 666. "A man cannot, of his own will, pay another man's debt without his consent and thereby convert himself into a creditor." Durnford v. Messiter, 5 M. & S. 448.

It appears from the testimony of the plaintiff that on the 20th day of August, 1895, she loaned to Edward J. Bicknall the sum of $1,000 and took from him his promissory note, and as security therefore a mortgage upon certain real estate, which mortgage said mortgagor stated was a first mortgage, but that she subsequently ascertained that it was a second mortgage upon the property thereby incumbered; that, after ascertaining the fact concerning the actual position of her mortgage as to priority, she began suit against Edward J. Bicknall to recover damages for the deceit practiced by him upon her in obtaining the money from her upon the second mortgage, which he had pretended to be the first, and discontinued this suit upon the defendant's promise to pay her $1,000 in consideration of such discontinuance. The mortgage was introduced in evidence, and an inspection of it reveals the fact that it was recorded March 16, 1899, at 4:48 o'clock p.m., nearly three years and seven months after its execution. No explanation was asked or offered in relation to this delay, and perhaps none was necessary, as between the parties the mortgage was valid and binding without it; but it is a circumstance that may be considered for what it is worth in such a case. If she relied so much upon her security, and would not have loaned the money to her relative without his giving her a first mortgage upon his property, would she not have protected herself still further by recording the mortgage as soon as she received it—to prevent others from obtaining priority through her delay?

The plaintiff further testified: "I dropped the suit against the father," and "I dropped the claim against Edward J. Bicknall"; and, also, in cross-examination, as follows: "This mortgage is dated the 20th day of August, 1895?" "Yes, sir." "And interest was paid upon it to what time?" "1900." "And was there any interest paid upon it after that date?" "No, sir." "And there was a promissory note accompanied this mortgage?" "It is." "You have got that?" "I have." "You never returned that to Edward J. Bicknall?" "No, sir." "Did you ever give him any receipt for the claim which you had against him (Edward J.)?" "Receipt for the claim? I have receipted when he has paid me the interest, every time." "Did you ever give him any formal discharge of your claim?" "No, sir." "Did you not discharge this mortgage of record?" "No, sir." "Is that mortgage still outstanding on this real estate on Logan avenue?" "It is." "And the estate is still subject to that mortgage?" "Yes, sir." "And an incumbrance upon that estate at the present time?" "Yes, sir." "And this is still outstanding as a valid mortgage against that real estate?" "I suppose so."

Even if we concede, for the purposes of this consideration, that the extinguishment may be mentally as well as physically accomplished, a proposition not involved in the determination of this case, what evidence is there that the old obligation, consisting of the note and mortgage of Edward J. Bicknall, was extinguished? A fair interpretation of the testimony of the plaintiff is that she dropped her claim for deceit against Edward J. Bicknall, but that she held the note and mortgage as outstanding and valid against the real estate; that she did not surrender or attempt or intend to surrender them; and so far as appears in evidence, they constitute a subsisting obligation capable of enforcement by foreclosure. In other words, she released a claim she may have had against the body of Edward J. Bicknall, but did not part with her claim against his real estate. The extinguishment must be complete and total, not partial or equivocal, to serve the purposes of novation. Even if Edward J. Bicknall can be said to have been a party to the transaction, through the agency of the defendant, who testified that he acted as his attorney in the matter, the plaintiff fails to sustain the burden of proof that there was a novation as she claims. The verdict therefore was against the evidence, and, as the testimony of the plaintiff precludes the possibility of proof of novation, verdict should have been directed for the defendant.

Case remanded to the superior court, with direction to enter judgment for the defendant.

GREENOUGH, Atty. Gen., v. SCHOOL COMMITTEE OF PAWTUCKET.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Jan. 5, 1906.)

CERTIORARI — To SCHOOL COMMITTEE — CHANGE OF TEXT-BOOKS.

Certiorari does not lie to review the action of a school committee in changing the text-books; the committee's selection of text-books being an administrative or legislative duty, and only judicial action being reviewable by the writ.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Certiorari, § 37.]

Application by William B. Greenough, Attorney General, for writ of certiorari to the school committee of Pawtucket. Denied.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DU-BOIS, BLODGETT, JOHNSON, and PARK-HURST, JJ.

Hugh J. Carroll, for petitioner. Barney & Lee, for respondents.

DOUGLAS, C. J. This is a petition for a writ of certiorari to review the action of the school committee of Pawtucket in voting "to change certain of the text-books heretofore for a long time used in the public schools of said city," and "to purchase certain new text-books to take the place of those so as aforesaid heretofore used." We are of the opinion that certiorari does not lie in such a case. The selection of text-books by the school committee is an administrative or legislative duty, not in any sense a judicial one. While, like most administrative duties, it involves the use of judgment and discretion, it is not a judicial determination of rights or contested issues such as constitutes a judgment of court.

The exact question before us was decided in People v. Oakland Board of Education, 54 Cal. 375, where the court held that the action of the board in adopting a series of readers for the public schools in lieu of a series previously in use was an exercise of legislative, not of judicial, power, and could not be reviewed by certiorari. The court quote with approval the language of Mr. Justice Field in the Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 761, 25 L. Ed. 496, as follows: "The distinction between a judicial and legislative act is well defined. The one determines what the law is and what the rights of the parties are with reference to transactions already had; the other prescribes what the law shall be in future cases arising under it. Wherever an act undertakes to determine a question of right or obligation or of property as the foundation upon which it proceeds, such act is to that extent a judicial one, and not the proper exercise of legislative functions." This, in our opinion, is a clear and just statement of the rule which applies to the case at bar, and the deductions of the California court are logical and convincing. The votes of the committee determined no contested rights, but directed future action on the principle of policy or expediency. This action was legislative, not judicial.

It is well settled that in this state the common-law limitations of certiorari prevail which confine it to the review of the judicial action of inferior courts or of public officers or bodies exercising under the law judicial or quasi judicial functions. Dexter v. Town Council of Cumberland, 17 R. I. 222, 21 Atl. 347; Lonsdale Company v. License Commissioners, 18 R. I. 5, 25 Atl. 655; State v. Board of Aldermen of Newport, 18 R. I. 381, 28 Atl. 347; Smith v. Town Council of Burrillville, 19 R. I. 61, 31 Atl. 578.

The petition must be dismissed.

CAPPELLI v. WOOD (McDERMOTT, Garnishee).

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Dec. 22, 1905.)

GARNISHMENT—PROPERTY SUBJECT—VERDICT BEFORE JUDGMENT.

A verdict upon which no judgment has been entered is not a subject for garnishment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 24, Cent. Dig. Garnishment, § 7.]

Action by Antonio Cappelletti against Henry M. Wood, in which Susan A. McDermott was served as garnishee. On agreed statement of facts, certified by court below. Judgment for plaintiff and discharging the garnishee.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DUBOIS, BLODGETT, JOHNSON, and PARKHURST, JJ.

Simon S. Lapham, Jr., for plaintiff. Albert D. Bean, for defendant.

JOHNSON, J. Assumpsit. Heard on certification from the district court of the Sixth judicial district upon an agreed statement of facts, as follows:

"The defendant, Henry M. Wood, on the 13th day of October, A. D. 1906, obtained a verdict of a jury in the superior court, Providence county, in the case of Henry M. Wood v. Susan A. McDermott, for the sum of $150. On the 14th day of October, A. D. 1906, after verdict and before judgment in the case of Wood v. McDermott, the plaintiff in this case sued out of the district court of the Sixth judicial district a writ of attachment, and said Susan A. McDermott was duly served with a copy of said writ as garnishee of said Henry M. Wood. That said Susan A. McDermott duly filed her garnishee's affidavit which is a part of the record hereof. That execution in case of Wood v. McDermott has been stayed. That said case of Cappelli v. Wood is now pending in the district court of the Sixth judicial district in said state on a written motion to discharge the garnishee made by the defendant Wood. That the defendant Wood in case Cappelli v. Wood does not dispute the amount of the claim of said Cappelli, and that judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff for $246 and costs, and this court shall consider the validity of the attachment only."

The garnishee's affidavit referred to in said statement is as follows:

"Providence—Sc.: District Court of the Sixth Judicial District. Antonio Cappelli v. Henry M. Wood. In the above-entitled case, I, Susan A. McDermott, of the city and county of Providence and state of Rhode Island, the garnishee therein named, make affidavit and say that at the time of the service of the writ of garnishment in said case the defendant in said suit, Henry M. Wood, had received a verdict in the superior court for the county of Providence for the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars ($150), and that said decision has now become a judgment, and that execution thereon has been stayed by order of the presiding justice of the superior court. Susan A. McDermott.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me, in Providence, this 25th day of October, A. D. 1906.

"Henry A. Palmer, Notary Public."

Service of the trustee process in this case having been made after verdict and before the entry of judgment in the case of Wood v. McDermott, the question raised for consideration is: Can the garnishee be charged? In Foster v. Dudley, 30 N. H. 463-465, the court says: "If the trustee suit be commenced while the debtor trustee has yet an opportunity to ask for delay, and to plead a recovery against him, if one should be had, he may be charged as trustee if no other objection appears." This statement of the law was approved by this court in Smith v. Carroll, 17 R. I. 125-127, 21 Atl. 343, 12 L. R. A. 301. In Thayer v. Pratt, 47 N. H. 470, where, as in Foster v. Dudley, supra, the attempted garnishment was after verdict and before judgment, the court says: "Our statute must be construed in reference to existing remedies, and we are aware of no practice that will justify setting aside a verdict that has been fairly and properly rendered to let in a defence arising afterwards."

These cases state the law correctly, as far as they go. They hold, substantially, that a verdict cannot be made the subject of garnishment, because, after verdict, the opportunity to plead the garnishment has passed. There is a further reason, which appears to us to be equally conclusive. Garnishment is a proceeding in the nature of an involuntary suit by the defendant against the garnishee for the benefit of the plaintiff. The person sought to be garnished must be one against whom the defendant has a present right of action. In this case the defendant had no such right of action against the garnishee at the time of the service of the trustee process. He had simply a verdict, on which the entry of judgment was necessary to give him a right of action. No matter how long a verdict remained on the records of the court, no action could be brought upon it. In such case garnishment therefore fails, not only because after verdict the time to plead the garnishment has passed, but because the verdict itself is entirely lacking in the essentials of a subject of garnishment.

The attempted garnishment was invalid, and the garnishee cannot be charged.

Case remanded to the district court of the Sixth judicial district, with direction to enter judgment for the plaintiff in accordance with the agreement of the parties.

SHARTENBERG & ROBINSON v. ELLBEY.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Dec. 15, 1905.)

1. DEEDS—CONSTRUCTION—INTENT OF PARTIES.

Deeds must be so construed as to effectuate, if possible and consistent with settled rules of law, the intention of the parties as gathered from a fair consideration of the entire instrument and the language employed therein.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, § 231.]

2. SAME—INARTIFICIAL DEEDS.

A liberal construction is to be given to deeds inartificially and untechnically drawn.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, § 234.]

3. SAME—SURROUNDING CIRCUMSTANCES.

Where the language used in a deed is susceptible of more than one interpretation, the court will look at the circumstances existing at the time of the transaction, such as the situation of the parties, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, § 239.]

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT — CONSTRUCTION OF LEASE—RENTAL.

Plaintiffs leased to defendant floor space in their store, to be used for the sale of soda water and confectionery. The lease provided that the receipts taken in by defendant should be turned over to plaintiffs, that defendant guaranteed that the gross receipts from his business should amount to at least $10,000 per annum, that he agreed to pay plaintiffs 20 per cent. on the difference between the actual receipts and $10,000, should such receipts be less than that sum, and that plaintiffs should retain 20 per cent. of the gross receipts turned over by defendant as full compensation under the lease. Held, that the lease in effect provided for an annual rental of $2,000, the same to be paid by the retention of 20 per cent. of the gross receipts, and by the payment by defendant of any further sum which should be necessary to make up the sum of $2,000.

Ejectment by Jacob Shartenberg and another, copartners as Shartenberg & Robinson, against Thomas Ellbey. There was a verdict for plaintiffs, and defendant petitioned for a new trial. Denied.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DUBOIS, BLODGETT, JOHNSON, and PARKHURST, JJ.

John J. Fitzgerald, for plaintiffs. Terrence M. O'Reilly, for defendant.

DUBOIS, J. This is an action of trespass and ejectment brought to recover possession of the premises described in a lease from the plaintiffs to the defendant upon the ground that the defendant suffered the stipulated rent for the same to be and remain due and in arrears for the period of 15 days. The lease is of the tenor following:

"We, Jacob Shartenberg and Harry Robinson, copartners as Shartenberg and Robinson, of Pawtucket, R. I., hereby lease to Thomas Ellbey, doing business as the Imperial Confectionery Company, a space upon the ground floor in that part of our store in said Pawtucket known as the Weeden Building and near the entrance of said building, measuring about twenty feet in length and of a width extending to the outer edge of the counter, and also suitable space in their basement, to be used for the sale of soda water and confectionery for the term of five years from July 1, 1904, and subject to the following terms and conditions.

"(1) The said Ellbey shall furnish all his own stock, materials and implements, including soda fountain.

"(2) Said Ellbey shall hire and pay all his own help, such help to conform to all rules and regulations the same as other employees in the store.

"(3) All the receipts taken in by said Ellbey shall be turned over to said Sharten-berg and Robinson as the same are received.

"(4) Said Ellbey guarantees that the gross receipts from said business shall amount to at least $10,000 per annum, and he agrees to pay to said Shartenberg and Robinson 20 per cent. on the difference between the actual receipts and $10,000, should such gross receipts be less than $10,000.

"(5) Said Shartenberg and Robinson shall retain 20 per cent. of the gross receipts turned over by the said Ellbey as full compensation under this lease.

"(6) The said Ellbey agrees that he will not assign this lease or any interest therein without the written consent of said Shartenberg and Robinson.

"And the said Shartenberg and Robinson agree with the said Ellbey:

"(7) That they will properly light and heat said premises and furnish necessary toilet conveniences.

"(8) That they will keep an accurate account of the gross amounts received by them from said Ellbey, and will upon each Monday turn over to said Ellbey, or his representative, 80 per cent. of the gross receipts of the previous week.

"(9) That they will from time to time during the continuance of said lease advertise the business of said Ellbey to such an extent as they deem advisable.

"(10) That they will not compete with said Ellbey in the sale of soda or confectionery.

"This lease and the agreements herein contained to be binding upon the parties hereto and their respective heirs, executors and administrators.

"Executed in duplicate this seventeenth day of June, A. D. 1904.

"Shartenberg & Robinson.

"Thomas Ellbey.

"Witness: Louis S. Law."

After verdict for the plaintiffs in the superior court the defendant duly prosecuted to this court his bill of exceptions, based on the following grounds: "(1) That the court erred in ruling that the guaranty of receipts in the fourth clause of the lease of the plaintiffs to the defendant, and which is the foundation of this action, must be construed to mean that the receipts mentioned in the fifth clause of the lease shall be $10,000. "(2) That the court erred in refusing the motion made by the defendant to direct a verdict for said defendant, on the ruling that the deficiency existing under the fourth clause of said lease was rent, and was due at the end of one year. "(3) That the court erred in its charge to the jury that the deficiency claimed by the plaintiffs was due and payable July 1, 1905, and, that if any portion of the said deficiency remained unpaid, it was the duty of the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiffs."

The decision of these questions obviously depends upon the proper interpretation of the lease. As stated by Ames, C. J., in Deblois v. Earle, 7 R. I. 26, at page 29: "The cardinal rule in the interpretation of all instruments * * * is 'to read the writing,' and, taking its language in connection with the relative position and general purpose of the parties, to gather from it, if you can, their intent in the questionable particular." The object in construing a deed is to ascertain the intention of the parties, and it is well settled that deeds must be construed so as to effectuate, if possible, that intention when consistent with settled rules of law, and where the expressions in the deed do not positively forbid it or render it impossible. 13 Cyc. 601. The intent must primarily be gathered from a fair consideration of the entire instrument and the language employed therein, and should be consistent with its terms, including its scope and the subject-matter.

A liberal construction is to be given to deeds inartificially and untechnically drawn. 13 Cyc. 604. Whenever the language used is susceptible of more than one interpretation, the court will look at the circumstances existing at the time of the transaction, such as the situation of the parties, etc. Waterman v. Andrews, 14 R. I. at page 595. An inspection of the instrument in question discloses the fact that the lease is very inartificially drawn, and therefore entitled to a liberal construction for the purpose of ascertaining and effectuating the intention of the parties. Considering the situation of the parties at the time of its execution as disclosed by the lease, we find the plaintiffs in possession of a desirable shop or store wherein the defendant was anxious to obtain space for the establishment of his business. It is evident that he was satisfied that he could succeed there, for he "guarantees" that the gross receipts from his business shall amount to at least $10,000 per annum, and agrees to pay to the plaintiffs 20 per cent. on the deficiency in case the gross receipts shall fall below that sum. Although the word "rent" is not used in the instrument, it is provided by clause 5 that the plaintiff shall retain 20 per cent. of the gross receipts turned over by the defendant as full compensation under the lease; and rent is the compensation, either in money, provisions, chattels, or labor, received by the owner of the soil from the occupant thereof. Bouv. Law Dict. The word "guarantees" in clause 4 is not used in a technical sense. Guaranty is an undertaking to answer for another's liability and collateral thereto. It is a secondary, and not a primary, obligation. Bouv. Law Dict. As used in the lease, it expresses the defendant's confident estimate that the gross receipts from the business will amount to at least $10,000 per annum, and his willingness to maintain his faith in his judgment by allowing that sum to be used as a basis upon which his minimum rent shall be computed, and he supports it by his agreement to pay to the plaintiffs 20 per cent. of the deficiency, in case there should be any, between the actual and estimated gross receipts. A fair interpretation of clauses 4 and 5 is that the rent is to be at least $2,000 per annum—that is, 20 per cent. of $10,000; that it is to be paid by the retention of 20 per cent. of the gross receipts, if they shall amount to or exceed $10,000 per annum; that, if they do not, the rent is to be partially paid by retaining 20 per cent. of the gross receipts each week as the same are received, under clauses 5 and 8, and by the payment of the balance by the defendant, under the provisions of clause 4, at the end of the year, the time when the deficit could be ascertained. The words "20 per cent. of the gross receipts turned over by the said Ellbey," in clause 5, do not exclusively apply to actual receipts, but include the 20 per cent. of estimated gross receipts which, in clause 4, the defendant agrees to pay. The literal expressions in clause 5 must yield to the manifest intent of the entire instrument. Therefore the plaintiffs have not received full compensation, or rent, under the provisions of clause 5 of the lease, if the amount found to be due under clause 4 therefor remains unpaid.

As there was a deficiency in the actual gross receipts, which became due and payable July 1, 1905, and remained unpaid for more than 15 days, and as this action was brought there afterwards, the suit was properly brought, and as the rulings of the judge presiding at the trial were in conformity with the law hereinbefore expressed, the same must be sustained, and the exceptions thereto are overruled. Case remitted to the superior court, with direction to enter judgment on the verdict.

SANDERS et al. v. MAMOLEN.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATE DEVISED.

Testatrix devised four-sevenths of her estate to a daughter, with a provision that no part of it should be disposed of until after the death of her daughter, but that it should be rented or leased and the sum realized be divided according to the provisions of her will; and by her codicil she provided that, if it became necessary to sell the real estate, her daughter should be entitled to receive her portion annually until the death of her husband, after which she was to receive the full amount of her share. Held that, after the death of the daughter's husband, there was an absolute right in the daughter or her assignee to receive the proceeds of the sale of the real estate, and that the title was in her in fee simple under the codicil.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Action by Elizabeth J. Sanders and Alice B. Valentine against Peter Mamolen. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Testatrix by her will directed as follows:

"I order that all my just debts, funeral expenses and charges of proving this, my will, be in the first place fully paid and satisfied, and after payment thereof and every part thereof, I give and bequeath to my daughter, Sarah A. Davis, four-sevenths of the residue, and to my son, John Ingraham, now residing in Tarentum, Allegheny county, three-sevenths of the remainder. The property devised by this will consists of one house and lot in the village of Tarentum, Allegheny county, Pennsylvania, and I do further will and direct that no part or parcel of said property be sold or disposed of until after the death or demise of my daughter, Sarah A. Davis, but that it be rented or leased, and the sum realized to be divided according to the above provisions. My reason for making the above provision is that my daughter, Sarah A. Davis, remained at home long after she became of age, giving me the benefit of her labor and is now providing a home for me."

A codicil to the will was as follows:

"I, Nancy Ingraham, the testator in the above will and testament, do make the following provisions, viz.: That if it becomes necessary to dispose of or sell my real estate prior to or after my death, my daughter, Sarah A. Davis, shall be entitled to and is hereby authorized to lift and receive her portion annually until the death of her husband, William Davis, after which she is to receive the full amount of her share. But if she should die before her husband, the remainder of her portion, if any, to be paid to her children, if of age; but if not of age, it shall be paid to their guardian, to be given to them when they arrive at the full age of twenty-one years."

The plaintiffs in the case stated claimed title from Sarah A. Davis. The defendant agreed to purchase the property for $2,500. The court entered judgment for plaintiffs for $2,500. Defendant appealed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

R. A. Kennedy, for appellant. Nelson McVicar, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. The testatrix devised four-sevenths of her estate to her daughter, but provided "that no part or parcel of said property be sold or disposed of until after the death or demise of my daughter, Sarah A. Davis, but that it be rented or leased and the sum realized to be divided according to the above provisions." On this branch of the case the learned judge below well says: "As a restriction of alienation on the grant of a fee is against the general rule of law, it must be construed strictly, and it requires no very strict construction of the will in question to read it as not being a restriction upon Sarah A. Davis herself, but only a direction of the testatrix to her executors. It will be observed that the testatrix puts her personal property and the land in question into a common fund for the payment of her debts, and then directs, not that her daughter shall not sell, but that the property shall not be sold till after her daughter's death, and in the codicil directs that, if it becomes necessary to sell it, then her daughter shall have a certain share. We think there can be little question that the testatrix did not intend that her daughter, who was the principal object of her bounty, as she says, should not sell, but that the land should not be sold for the purpose of the will unless it was necessary."

But, in addition to this, the testatrix by a codicil provided: "That if it becomes necessary to dispose of or sell my real estate prior to or after my death, my daughter, Sarah A. Davis, shall be entitled to and is hereby authorized to lift and receive her portion annually until the death of her husband, William Davis, after which she is to receive the full amount of her share." William Davis, the husband, is now dead, and it thus appears that there is a power of sale, with an absolute right in Sarah Davis or her assignee to receive the proceeds. The title is good under the codicil without regard to the previous provisions of the will. Judgment affirmed.

MORRIS et al. v. McCUTCHEON.

ARMSTRONG v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE.

An agreement on the part of a solvent person to pledge all his estate to a trustee to secure certain named creditors will be enforced in equity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Specific Performance, § 212.]

Appeals from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Bills by Joseph C. Morris and Richard R. Brown, trading as Morris & Brown, and by John D. Armstrong, surviving partner of Lathrop R. Bacon & Co., against James H. McCutcheon and others. Suits were tried together, and from decrees for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of Rodgers, J., in the court below:

"(1) On May 9, 1901, James H. McCutcheon, one of the defendants, was indebted to plaintiffs in the sum of $118,676.78, being the balance due on settlement of the accounts at the close of business upon said date for certain shares of capital stock in various corporations bought and sold by plaintiffs in their capacity as stockbrokers of said James H. McCutcheon, who was, and had been for some time prior thereto, plaintiffs' customer.

"(2) One transaction between plaintiffs and James H. McCutcheon included the purchase of 500 shares of the common stock of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company by plaintiffs on May 9, 1901, which said stock was purchased upon the order of said McCutcheon, and in the purchase thereof said plaintiffs acted as agents and brokers with fidelity and care and without negligence. Two hundred of said shares were purchased for $450 per share, 100 shares at $500 per share, and 200 shares at $400 per share, and the purchase price for all of said shares was paid by plaintiffs to the sellers thereof. The aforesaid transaction embraced a part of the dealings between the parties referred to in the first finding of fact.

"(3) Plaintiffs on the same day bought or sold about 1,800 shares of other stocks for James H. McCutcheon, which said purchases or sales were apparently satisfactory.

"(4) Plaintiffs on May 7 and May 8, 1901, contracted to pay, as agents and brokers for said McCutcheon, the sum of $8,400, borrowing premium charges on said Northern Pacific stock, in accordance with the rules and custom of the market, and said payments were rendered necessary by reason of said McCutcheon's orders and directions to plaintiffs to carry deliveries of the stock over, and not to buy it in 'to cover' on said days. Such premiums were contracted in good faith and without negligence by plaintiffs, and were paid by them; the same being included in the indebtedness account referred to in the first finding herein.

"(5) Upon the evening of May 9, 1901, after the indebtedness referred to in the first finding herein had been incurred and the account closed, the agreement, Exhibit A, attached to plaintiffs' bill, was prepared, signed, and sealed by all the parties to this bill; said James H. McCutcheon and plaintiffs being represented by counsel, said agreement being executed in the presence of said counsel, having been prepared by counsel representing said James H. McCutcheon, and after having been so executed, was deposited with McCutcheon's counsel, with the understanding that he should be the custodian of it for John L. McCutcheon, who was one of the beneficiary parties to the agreement and trustee under it to carry out its provisions.

"(6) Said agreement above referred to was executed after demand made by plaintiffs that their said indebtedness be paid to them forthwith.

"(7) There was neither fraud, accident, nor mistake in the execution of said agreement.

"(8) The said agreement is as follows, to wit:

"Exhibit A.

"Pittsburg, May 9, 1901. Whereas, James H. McCutcheon is indebted approximately to Lathrop R. Bacon & Co. $70,000, and to Morris & Brown approximately $114,000, and to John L. McCutcheon $15,000, and desires to secure such indebtedness: Now it is agreed that said James H. McCutcheon shall pledge all his estate, real and personal, for the payment of said indebtedness, but that priority shall be given sixty-eight per cent. thereof; that is to say, notes shall be given payable to Lathrop R. Bacon & Co. for say $47,600 (four of $10,000 and one of $7,600), payable four months after date, and notes shall be given to Morris & Brown for $77,520 (seven notes of $10,000 each and one of $7,520 at four months), indorsed by John L. McCutcheon and Thomas G. McCutcheon. The pledge shall be primarily liable for these notes and a note to John L. McCutcheon for $11,880; subject to this primary liability the pledge shall be security for the residue of the indebtedness of said James H. McCutcheon to said Lathrop R. Bacon & Co., Morris & Brown, and John L. McCutcheon in the proportion of their respective claims. For said residue said James H. McCutcheon shall give his notes to the respective parties at four months. Discounts shall be paid by said James H. McCutcheon on all notes or renewals. The maker shall have the right to renew any and all notes given by him hereunder from time to time, and as often as he shall reduce the principal of any note ten per centum, and in case of such renewals all parties hereto shall be bound to indorse according to their position on the original notes.

"Pledge or mortgage to be made to John L. McCutcheon as trustee under the provisions hereof. Pledge to be for one year. Right in trustee to foreclose after any default on thirty days' notice to all parties in interest.

"Witness the hands and seals of said parties, May 9, 1901.

"Morris & Brown. [Seal.]

"J. L. McCutcheon. [Seal.]

"Jas. H. McCutcheon. [Seal.]

"Thomas G. McCutcheon. [Seal.]

"Lathrop R. Bacon & Co. [Seal.]"

"(9) The eight notes to Morris & Brown, aggregating $77,520, and the five notes to L. R. Bacon & Co., aggregating $47,600, all indorsed to John L. McCutcheon and Thomas G. McCutcheon, were given on May 10, 1901, to Morris & Brown and Bacon & Co., respectively, being drawn at four months, and otherwise in accordance with the terms of the agreement set forth in the above finding; but James H. McCutcheon has failed to deliver his notes for the balance due plaintiffs. The notes which were given were designated as provided for in said agreement, and the discounts thereon were paid by James H. McCutcheon, and thus said plaintiffs have indulged and given time to James H. McCutcheon to pay said indebtedness as provided in the agreement.

"(10) Of the indorsed notes to Morris & Brown there are still unpaid and outstanding $50,000 in the form of renewals dated September 10, 1901, and payable on demand. At the request of James H. McCutcheon, John L. McCutcheon, and Thomas G. McCutcheon, the said $50,000 notes are held by John L. McCutcheon, and Morris & Brown are liable as first indorsers thereon; the said John L. McCutcheon being subsequent indorser.

"(11) James H. McCutcheon was, on May 9, 1901, the owner of a large amount of real estate in the county of Allegheny and state of Pennsylvania, and also a large amount of personalty, and still is the owner of the realty, to wit, real estate situate on Fifth avenue, Twenty-Second ward, Pittsburg, and real estate situate on Center avenue, Thirteenth Ward, Pittsburg, and that he is still the owner of personal property.

"(12) Said James H. McCutcheon refuses to execute and deliver the pledge of his real and personal property, as provided in the agreement found in the exhibit set forth in finding No. 8, and in the refusal to perform said agreement he is acting upon the counsel and advice of John L. McCutcheon, one of the defendants hereto.

"(13) The said James H. McCutcheon acknowledged the indebtedness to plaintiffs of approximately $114,000, and to L. R. Bacon & Co. of $70,000, and to John L. McCutcheon of $15,000, as shown in the agreement heretofore found, and agreed therein to pledge all his estate, real and personal, for the payment of said indebtedness, with the agreement that priority should be given to 68 per cent. thereof, namely, as far as plaintiffs hereto were concerned to $77,520, covered by the notes above set out, which were indorsed by John L. and Thomas G. McCutcheon, and as to L. R. Bacon & Co. to $47,600, notes likewise indorsed, and as to John L. McCutcheon to $11,880. After this primary liability, the pledge was to be security for the residue of the indebtedness of the said James H. McCutcheon to plaintiffs and Bacon & Co. and J. L. McCutcheon in proportion to their claims; but the maker was to have the right to renew the notes given by him from time to time and as often as he reduced the principal of any note 10 per cent., in which case of renewal all parties were to be bound to indorse according to their positions on the original notes. The pledge or mortgage was to be made to John L. McCutcheon as trustee and was to be for one year, with the right to the trustee to foreclose after any default on 30 days' notice to all parties in interest.

"(14) James H. McCutcheon does not now demand or claim the right to have the notes renewed, and more than one year has elapsed from the time when such pledge or mortgage should have been given under the terms of the contract.

"The transactions involved in the dealings between Morris & Brown and James H. McCutcheon, concerning the Northern Pacific Railroad Company common stock, were made in good faith, with the intention on the part of both McCutcheon and plaintiffs to make actual delivery of the stock, and as agents of said McCutcheon plaintiffs had made contracts with other persons for delivery of such stock. These transactions were not gambling transactions.

"Conclusions of Law.

"(1) That James H. McCutcheon is indebted to Morris & Brown on the account, as embraced in the findings of fact hereto, in the sum of $86,156.78, of which said sum $50,000 is due and payable with interest from September 10, 1901, and the balance of said sum, $36,156.78, is due and payable with interest from May 9, 1901.

"(2) That James H. McCutcheon should pay unto John L. McCutcheon, the holder of the notes representing the sum of $50,000, the debt and interest thereon, or procure for plaintiffs full acquittance thereof, and in addition thereto should pay to plaintiffs the sum of $36,156.78, with interest from May 9, 1901, or, failing therein, should execute and deliver unto John L. McCutcheon a pledge in writing of all the real and personal estate by him owned on May 9, 1901, in compliance and performance of the terms of the agreement set forth in the eighth finding of fact, being the agreement marked Exhibit A.

"(3) That John L. McCutcheon accept the pledge provided for in said agreement, and perform the duties of trustee thereunder, or, upon his refusal so to do, that a proper pledgee or trustee be appointed in his stead.

"(4) That this court has jurisdiction to compel the specific performance of the agreement found to exist between the parties, being Exhibit A, attached to the bill of complaint."

Argued before FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

J. S. Ferguson and E. G. Ferguson, for appellant. William M. Hall, Joseph A. Langfitt, Clarence Burleigh, William Kaufman, and H. W. McIntosh, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. These cases differ but slightly in their facts, and involve the same questions of law, and were argued together. The findings of fact are fully warranted by the testimony, and we are not convinced of error in the conclusions of law.

The decrees are affirmed, at the cost of the appellants.

TRAU et al. v. SLOAN et al.
(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—CONTRACT BY UNAUTHORIZED AGENT.

A contract for the sale of real estate, signed by a purported agent of the vendor, will not be enforced, where the court finds as a fact that the person signing the contract was not an authorized agent of the owner for the purpose of making such contract.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Bill by Gus Trau and Phillip Loevner against William L. Sloan and others. From a decree dismissing the bill, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Edward Steuer and G. K. Wright, for appellants. George H. Quail and J. V. Dunlevy, for appellees.

MESTREZAT, J. This is a bill for the specific performance of a written contract for the sale of real estate. The controlling question in the case is whether L. A. Clark & Co. were authorized by William L. Sloan, the owner of the property, to enter into the agreement with the plaintiffs, who were the purchasers. The learned trial judge found as a fact and as a conclusion of law that Clark & Co. were not authorized to act as the agents of Sloan in the sale of the property. We have examined with care the testimony in the case and fully agree with these findings. Before Sloan left the city of Pittsburgh for California, in February, 1905, he placed all his business matters, including the sale of this property, in the hands of his son Earl. As found by the trial court, this fact was communicated to Clark & Co. by both Mr. Sloan and his son. Zinn, Clark & Co.'s representative, called on Mr. Sloan immediately prior to his leaving on his Western trip and asked him if he would sell the property in dispute. Sloan told him he would sell, but that he was about leaving for California to get a rest, and would be gone till April. Sloan then gave Zinn the net price he would accept for the property, and told him that his son would be in Pittsburgh during his absence, that all the dealings would have to be done through him, that his son would sign any papers and make any agreements that were to be made, and that he would keep Sloan posted as to any negotiations which might take place looking to a sale of the property. Zinn acted for Clark & Co. in selling the property to the plaintiffs; but at every step in the negotiations he consulted Earl Sloan, and recognized him as the agent and person authorized to act for his father in consummating a sale. There is no evidence that would warrant a finding that Clark & Co. were Sloan's agents to negotiate a sale of the property. The plaintiffs rely upon the telegrams in evidence for such authority; but, when read in the light of the admitted facts, known and understood by all the parties interested in the transaction, they confer no agency on Clark & Co. to enter into a written contract of sale, but, on the contrary, in the language of the learned judge's findings, they "were intended only to express to Clark & Co. the willingness of Sloan to sell the lands for $38,000 and that a commission of $500 would be paid."

The plaintiffs having failed to establish the authority of Clark & Co., as Sloan's agents, to enter into the written contract which they ask the court to enforce against Sloan, the court below was clearly right in refusing a decree for specific performance.

The decree is affirmed.

LINDBERG v. NATIONAL TUBE CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO EMPLOYE— DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES.

Where an employé sued to recover for injuries caused by a defective crane, near which he had been working for over three months, and the defect was visible and must have been known to plaintiff, and defendant was not notified thereof, plaintiff could not recover; no person having directed him to work in the position in which he was injured.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Master and Servant, §§ 574-600.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Action by Charles F. Lindberg against the National Tube Company. From an order refusing to take off nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Evans, J., filed the following opinion in the court below:

"Plaintiff's evidence showed that he was in the employ of the defendant company as a rougher at the rolls. Near where the plaintiff worked was situated a hydraulic crane, which was used for lifting and moving the rolls when they were taken out for cleaning or repairs. A socket in which the upright of the crane revolved had become worn in such a way that, when the boom approached the position where the plaintiff worked, the upright of the crane leaned in that direction, which caused the boom to move around automatically for nearly one-half of its circuit, and it would vibrate back and forward until it finally settled at the lowest point, or directly opposite the direction in which the upright, the mast, leaned. The crane had been in this condition for some three or four months, during which time and long prior thereto the plaintiff had worked in the immediate vicinity of the crane. The boom of the crane, in passing over the space through which it moved when moving automatically, by reason of the defect causing the inclination of the mast, passed over the spot where the plaintiff worked, and at the time in question, loaded with a roll just taken from the mill, it struck the hand of the plaintiff, which had hold of some instrument with which he was working, and crushed it. The plaintiff testified that he did not know of this defect in the crane causing it to move through considerable space automatically in the neighborhood of where he worked. A motion for nonsuit was allowed, on the ground of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

"As we said above, the plaintiff testified that he did not know of the existence of this defect in the crane; but it was open and apparent to any person who opened his eyes that that defect was there. The crane was in regular use. Other workmen called by the plaintiff saw this defect, saw that the crane moved without force being applied to it; and assuming that the plaintiff did not know, as he testified that he did not know, he must have closed his eyes to what was apparent in the immediate vicinity of his work. If he did not know it, he ought to have known it, because a workman may not shut his eyes to apparent danger, and go on for months working in the vicinity of a dangerous machine, which is liable at any time to pass over the spot where he is working and strike him, and yet hold his employer liable for any injury occasioned by such a danger. The duty of the employer here was not to furnish safe tools with which to work, because the plaintiff was not injured in working with this crane, but it was to furnish a safe place in which to work; and with the slightest care upon plaintiff's part he could have known for three months prior to the date of this accident that the position in which he was working was a dangerous one. He closed his eyes to that fact. There is no evidence that he or anybody else ever notified the employer of this danger, or that any person ever directed him particularly to work in that position, knowing it to be a dangerous one.

"The motion to take off the nonsuit is refused."

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Rody P. Marshall and Thomas M. Marshall, for appellant. W. B. Rodgers and Thos. Ewing, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed, on the opinion of the court below.

In re PENNSYLVANIA R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2. 1906.)

1. RAILROADS — MUNICIPAL REGULATION — SAFETY GATES.

Under Act 1851 (P. L. 820) relating to boroughs, and authorizing by section 2 the borough authorities to make such laws, ordinances, and regulations as they shall deem necessary, and in the twenty-fifth clause of the section setting forth the powers expressly conferred, has no power to require a railroad company, at the latter's expense, to maintain and operate safety gates at street crossings in the borough, and an ordinance requiring such action on the part of the railroad company is void.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Railroads, §§ 752-754.]

2. SAME—GRADE CROSSINGS.

A railroad company must adopt adequate means to give notice of approaching trains at grade crossings, but what particular means shall be employed to protect the public when using streets and highways at railroad crossings is left to the company operating the road; reasonable care in view of all the circumstances being demanded by law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Railroads, §§ 752-755.]

Appeal from Superior Court.

In the matter of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. From a judgment of the Superior Court, affirming an order dismissing petition to declare void an ordinance of the borough of North Braddock, the railroad company appeals. Reversed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

M. W. Acheson, Jr., for appellant. William Yost, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The question raised on this appeal is as to the power of the borough of North Braddock to pass an ordinance, approved April 7, 1904, entitled "Ordinance No. 133, requiring the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to erect and maintain and operate safety gates at the point where the tracks of said railroad company cross Fourth street in the borough of North Braddock and imposing a penalty for any failure to comply with the provisions hereof." By the first section of the ordinance the appellant is required within 60 days from its approval to erect, maintain, and operate safety gates at the point designated in the title, for the warning and protection of those traveling upon Fourth street. By the second section a penalty is provided for failure to comply with the requirement of the first.

It is to be first observed, as is very properly stated by counsel for appellant, that the question is not (a) whether the borough may itself erect and maintain gates; (b) nor whether a given crossing ought to be protected by gates; (c) nor whether in a given case a railroad company might be found guilty of negligence in failing to have gates; (d) nor whether the law ought to compel railroad companies to maintain gates. It is as to the power of a borough to require a railroad company to do a particular thing, which, in the judgment of the borough, the company ought to do at a particular point for the safety of the public in connection with the operation of its road. In the present case the question is as to the power of this borough to require the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to adopt what it regards as proper means for the protection of the public at a designated point crossed by the tracks of the company. It is not pretended that the tracks are not lawfully on the street, nor that the railroad company has not the right to run its cars over them.

In the operation of its road and in the running of its cars the judgment of the board of directors of a railroad company, in the absence of statutory provision, is supreme and exclusive. The public safety imperatively requires that there be no division of this great responsibility with others, not even with municipalities through whose limits railroads may run; for division of it would be the shifting of it in every case of accountability for failure to properly operate the road or run the cars. But, while this is true, corresponding duties of the highest order are imposed exclusively upon those having the control and management of railroads. One of these is to adopt and use suitable and adequate means to give notice of approaching trains at grade crossings, which are always more or less dangerous, and the failure to perform this duty is negligence, for the consequences of which those are responsible upon whom the duty is imposed. What particular means, however, shall be employed to protect the public when using streets or highways at railroad crossings is left to the company operating the road, the law merely demanding and requiring reasonable care in view of all the circumstances. There is no common-law duty on the part of the company to station a flagman or erect gates at a crossing; but the failure of the company to do so is to be considered with other facts in every given case in determining whether the company was negligent. Among our cases announcing this rule are Philadelphia & Reading R. R. Co. v. Killips, 88 Pa. 405; Lehigh Valley R. R. Co. v. Brandtmaier, 113 Pa. 610, 6 Atl. 288; Seifred v. Penna. R. R. Co., 206 Pa. 399, 55 Atl. 1061.

What is attempted by the appellee in the present case? Having no voice in the operation of the appellant's road, it undertakes to do what the common law itself does not do. It assumes to declare how the railroad shall perform a public duty at a particular point, and would substitute its judgment for that of the board of directors as to what kind of protection shall be afforded at the grade crossing, but with no corresponding responsibility resting on it for the inadequacy of the means which it declares must be adopted. If it has power to require the appellant to erect safety gates, it has the power to require the adoption, from time to time, of such other means as in its judgment ought to be adopted by the company for the protection of the public at street crossings. The power for which it contends would be practically unlimited. That the appellee is attempting to substitute municipal control for that of the railroad company itself at a particular point, by declaring just how the duty of the company must be there performed, is too plain for discussion. If the borough, in its judgment, ought itself to adopt means for the protection of the traveling public at this or any other point within the municipal limits, there is nothing to prevent it from doing so; but before it can interfere, as it would by this ordinance, with the railroad company in its performance of its duty to protect the public at the crossing, it must show authority from the Legislature to do so, expressly or impliedly conferred. The power which it would exercise may be a desirable one, but courts cannot recognize it unless it exists.

Municipal corporations possess and can exercise such powers only as are granted in express words, or are necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to those expressly granted, or those which are indispensable to the declared objects and purposes of the municipality. 1 Dillon on Municipal Corp. (4th Ed.) § 89; 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 1139. Doubt as to corporate power is resolved against its existence, and this is no less true of a municipality than of a private corporation; for the source of the power of each is the same. Answer may be made to this that a municipality, as the representative of the state, has imparted to it inherent police power. This is true, and it is contended that the appellee is but exercising such power; but the distinction is overlooked that it is not itself, at the expense of the public, undertaking to exercise control over the streets and to protect the public at the railroad crossing, but is attempting to require some one else to do so at its own expense. It has undoubted power to do the former, if it will; but to do the latter, through the ordinance which it has passed, authority to enact the same must appear. The use of the street in crossing it is a public use of it by the railroad company having a legislative right to so use it on an equality with any natural person, except as such right may be limited in the grant of it, and the attempted interference with this right must fail, unless the borough can point to its power to so interfere, expressly or impliedly existing.

Among the express powers conferred upon boroughs by the act of 1851 (P. L. 320), the one sought to be exercised here does not appear. By the first clause of the second section of that act borough authorities are empowered generally "to make such laws, ordinances, by-laws, and regulations, not inconsistent with the laws of this commonwealth, as they shall deem necessary for the good order and government of the borough." In the succeeding 25 clauses of the same section are found the powers expressly conferred, but the power to pass this ordinance is not one of them. In Borough of Millerstown v. Bell et al., 123 Pa. 151, 16 Atl. 612, this court, through Paxson, J., said: "The general powers referred to in the first section must be confined to the particular subjects referred to in the succeeding sections." Without now committing ourselves to this, it is clear that the good order and government of a borough referred to in the first clause are not involved in the ordinance. The good order of a borough can be preserved and it can be properly governed, no matter how many railroads cross its streets by legislative permission, and no matter how fast cars may run over them. We assume this is the clause designated by the Superior Court as the "general welfare clause"—"broad enough," in the opinion of that court, "to cover the municipal legislation complained of." For the reason just given we cannot concur in this.

The case of Commonwealth v. Philadelphia, Harrisburg & Pittsburg Railroad Co., 23 Pa. Super. Ct. 205, was relied upon by the Superior Court as authority to sustain the action of the lower court. In that case the Superior Court held that the three following cases were authority for the power of a borough to pass such an ordinance as is now under consideration: Penna. R. R. Co. v. Duquesne Borough, 46 Pa. 223; Township of Newlin v. Davis, 77 Pa. 317; and Pennsylvania Railroad Co. v. Irwin, 85 Pa. 336. An examination of these cases does not justify reference to them as authority for the power claimed by the appellee. In the first, the railroad company, which had become the owner of the canal, succeeded to the duty of maintaining a bridge over it. Having failed to perform that duty, it was held that the borough authorities, as the proper public officers to look after the public highways, had the right to repair the bridge and to recover the expense of doing so from the railroad company. In the second, the action was against a township for injuries resulting from a defective bridge. All that was decided was that it was the duty of the township to properly maintain it. In the third, the railroad company changed the location of a public road, necessitating the building of a bridge, and it was simply decided that, the company having failed to rebuild and repair the bridge, the township could recover the cost of doing so from the company. A fourth case, cited by the Superior Court in Commonwealth v. Philadelphia, Harrisburg & Pittsburg Railroad Co., is Pennsylvania Co. v. Watson,* 81 Pa. 293. The reference was intended to be to another case reported in the same volume—Pennsylvania Co. v. James,* 81 Pa. 194—in which there appears the language quoted in the opinion of the Superior Court as to the police powers of boroughs. But, turning to the charge of the court below, as found on page 198, it appears that power had been conferred by the Legislature to pass the ordinance which was under consideration. The Legislature might, of course, have done so here, but it has not. By the act of March 7, 1901 (P. L. 20), cities of the second class are authorized to enact ordinances requiring the erection of safety gates and the placing of flagmen at the intersection of railroads with public streets; and by the act of May 23, 1889 (P. L. 277), the same authority is conferred upon cities of the third class.

As the borough of North Braddock had no power to pass the ordinance complained of, it is declared to be invalid, and the order of the Superior Court, affirming the order of the court below sustaining it, is reversed; the costs below, and on both appeals, to be paid by the appellee.

MCGUNNEGLE v. PITTSBURG & L. E. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN — PETITION — AMENDMENT.

Where plaintiff in condemnation proceedings obtained a judgment, it will not be reversed because of the refusal to permit the petition to be amended by striking therefrom a description of land below a low-water mark in a river, where it was not asked for until after 23 witnesses for plaintiff had been examined as to value without objection, and the court instructed the jury that they could allow compensation only for land which plaintiff owned and which did not extend below low-water mark.

2. NAVIGABLE WATERS—OBSTRUCTIONS.

An owner of land abutting on a navigable river cannot place any structure or filling between high and low water mark, which would obstruct the river for navigation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Navigable Waters, §§ 61-72.]

3. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where, in condemnation proceedings, the jury is distinctly instructed that the effect of fillings beyond low-water mark cannot be considered in determining values, remarks by witnesses as to the effect of such fillings are not ground for reversal.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Action by Maria L. McGunnegle against the Pittsburg & Lake Erie Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

At the trial defendant made the following motion: "Mr. Smith: I desire to present this morning an amendment in the bond case at No. 314, February term, 1903, and in this proceeding, which is as follows: And now, to wit, October 24, 1904, comes the Pittsburg & Lake Erie Railroad Company by its counsel, and moves the court to amend the description of the land to be condemned by striking out the words 'together with all the land lying between the harbor line and the low-water line of the Ohio river.' (Mr. Ferguson: That is objected to as too late. It is specially objected that the railroad company having elected to condemn and having filed its bond, it is now too late to abandon the condemnation, either in whole or in part. Motion refused. To which ruling counsel for defendant request an exception. Exception allowed, and bill sealed.)"

D. K. McGunnegle, a witness for the plaintiff, was asked this question: "Q. Do you know where the low-water line of the Ohio river was in front of your mother's property, before the Davis Island dam was constructed, with reference to the harbor line? Mr. Smith: What do you propose to prove? Mr. Ferguson: We propose to prove, in connection with the petition of the railroad, filed in this case, defining what it condemned, that the low-water line of the Ohio river, in front of the property of the plaintiff, was between the harbor line, as shown on the petition, and Brunot Island. (Objected to as incompetent and irrelevant, for the reason that, under the laws of this state, "pool full," being the stage of the water when the water is just abreast of Davis Island dam, is, for the purposes of this case and for any other purpose, low-water line. Counsel for the defendant desire to state also that in this proceeding it is not the intention, or it was not the anticipation, that any rights whatever could be possibly acquired under this proceeding beyond the harbor line; the intention being merely to take whatever title Mrs. McGunnegle had under the grants from the commonwealth and the mesne conveyors. The Court: Objection overruled. To which ruling of the court counsel for defendant except. Exception allowed, and bill sealed.) Mr. Ferguson: Q. How is that, Mr. McGunnegle? The low-water line is outside of the harbor line through our property."

J. W. Mayes, a witness for the plaintiff, was asked this question: "Q. If that land had been filled up out to the harbor line, would you put the value at $100,000, or what would you put it at? (Objected to. The Court: Objection overruled. To which ruling of the court counsel for defendant except. Exception allowed, and bill sealed.) A. No; if that was filled up, I would add considerable to the price of that land, at least one-third."

At the request of counsel for the defendant, the court stated the following for the record: Addressing counsel for defendant, the court asked whether he would guaranty that this company (the defendant) would not fill beyond "pool full" line. This remark was made during the argument of counsel; counsel for plaintiff arguing that the railroad company, as the successor of the plaintiff, had a right to build to the harbor line, and counsel for the railroad company arguing that they had not. Now, counsel for defendant move the court to withdraw a juror and continue the case. Motion refused.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Edwin W. Smith, for appellant. J. S. Ferguson and E. G. Ferguson, for appellee.

BROWN, J. On February 25, 1903, the Pittsburg & Lake Erie Railroad Company filed its bond to secure to Mrs. Maria L. McGunnegle compensation for land which it had appropriated for railroad purposes. It is located in the borough of Esplen, Allegheny county, and is minutely described by metes and bounds in the petitions for the approval of the bond and appointment of viewers. The quantity is given as 6.757 acres, "together with all the land lying between the harbor line and the low-water line of the Ohio river." Harbor line is a line established by the Secretary of War, in pursuance of an act of Congress, and beyond it "no piers, wharves, bulkheads, or other works shall be extended, or deposits made, except under such regulations as may be prescribed from time to time by him." This line is at from 50 to 300 feet from low water, which in this case is "pool full." "Pool full," indicating low water, is "the surface of the water when it lies just even with the crest of the Davis Island dam when it is up." This is the definition given by H. C. Gould, an assistant engineer in the service of the United States, and is conceded all around to be correct. The absolute title of Mrs. McGunnegle extended from the land already occupied by the railroad company only to high water, and in the space intervening between that line and low water, or pool full, she had but a qualified fee; her right there being subject to the public right of navigation. Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. v. Trone, 28 Pa. 206; Freeland v. Pennsylvania Railroad Co., 197 Pa. 529, 47 Atl. 745, 58 L. R. A. 206, 80 Am. St. Rep. 850. Beyond the low-water line the title remained in the commonwealth, and the appellee had therefore no right or ownership whatever between it and harbor line, the space which the appellant distinctly stated it would take in the condemnation proceedings.

On appeal from the award of the viewers, the question of the amount of compensation to which the appellee was entitled was submitted to a jury, and the four errors specified are alleged to have been committed on the trial before that body. The case was called on Monday, October 20, 1904, and on that and the following day 23 of the 25 witnesses called by the plaintiff were examined. Each one called as to the amount of damages sustained was examined, without objection by the defendant, as to the value of the land, which, in its petitions for the approval of its bond and the appointment of viewers, it said it would take amounting to 6.757 acres, "together with all the land lying between the harbor line and the low-water line of the Ohio river." Some of these witnesses fixed the damages of valuing the land by the acre, and there was testimony as to the quantity between harbor line and pool full, and between pool full and high-water mark. On the third day of the trial, and just before the plaintiff closed, the defendant moved to amend the description of the land to be condemned by striking out the words "together with all the land lying between the harbor line and the low-water line of the Ohio river."

This was objected to as being too late, and a special objection was made that the railroad company, having elected to condemn and having filed its bond, could not abandon the condemnation, either in whole or in part. The amendment was refused, and two more witnesses were then called by the plaintiff, who also testified, without objection, as to the value of the land taken, including the space between pool full and harbor line.

The first assignment relates to the refusal of the court to allow the amendment asked for by the appellant. It is urged that it should have been allowed, because, as Mrs. McGunnele admittedly did not own the land lying beyond low water towards the river, the railroad company was not taking it from her, and her right to compensation was limited to her ownership, extending only to pool full or low water. The reason for refusing the amendment is not given by the learned trial judge, and we need not conjecture what it may have been, for the refusal could have done no possible harm to the defendant, in view of the clear, distinct, and correct instructions given to the jury that they could allow compensation to the plaintiff only for the land which she owned, and which did not extend beyond low-water mark. If the amendment had been allowed, the defendant could not have asked for more from the court than was said by the learned trial judge in support of its theory as to what land it could take. We might allow the amendment here, and, if so, there would be nothing in the record, so far as the quantity of land taken is concerned, of which the appellant could make any complaint; and the jury were most definitely instructed that for such quantity only could they allow compensation. In the general charge the learned and careful trial judge said: "The land is situated in the borough of Esplen, fronting on the Ohio river between the old right of way of the defendant company and low-water mark of the Ohio river. * * * We have had testimony here showing not only the location of this property, but the location of what is called the harbor line, which, for the purposes of this case, I instruct you, is outside of the property taken by the railroad company; that is, it is towards the channel of the river. The property line, for the purposes of this case, is low-water mark, as established by the line you have heard called 'pool full' in the course of the trial. That is to be taken as the low-water line for the purposes of this case, and the property taken and appropriated by the railroad company is the property lying between the old right of way of the railroad company and low-water line." Nine points were submitted by the defendant, and each of them was affirmed. Five of them were as follows: "Third. That under the laws of this state the plaintiff has an absolute title in fee only to the high-water mark, with a qualified title between high and low water mark, subject to the right of navigation. Fourth. That for the purposes of this case, the low-water mark is the line of the water at 'pool full,' which is the line of the water when it is just at the crest of the Davis Island dam. Fifth. That the owner of the land has no right to put any structures or filling into the river beyond low-water line. Sixth. That no owner of land has the right to put any structures or filling between high-water line and low-water line that would be an obstruction to the use of that part of the river for navigation." "Eighth. That the verdict of the jury cannot be based upon any use of the land which would contemplate a filling of the river to the so-called harbor line under the testimony in this case." And in the ninth the defendant stated its whole case in asking for the instruction "that the verdict of the jury in this case cannot be more than the value of the plaintiff's land, computed to low-water mark, at the time of the taking, less the value of any use that the plaintiff may make of it not inconsistent with its use for railroad purposes." As already stated, the case went on without a single objection made by the defendant to the testimony of any witness as to what damages had been sustained by the plaintiff for taking the land, which, in its proceeding to condemn, it alleged extended to harbor line, and all of which it said it would take; but in the end the limit of the plaintiff's land to be taken by the defendant was definitely fixed by the court at "pool full," or low water, and the case was submitted to the jury just as the defendant asked that it be submitted. As a basis for their verdict, there was ample testimony as to the value of the land which the defendant could and does take. The refusal to allow the amendment could not, therefore, have harmed the appellant. Even if it had been allowed, the case would have been submitted just as it was submitted, by affirming every point presented by the defendant. Of the correctness of the general charge there could be and is no complaint. The first assignment is dismissed.

By the second assignment error is alleged in allowing D. K. McGunnele to testify as to where the low-water line was in front of his mother's property before the Davis Island dam was constructed. This testimony probably ought to have been rejected, for the line of low water before the construction of the dam was not the question before the jury; but the admission was harmless, in view of the instructions contained, not only in the general charge, but in the specific answer to defendant's fourth point: "That for the purposes of this case, the low-water mark is the line of the water at pool full which is the line of the water when it is just at the crest of the Davis Island dam." And so of the third assignment, complaining of the admission of the testimony of J. W. Mayes, that if the land had been filled up out to the harbor line he would add to the price of the land at least one-third, for in the answer to defendant's eighth point the jury were told that the verdict could not be based upon any use of the land which contemplated a filling of the river to the harbor line. The same instruction was contained in the answer to the fifth point.

It does not appear just when the trial judge made the remark complained of in the fourth assignment. It was made during the argument of counsel, which may have been a running discussion between them during the trial, in which the court intervened and made the remark attributed to it; but, whenever made, the defendant was not harmed by it, even if the jury heard it, for they were told that neither the defendant nor any one else could fill beyond low water. The correct instructions went further in stating that an owner of land fronting on a navigable river has no right to put any structures or filling, even between high-water line and low-water line, that would be an obstruction to the use of that part of the river for navigation.

The assignments are all dismissed, and the judgment is affirmed.

IN RE FAY'S ESTATE.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — ORAL CONTRACT — POSSESSION BY VENDEE.

Where plaintiff's testate purchased at a definite price and on specified terms land sufficiently described and valuable as a quarry under a parol contract, and paid part of the price, and quarried stone the value of which cannot be reasonably ascertained, specific performance of the contract will be decreed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Specific Performance, §§ 120, 196.]

Appeal from Orphans' Court, Allegheny County.

In the matter of the estate of John Fay, deceased. From a decree for specific performance, Mary Fay, executrix, appeals. Affirmed.

Miller, J., filed an opinion in the court below which was in part as follows:

"On or about said 26th day of August, 1901, John Fay, now deceased, he having died on October 21, 1903, entered into a parol agreement with Booth & Flinn, Limited, for the purchase of a property known as the 'Crescent Street Property,' consisting of 26 lots, for the sum or price of $3,250, payable as follows: $250 in cash, and the balance with interest in equal monthly installments of $75, including the payment of taxes thereon. No time was fixed for the delivery of the deed. In pursuance of this agreement, Fay on the following day paid Booth & Flinn, Limited, $250, the agreed cash payment, and entered into immediate possession of the land, which is underlaid with a vein of stone, and continuously mined, quarried, and took away large quantities of building stone therefrom; said occupancy and quarrying operation continuing until the time of his death. During this period Fay paid on account of the principal $773.41, on account of interest $257.37. He is charged with the taxes thereon paid by Booth & Flinn, Limited, amounting to $187.43, which charge under the contract, with the balance of the purchase money and the interest thereon, is due. The land was known and spoken of by Fay and the vendor as the 'Crescent Street Property.' It fronted on that street, which at this place is now the Grant Boulevard; a portion thereof having been acquired by the city of Pittsburg in the construction of said boulevard. It was so occupied and used at the time the contract was entered into. Booth & Flinn, Limited, did not at that time and do not now have any other land on that street or in that vicinity. The land had a special value as a stone quarry, and as such has depreciated to the extent of a large amount of stone removed therefrom by Fay. The quantity of stone removed, and the market value thereof, cannot now be readily ascertained; the property being left in a rough, caved-in, and excavated condition. Booth & Flinn, Limited, have not occupied or exercised any control over said lands since the date of the said contract, except the payment of taxes.

"The prerequisites of the relief asked for by the petitioners; in respect to the contract, the parties, the consideration, and the subject-matter, have been established by full, satisfactory, and indubitable proof. The 'Crescent Street Property,' consisting of 26 lots, and being all that the Booth & Flinn, Limited, had on that street, or in that vicinity, is a sufficient identification, when coupled with the fact that Fay went into possession and used the same until the time of his death. During that time he knew or was bound to know the dimensions of the property he purchased, and the extent, if any, to which a part of it had been used or taken for the Grant Boulevard. To show the subject of the contract with reasonable certainty is sufficient. 'It is not necessary [Burns v. Sutherland, 7 Pa. 108] that lines of separation should be actually run upon the ground, if from the agreement of the parties, and the distinct subsequent possession of the vendee, it is possible to ascertain the boundaries and quantity of the land sold, or * * * the proof must be such as to direct how the surveyor may run it off from the rest of the vendor's land.' Mr. Justice Clark, in Anderson v. Brinser, 129 Pa. 376, 11 Atl. 809, 18 Atl. 520, 6 L. R. A. 205, says, 'a designation by lot number is available.' Here, as in Henry v. Black, 210 Pa. 245, 59 Atl. 1070, 105 Am. St. Rep. 802, 'the ground properly appurtenant can be ascertained by measurement to a certainty.' For the purposes of this case the land as described in the petition clearly contains all the 'Crescent Street Property' contracted for by Fay.

"By the act of April 28, 1899 (P. L. 157), which is an enlargement and amendment of the former acts relating to specific performance of decedent's contract, this court is empowered to decree the specific performance of contracts according to the true intent and meaning thereof, inter alia, 'whenever any parol contract shall have been entered into by any person for the conveyance of real estate within this commonwealth, and the purchaser shall have died without fully executing such contract, * * * and such parol contract may have been so far executed by possession, by improvements, or by partial payments of the purchase money that it would be against equity to rescind the same.' This contract was executed in part both by the delivery and taking of possession, by partial payments and receipts of purchase money. From the date this agreement was entered into and the first payment made, and possession thereof taken by Fay in the active mining, quarrying, and taking away of stone, and so continued until his death, Booth & Flinn, Limited, ceased to have any control over or rights therein, except as to the receipt of the purchase money. They could not sell it, or otherwise dispose of it, or deliver possession thereof to any one else, without incurring the penalty of a breach of contract.

"But to take this case out of the statute of frauds and perjuries it is not enough that the essential of contract, parties, consideration, subject-matter, and part performance, be clearly and indubitably proven; but it must be shown that it would be unjust to rescind the contract (Moore v. Small, 19 Pa 461), and also that the party aggrieved could not be compensated in damages (Derr v. Ackerman, 182 Pa. 591, 88 Atl. 475). Unjust, however, to whom? Manifestly there can be no preference. The living vendors and the heirs of a deceased vendee are entitled to equal justice. As between these two, Fay got all he contracted for. If he failed to pay the installments of consideration as agreed upon, his default was either assented to, or overlooked by the vendor; but the latter did all the contract called for, and in pursuance thereof gave up possession and permitted the vendee to depreciate the value thereof to the extent of the value of the stone removed, which value the vendee received and converted to his own use. It would be unjust and inequitable to the vendor to rescind the contract, while its enforcement is not an injustice to the vendee's lega-tees and heirs, as it gives them what their ancestor bargained for. The offer of the vendees to compensate the vendors in damages is not practical in the ascertainment thereof. Fay's purpose in acquiring this land was to mine and quarry the stone taken therefrom. That was his business; but what quantity was taken, where it was delivered, and what price was received therefor, is a matter of conjecture. The evidences to ascertain the thickness and dimensions of the portion of the vein removed are not reasonably ascertainable. They would at best result in a mere guess.

"This is not the case of Miller v. Zufall, 113 Pa. 317, 6 Atl. 350. The turning point there was whether a contract in fact existed; Chief Justice Mercur, speaking for the court, saying: 'Great doubt exists as to there having been any specific and material contract between Stutzman and the defendant for the sale and purchase of land, or whether there was a mere permission to cut an uncertain quantity of timber therefrom, or negotiations in regard to some sale at a future time.' If the loss arising out of a breach of parol contract can be compensated in damages, the case ordinarily is not taken out of the statute of frauds and perjuries; but says Mr. Justice Sterrett in Jamison v. Dimock, 95 Pa. 52: 'While this may be true as to parol gifts of land, * * * it is not correct as applied to a case like the present, which is claimed to be a parol sale for a money consideration fully paid according to the contract, possession taken and continuously held in pursuance thereof. There was no error, therefore, in refusing to hold that a parol contract of sale cannot be specifically enforced unless the vendee can show that he has made improvements for which he cannot be compensated in damages. There are undoubtedly cases in which the equities of vendees rest upon other equally available grounds.'

"The facts found and the conclusions of law reached indicate that specific performance of this contract should be enforced, and it will be so decreed."

PER CURIAM. Decree affirmed, on the opinion of the court below.

UNITED STATES, to Use of SAYRE & FISHER CO., v. GRIEFEN et al.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 28, 1906.)

JUDGMENT—JOINT DEFENDANTS—JUDGMENT AGAINST ONE.

Gen. St. p. 2336, § 2, is valid so far as authorizing plaintiff to proceed to judgment against one of two joint debtors on his being properly brought into court, though invalid so far as authorizing judgment against the defendant not so brought in.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 30, Cent. Dig. Judgment, §§ 415-421.]

Action by the United States of America, to use of the Sayre & Fisher Company, against Richard A. Griefen and another. Judgment for plaintiff on demurrer to a plea in abatement.

Argued November term, 1905, before GUMMERE, C. J., and HENDRICKSON and PITNEY, JJ.

J. Kearny Rice, for plaintiff. Alan H. Strong, for defendant.

GUMMERE, C. J. This action is brought upon a bond made by the two defendants to the United States of America, by the terms of which they are jointly bound. Summons was issued against both of the defendants, and returned served as to the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, and not found as to the defendants Griefen.

The plea demurred to is filed by the United States Fidelity and Guaranty Company, and avers that the defendant Griefen, was not, at the time of the commencement of the action, or at any time since, a citizen or resident of the state of New Jersey, or in anywise subject to its laws or jurisdiction; that the only service of process in this action was by the sheriff of the county of Mercer, to whom the summons was directed, giving and delivering to one Johnston, deputy commissioner of banks and insurance, at the office of the commissioner of banks and insurance, at the State House, in Trenton, a true copy of said summons, personally, together with $2 for the service fee; that no writ, or process to answer to the plaintiff, has been at any time, or in any manner, served upon Griefen, or upon any person authorized to accept service for him; that he has not, either in person or by attorney, appeared in this case; and because the said Griefen is a nonresident of the state, and has not been served with process, or appeared in the case, or in any manner been brought into court to answer to the plaintiff, the defendant the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company prays judgment of the writ and declaration, and that the same be quashed.

The facts set out in this plea do not entitle the defendant to the judgment for which he prays. It has already been held by this court, on a motion to set aside the service of the summons upon the Fidelity & Guaranty Company, that service upon the deputy commissioner was legal service upon that defendant. United States v. Griefen, 70 N. J. Law, 123, 56 Atl. 120. Nor is the fact that the defendant Griefen is a nonresident of the state, and has not been served with process, any bar to the action, as was pointed out in another opinion in this case delivered by this court upon a demurrer filed by the Fidelity & Guaranty Company to the plaintiff's declaration (60 Atl. 513). When one of two joint debtors is properly brought into court, the plaintiff is entitled to proceed to judgment against both the joint debtors, by virtue of the provisions of section 2 of the act concerning obligations. Gen. St. p. 2336. That section also declares that if judgment shall pass for the plaintiff, he shall have his judgment and execution against such of the defendants as are brought into court, and also against the other joint debtor or debtors named in the process, in the same manner as if they had been all brought into court by virtue of the said process. So far as this latter provision authorizes the entering of judgment, and the suing out execution against such of the joint debtors as have not been brought into court, it has, perhaps, been nullified by the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution, which provides that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; the effect of that provision being, as declared by the Supreme Court of the United States in Pennoy v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 565, to render a personal judgment devoid of any validity, either within or without the territory of the state in which it is given, if rendered in an action upon a money demand, against a nonresident, who has not been legally brought into court; but so far as the statute authorizes the plaintiff to proceed to judgment against such of the joint debtors as have been legally served with process, it still remains a valid enactment.

The plaintiff is entitled to judgment on the demurrer.

VALLASTER v. ATLANTIC CITY R. CO.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 28, 1906.)

RAILROADS—FIRES SET BY LOCOMOTIVES—SPARK ARRESTERS.

A railroad company is not liable for a fire set by sparks from a locomotive, simply because the kind of spark arrester on such locomotive was not as good as that used on some of its other locomotives; both having been in common use and approved by experience, and it, after the exercise of due care and skill, having adopted both, convinced that they were equally good, and uncertain which was the better.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Railroads, §§ 1668-1672.]

Action by Roxanna Vallaster against the Atlantic City Railroad Company. Verdict for plaintiff. Defendant's rule to show cause made absolute.

Argued February term, 1905, before GUMMERE, C. J., and FORT, GARRETSON, and PITNEY, JJ.

Thompson & Cole, for the rule. George A. Bourgeois, opposed.

GUMMERE, C. J. This suit was brought to recover the loss sustained by the plaintiff in the destruction of her property by fire, alleged to have been communicated from sparks thrown by one of the locomotive engines of the defendant company. The defense was that the engine from which the sparks escaped was equipped with a spark arrester of approved pattern, in general use, and that it was in good order on the day when the plaintiff's property was burned.

It appeared in evidence that the defendant used two kinds of spark arresters upon its engines; one, designated the "three piece netting," upon engines of the compound type (those which use their steam twice); and the other designated the "four piece netting," or "box screen," upon its engines of the simple type (that is, those which use their steam once). The engine from which it was claimed the fire had been communicated was a compound engine equipped with a "three piece netting" spark arrester. It was testified to, by an expert witness called on behalf of the defendant company, that there was very little, if any, difference in the effectiveness of these two spark arresters, in preventing the escape of fire; and that he knew of no better mechanism for the prevention of the escape of sparks from an engine of the compound type than the "three piece netting." Upon the cross-examination of this witness it was shown that the great majority of the engines of the defendant company were equipped with the "four piece netting"; but on his redirect examination he explained the reason for this condition by stating that the use of the compound engine was being abandoned by the defendant company, and that most of them had been converted into the simple type of engine. No testimony was submitted by the plaintiff upon the relative merits of these two kinds of spark arresters. The trial judge, in his charge to the jury, after referring to the evidence as to the use of these two varieties of spark arresters by the defendants, proceeded as follows: "The argument (on behalf of the plaintiff) is that the box screen must be a better spark arrester, because it is used on the single engines, where greater care is required on account of the greater danger; and it is argued further that the box screen must be better than this three-fold wire screen, because they have discarded, as it is stated, the three-fold screen, and are using more of the box screens. That is met on the part of the railroad company, as I recollect the testimony, by evidence that they have been gradually discarding the compound engines upon which this three-fold screen was used, and adopting the single engine. Now, you see from that evidence the question for you to decide is whether this three-fold screen was the best practical means to prevent the communication of fire through this locomotive. If it was, that is the end of the case, and your verdict must be for the defendant; if it was not, then your verdict would be for the plaintiff."

On this instruction the jury found in favor of the plaintiff. The only conclusion to be drawn from their verdict is that they understood from the charge of the court that, if they should conclude from the evidence that the "box screen" was a better appliance for preventing the escape of sparks than the "three piece netting," they must find the defendant liable for the damage done to the plaintiff's property; and that they so concluded. But such a measure of liability was repudiated by this court in the case of Hoff v. West Jersey Railroad Co., 45 N. J. Law, 201, upon a similar finding of fact, as will appear from the following extract from the opinion in that case: "It may be that the spark arrester, to the insufficiency of which the fire was attributed, was not as good as certain others which the defendant had in use, and yet it does not thereby follow that the defendant is responsible for the damages occasioned by this fire. Both kinds of screen in question appear to have been in common use, and if, after the exercise of due care and skill, the defendant had adopted them both, in the conviction that they were equally good, or that it was uncertain which was the better, an error in a careful judgment of that kind would not have made the defendant liable for the consequences of such error. The law does not give immunity in these matters only on the ground that in the selection of its instruments an infallible judgment shall be exercised. There is no breach of duty on the part of the company, if, in the choice of such an instrument as the one in question, it selects one which is in common use, and which has been approved by experience."

The jury having been erroneously instructed as to the test to be applied by them in determining the question of the defendant's responsibility for the burning of the plaintiff's premises, the rule to show cause must be made absolute.

BURGESSER v. WENDEL.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 26, 1906.)

1. CONTRACT—CONSIDERATION.

A change of residence at another's request is a valid consideration for a promise to pay money.

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—MEMORANDUM—NECESSITY.

A promise to pay a certain sum weekly as long as the promisee resides in a certain place does not require a memorandum under the statute of frauds.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court of Newark.
Action by Mary Burgess against Augustine W. Wendel. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued November term, 1905, before DIXON, GARRISON, and SWAYZE, JJ.

Edward Kenny, for appellant. Charles M. Myers, for respondent.

SWAYZE, J. The district court found that the plaintiff had resided with the defendant prior to his marriage; that upon that event, he provided another house for her, and promised to pay her a certain sum (afterwards fixed at $10) weekly as long as she should continue to reside in the new house; that she was still residing in the house; and that the defendant had failed to pay the weekly allowance for 10 weeks. He rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $80.

It is now argued on behalf of the defendant that the facts, as found, do not warrant the judgment, because they fail to show a consideration, and because, to state the point in the language of the appellant's brief, "there was no agreement in this case as contemplated by the statute of frauds, because there was simply a voluntary payment without consideration." Before the trial court, this objection was stated to be that the contract was not to be performed within one year. We think the case shows an agreement, and not a mere voluntary payment. There was an arrangement between the parties for a change of the plaintiff's residence, and upon this arrangement she acted. If this were not so, the point was not made in the trial court, and cannot now be considered. O'Donnell v. Weller (N. J. Sup.) 59 Atl. 1055. There was a legal consideration for the defendant's promise. The change of the plaintiff's residence may have been a benefit to the defendant, or a detriment to the plaintiff, or both. That contracts of this character do not require a memorandum in writing under the fifth section of our statute of frauds has been decided by this court. Eiseman v. Schneider, 60 N. J. Law, 291, 37 Atl. 623.

We find no errors, and the judgment must be affirmed, with costs.

HARRIS v. ATLANTIC CITY.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 20, 1906.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—ORDINANCES—VALIDITY.

The ordinance of Atlantic City, approved April 11, 1905, forbidding any person to hire, or offer for hire, rolling chairs on the Board Walk along the ocean in front of the city, is valid.

2. SAME—CONSTRUCTION—"TO HIRE."

The verb "to hire" is employed in that ordinance in its secondary sense, meaning to grant the temporary use for compensation.

3. CRIMINAL LAW—CERTIORARI—REVIEW—EVIDENCE.

On a certiorari to review a conviction in a municipal court for the violation of an ordinance, the Supreme Court will not disturb the decision of the lower court upon a question of fact when it is supported by legal evidence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari by Harry Harris against Atlantic City to review two ordinances of the city. Affirmed.

Argued November term, 1905, before GARRISON, SWAYZE, and DIXON, JJ.

J. J. Crandall, for prosecutor. Harry Wootton, for the city.

DIXON, J. The prosecutor has sued out two writs of certiorari; one bringing up an ordinance of Atlantic City, approved April 11, 1905, to regulate the use of the Board Walk along the ocean in front of the city, the other bringing up the conviction of the prosecutor for violation of the ordinance. The ordinance provides that no person or corporation shall on the Board Walk exhibit, rent, hire, sell, or exchange, or offer for rent, hire, sale or exchange, any goods, wares, merchandise, tickets of admission, commodity, rolling chair, or other vehicle for carrying passengers.

The reasons assigned by the prosecutor for setting aside this ordinance are that the ordinance is not authorized by statute, that the power of the city council is limited to the licensing of persons to use the Board Walk in certain modes and to the prohibition of such use by persons not so licensed, and that the restrictions of the ordinance are an invasion of private right and are unreasonable. The statutory authority to regulate the use of the Board Walk is conferred by section 11 of the act of April 6, 1889 (P. L. p. 214), under which the Walk was constructed, and also by paragraph 6, section 14, of the act of April 3, 1902 (P. L. p. 284), under which Atlantic City is now governed. The Legislature has fixed no express limitation upon this general power to regulate, and the only limitation which the courts can impose is that it shall not be exercised unreasonably. Penn. R. R. Co. v. Jersey City, 47 N. J. Law, 286; Trenton Horse R. R. Co. v. Trenton, 53 N. J. Law, 132, 20 Atl. 1076, 11 L. R. A. 410; Cape May R. R. Co. v. Cape May, 59 N. J. Law, 396, 36 Atl. 696, 36 L. R. A. 653.

We must, therefore, consider whether the ordinance under review transgresses this limitation. The primary object to be subserved under the act of 1889, above cited, in laying out and constructing "public walks along the beach or ocean front," was evidently to secure pleasant promenades for pedestrians, and we perceive nothing unreasonable in an ordinance forbidding the use of such walks for traffic which may interfere with that object. Commonwealth v. Ellis, 158 Mass. 555, 63 N. E. 651. The hiring of chairs upon the Board Walk may certainly cause such interference. The design indicated by this restriction is that rolling chairs shall not be allowed on the Board Walk, except when they are in actual use by passengers or are going to some place off the walk where they may be kept for hire. To this extent, at least, the ordinance is reasonable, and so far only does it now concern the prosecutor. It will be time enough to consider its other provisions when their enforcement is attempted. Penn. R. R. Co. v. Jersey City, 47 N. J. Law, 286. The ordinance does not in any sense invade private right, for the right to use these public places is altogether public and is confined to such uses as do not violate law. We consider the ordinance in the particular above mentioned valid.

The reasons assigned by the prosecutor for contesting the legality of his conviction under this ordinance are in effect that the evidence before the recorder did not warrant the conclusion that the prosecutor had offered his rolling chair for hire upon the Board Walk, and that as his rolling chair had been licensed under another ordinance of the city he had a right so to offer it. Although the primary meaning of the verb "to hire" is to procure the temporary use of an article for compensation, its secondary meaning is to grant such a use, and we think this latter meaning is that intended in the ordinance. Such signification is clearly shown in the clause which forbids any person to offer a rolling chair for hire. Only a person possessing the chair can make such an offer. The evidence that the defendant offered on the Board Walk thus to hire his rolling chair was certainly meager and was contradicted, but its effect was a matter to be determined by the trial judge, and we have no power to review his decision on that question of fact; there being sufficient evidence to support his conclusion. Coles v. Blythe, 69 N. J. Law, 666, 55 Atl. 816. The fact that the rolling chair was licensed did not relieve the prosecutor from the prohibitions contained in this ordinance. So far as we are informed, the license merely authorizes the use of such chairs on the Board Walk for carrying passengers. It did not permit that they should be either hired or offered for hire. All the proceedings brought up by these writs should be affirmed, with costs.

The opinion in this case applies to the writs sued out against the city by Solomon Abrams, Abe Adovitz, Moses Effron, Frederick Lieb, and Carrington Rose, and the like judgment must be entered in those cases.

MORWITZ v. ATLANTIC CITY.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 26, 1906.)
MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — ORDINANCES — RIGHT TO QUESTION VALIDITY.

A municipal ordinance which is not entirely void cannot be questioned on certiorari by a person who is not shown to be affected by any of its provisions.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, §§ 255, 257.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari by Bernard Morwitz to review an ordinance of Atlantic City. Dismissed.

Argued November term, 1905, before GAR-RISON, SWAYZE, and DIXON, JJ.

J. J. Crandall, for prosecutor. Harry Wootton, for the city.

DIXON, J. This certiorari brings up for review an ordinance of Atlantic City, approved July 17, 1905, regulating the use of rolling chairs and invalid chairs for carrying passengers on the Board Walk along the ocean in front of the city. The ordinance contains provisions limiting the size of such chairs, requiring their hubs to be covered, prescribing the speed at which, and the parts of the walk in which, they may be propelled, and forbidding their propulsion by persons under 18 years of age. It also ordains that such chairs must be licensed under the mercantile license ordinances of the city.

The reasons assigned for setting aside this ordinance are that the city had no power to prohibit the use of invalid chairs upon the Board Walk or to limit their size. What was said in the case of Harris v. Atlantic City (decided at the present term) 62 Atl. 995, makes it plain that we consider the city empowered to prescribe and enforce at least some of the provisions of this ordinance. We cannot adjudge it to be wholly invalid. Which, if any, of its features affects the prosecutor, the case in hand does not show, and until he is so affected he has no standing to question an ordinance that is not entirely void. Penn. R. R. Co. v. Jersey City, 47 N. J. Law, 286.

This certiorari should be dismissed, with costs.

OAKLEY et ux. v. EMMONS et al.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 26, 1906.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE—ACTIONS—JOINDER.

If the husband sues with his wife, when she neither must nor may be joined, the error is fatal. The result is the same, although the meritorious consideration passed from the wife, unless it also appear that there was an express contract to pay the wife.

2. NEW TRIAL—VERDICT—THEORY OF CASE.

A verdict otherwise liable to reversal cannot be maintained upon a theory of the law contrary to that upon which the case was submitted to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, § 20.]

3. SAME—INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The verdict in this case must have been based upon the finding of an express contract with the wife. The case failing to show evidence sufficient to sustain such finding, the rule to show cause is made absolute, and a new trial is granted.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, §§ 135-149.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Action by Armitage T. Oakley and Annie K., his wife, against John P. Emmons and others. Rule to show cause made absolute.

Argued November term, 1905, before GUM-MERE, C. J., and PITNEY and HENDRICKSON, JJ.

Isaac P. Runyon, for the rule. Williams S. Angleman, opposed.

HENDRICKSON, J. The defendants below seek to set aside the verdict recovered against them at the Union circuit. The plaintiffs sue, as husband and wife, in assumption, the executors of Ellen Gill, deceased, to recover for services rendered to her in her lifetime and during a period of about 10 years preceding her death. She was a widow and lived during this period in a small house in Plainfield, one of three adjoining houses owned by her, one of which was occupied by the plaintiffs as her tenants. The suit was brought on the common counts; the bill of particulars declaring the action was brought to recover the value of services rendered to Mrs. Gill in her lifetime by the plaintiffs. The pleas were generally issued and statute of limitations. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiffs of $3,000.

Among the reasons for a new trial is the refusal to nonsuit or to direct a verdict for the defendants. The defendants invoke the principle declared by the Court of Errors in Garretson v. Appleton, 58 N. J. Law, 386, 37 Atl. 150, that if the husband sues with his wife, when she neither must or may be joined in, error is fatal, and that, although the meritorious consideration passed from the wife, she may not join in the action unless there is also an express contract with her; citing, also, Peterson v. Christianson, 68 N. J. Law, 392, 56 Atl. 288, to the effect that a husband should sue alone for the support in his own household of a third person, though the service consisted largely of the personal attendance of the wife, and contends that there is no evidence showing an express contract with the wife.

The plaintiffs reply in part that, even assuming the fact of misjoinder, the defendant could not now avail himself of this advantage; he having failed to give notice of misjoinder, as required by the practice act. Peterson v. Christianson, supra; Murray v. Pfeiffer, 70 N. J. Law, 768, 59 Atl. 147. We need not now determine what would be the precise effect of the failure to give the statutory notice as applied to the facts in this case upon the question of misjoinder, for we could not maintain the verdict if otherwise liable to reversal upon a theory of the law contrary to that upon which the case was submitted to the jury. Sensfelder v. Stokes, 69 N. J. Law, 86, 54 Atl. 517. Whether it was essential to the plaintiffs' recovery or not in the present case to prove an express promise by the deceased to pay the wife the trial judge so held and so expressly charged the jury.

In this attitude of the case the question is, does the evidence sustain the finding which the verdict must involve that there was an express contract by the deceased to pay Mrs. Oakley for the services? We think it does not. No one is produced who heard the contract or heard any statement by the deceased that such contract existed. The evidence consisted largely of detailed conversations by the testatrix with third parties, to the effect that she highly appreciated the services and attentions of the plaintiffs, and that she intended to compensate the plaintiffs for these services, saying in one or two instances that she would see that they had a home and would remember them in her will. The evidence tended to prove that the services were not gratuitous and might properly support a suit upon an implied promise to pay for the services rendered, but fail to prove the express contract alleged.

We also think that under the proofs the verdict was excessive. The evidence tended to show that until the last three years of her life the testatrix was generally about and able to care for herself, and that in the last three years she had servants to help her much of the time, and that the plaintiffs' services consisted mainly in taking to her a meal occasionally and going for a doctor a few times when needed. The evidence as to how many meals were served and as to how many times Mr. Oakley went for the doctor was exceedingly vague, and there was no attempt to prove the value of the services rendered. It was of undoubted value to the deceased to have an electric bell which she had connecting her room with plaintiff's house so that she might at any hour of the day or night call the plaintiffs if she needed anything, which she occasionally used, but still the verdict was clearly excessive.

So that upon both these grounds the rule must be made absolute, and a new trial granted.

McMANUS v. BOARD OF POLICE COM'RS OF CITY OF NEWARK.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 26, 1906.)
MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—POLICE COMMISSIONERS—QUORUM.

Three members of the board of police commissioners of the city of Newark constitute a quorum of the board, and their united action is valid.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application by Philip McMannus for writ of certiorari to review a dismissal by the police commissioners of the city of Newark. Denied.

Argued November term, 1905, before GARRETSON, REED, and FORT, JJ.

Frank E. Bradner, for applicant. Malcolm MacLear, for defendant.

FORT, J. The applicant for the writ of certiorari in this case was dismissed from the police force of the city of Newark by the board of police commissioners after charges and hearing.

It is first alleged that the notice of the hearing was too short, and that the applicant did not have reasonable time and opportunity to prepare and present his defense. We do not think the facts before us justify such a finding. He had a fair trial. Nor can we agree with the suggestion that the regulation of the police department providing that a member of the police force may be dismissed for entering any building while in uniform, except when in the discharge of duty, is an unreasonable one.

The only matter seriously contended for on this application is that, under the act creating the board of police commissioners of the city of Newark, it is required that all the members shall be present to constitute a legal meeting of the board. It is a sufficient answer to this to say that the statute does not say so. The board is constituted of four members. P. L. 1885, p. 326. It is true that the act does not define how many shall constitute a quorum, but we can see no reason why the usual parliamentary rule should not apply and three make a quorum. Whether a majority of a quorum can act and remove a policeman it is not necessary to determine. It will be time enough to decide that question when it arises. If all the members were present, the concurring action of any three would certainly be sufficient to do any act authorized to be done by the board; and, as no question is raised, on this application, that less than three voted to dismiss the applicant, the legality of his dismissal cannot be questioned.

The writ applied for is denied.

RUPPERT v. ZANG.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 28, 1906.)

1. CHATTEL MORTGAGE—LIEN—PRIORITIES.

Where a mortgagee permits the mortgagor of chattels to retain and use them, authority is impliedly conferred upon the mortgagor to have necessary repairs done upon the chattels; and the lien of an artificer for repairs done under employment by the mortgagor will have priority over the lien of the mortgage, although the latter be duly recorded.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Chattel Mortgages, § 236.]

2. APPEAL—REVIEW.

Upon appeal, this court will not reverse a judgment of the district court that is based upon its conclusion upon a mixed question of law and fact, if the conclusion is legally inferable from the facts proven.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court of Jersey City.

Action by Jacob Ruppert against John Zang. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Argued November term, 1904, before FORT and PITNEY, JJ.

William S. Stuhr, for appellant. Weller & Lichtenstein, for appellee.

PITNEY, J. This was an action of replevin, in which the district court rendered judgment in favor of the defendant. The subject of the action was a wagon, detained by the defendant under claim of an artificer's lien.

The facts are as follows: In July, 1903, the wagon was owned by one Hintze, who carried on a beer bottling business. He gave a chattel mortgage upon the wagon to the plaintiff, Ruppert. The mortgage was promptly recorded. The mortgagor was permitted to retain possession of the wagon, and continued to use it in his business. In September, 1903, it was greatly in need of repair, and was of very little value in its then condition. Hintze, the mortgagor, thereupon took it to the defendant to be repaired, without the knowledge or express consent of the mortgagee. The defendant did certain repair work, for which his charges amounted to $40.15, and he then turned the wagon over to a painter. In the agreed state of facts, it is set forth that it is "the custom of blacksmiths in such cases to attend to the painting." At the time of delivery to the painter, the defendant instructed him not to deliver the wagon to Hintze, since he claimed a lien upon it for the repairs. From the recital concerning the custom of blacksmiths to attend to the painting, and from the averment that the defendant gave instructions to the painter, we infer that the defendant was a blacksmith, and that it was a part of his employment under Hintze to procure the painting to be done necessary to complete the repairs. Indeed, it is tacitly admitted in the brief of counsel for the appellant that the man who did the painting was employed to do it by the defendant, and not by Hintze or by the plaintiff. It appears, however, from the statement of facts, that when the painter had finished his work, the plaintiff gave to him a check for his bill, and he delivered the wagon to Hintze without the knowledge or consent of Zang, the defendant. The wagon was then worth between $125 and $150, and presumably had been much enhanced in value by the work done upon it by Zang. Thereafter, the wagon was in use by Hintze until December 22, 1903, when by virtue of a power of sale contained in the plaintiff's mortgage, one Wise, as his agent, took possession of it, and advertised it for sale, leaving it, however, with Hintze as care-taker until the day of sale, which was set for December 28th. Meanwhile, on December 26th, the wagon again became broken, and Hintze delivered it once more to Zang for repairs, without the knowledge or express consent of the plaintiff, or of his agent, Wise. Zang knew nothing of the proceedings taken towards the sale of the wagon under the mortgage. He did further repairs upon it, for which also he claims an artificer's lien. The sale was held on December 28th, as appointed, at which time the plaintiff purchased the wagon; it being then in the possession of the defendant. Upon refusal by the defendant of the plaintiff's demand for its possession, the present action was brought. The trial court held that the lien of the de defendant had priority over that of the mortgage, and on this ground rendered judgment in favor of the defendant.

The determination of the question of priority in favor of the defendant is a finding upon a mixed question of law and fact. Upon this appeal, limited in scope to questions of law, this court will not reverse a judgment that is based upon such a conclusion, if the conclusion is legally inferable from the facts proven. Burr v. Adams Express Co., 71 N. J. Law, 263, 58 Atl. 609. In White v. Smith, 44 N. J. Law, 105, 43 Am. Rep. 347, where a wife was the owner of a wagon, which she allowed her husband to use in his business, and the wagon was taken by the husband to a wheelwright for necessary repairs, this court held the wheelwright entitled to a lien for his reasonable charges, and denied the wife's right to reclaim the wagon without paying the charges. The decision was based upon the implied authority conferred by the wife upon the husband to have repairs made such as were necessary to keep it in a condition to be useful for the purpose for which it was designed to be used. Manifestly, the like reasoning applied with at least equal force where a mortgagee permits a mortgagor to retain and use a mortgaged chattel. Indeed, the decision in White v. Smith, was rested by this court largely upon the reasoning and authority of the leading English case of Williams v. Allsup, 10 C. B. (N. S.) 417, 30 L. J. C. P. 353, 8 Jur. (N. S.) 57, which case arose between the mortgagee of a steamboat and a shipwright to whom the vessel had been delivered by the mortgagor for necessary repairs. The priority of the lien for repairs was affirmed, on the ground of the implied authority of the mortgagor to have necessary repairs done upon the vessel on the ordinary terms. The distinction between the common-law lien for repairs, and a statutory or conventional lien for agistment or the like, was pointed out by this court in Sullivan v. Clifton, 55 N. J. Law, 324, 26 Atl. 964, 20 L. R. A. 719, 39 Am. St. Rep. 652.

From the facts that appear in the present case, the trial court might legitimately infer that Hintze had authority from the plaintiff to have the repairs done, notwithstanding the particular repairs in question were done without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff. The absence of such consent does not necessarily negative implied general authority. The fact that the plaintiff's mortgage was duly recorded, and he, for that reason, entitled to priority over creditors of the mortgagor, does not preclude the acquisition of a lien by the defendant that has priority over the mortgage. Defendant's lien arises from the act of the plaintiff himself, in conferring authority upon Hintze to have the repairs done. It is argued that the lien for the September repairs was waived by defendant, owing to his giving up possession of the wagon. If he had delivered the wagon to the painter as a person independently employed by Hintze, his own services being completed, the defendant would perhaps have waived the lien. But, as already remarked, the state of the case does not show this, and, on the contrary, is open to the inference that the painting repairs were a part of what was to be done by Zang under his employment by Hintze. We must assume that the trial court drew this inference. Taking it, therefore, that the painter was the employé of the defendant, and not of Hintze, the act of the defendant in turning the wagon over to the painter (his own agent) was not a waiver of his lien. On the contrary, the case clearly shows that at the time the defendant expressly asserted his lien by instructing the painter not to deliver the wagon to Hintze. This being so, the action of the plaintiff, Ruppert, in paying the painter for his services and thereby procuring delivery of the wagon to Hintze without the knowledge or consent of Zang, the defendant, was a virtual fraud upon the latter, and cannot be held to have destroyed his lien, and he was entitled to reassert that lien whenever he could peaceably gain possession of the wagon.

The judgment under review will be affirmed, with costs.

ATLANTIC CITY v. ABBOTT.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—ORDINANCES—REMOVAL OF GARBAGE.

A city ordinance which limits the use of the public streets for the collection and disposition of offal, garbage, or refuse matter, that may become dangerous to the public health, to the duly authorized contractor of the city, is valid as an exercise of police power, if passed in good faith to safeguard the public health.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari by the state, on the prosecution of William M. Abbott, to review a conviction for the violation of an ordinance of Atlantic City. Affirmed.

Argued November term, 1905, before DIXON, GARRISON, and SWAYZE, JJ.

Harry Wootton, for Atlantic City. Bourgeois & Sooy, for the prosecutor.

SWAYZE, J. The prosecutor was convicted of the violation of an ordinance of Atlantic City which prohibited any one except the duly authorized contractor of Atlantic City from using the streets for the purpose of collecting or disposition of offal, garbage, or refuse matter that might become dangerous to the public health. The ordinance contained regulations as to the time of removal of garbage, and its conveyance to the disposal plant of the contractor, or such other place within the city limits as might be designated by the sanitary committee. It prescribed the character of the conveyance to be used, and provided that no garbage should be spilled or left on the ground, and that the conveyances should not be filled above a certain level, and should be kept covered, cleansed, and disinfected so that they might not become dangerous to the public health. The prosecutor was not the duly authorized contractor of the city, and the evidence justified his conviction of a violation of the ordinance.

The city is authorized by section 14 of the act of 1902 (P. L. 1902, p. 284) to provide for the collection and disposition of offal, garbage, wastes, and all refuse matter which may become dangerous to the public health. The ordinance in question is clearly an attempt to exercise this power, and the question discussed at the argument and in the briefs is whether it is a reasonable exercise of power in view of the provisions of our state and federal Constitutions. It is said to be unreasonable because it limits the right of removal to the duly authorized contractor, and the place of disposition to the city limits, and to be in violation of the Constitution because it deprives the owner of the garbage of his property without compensation.

The disposition of garbage is a matter of prime importance to the public health, and justifies careful inspection and regulation on the part of the public authorities, in order to secure its prompt removal and disposition at seasonable hours, and under such conditions that the danger of scattering offensive matter in the streets may be reduced to a minimum. These objects can be more readily secured if the matter is under the exclusive control of the city. The time and frequency of collection, the method of conveyance, and the method and place of final disposition of the refuse, are all important, and proper control can only be secured by close and careful inspection, which becomes more and more difficult as the number of places and persons to be watched increases. It is not sufficient that the method of collecting and carting should be harmless, and involve no menace to health by the use of the streets. It is necessary, also, that the refuse should be finally disposed of in such a way that the public authorities may be assured that it will be innocuous. To accomplish that purpose, they may adopt any reasonable plan of disposition, provided they act in good faith for the protection of the public health, and not in an arbitrary manner. We see no reason in the present case to doubt that the ordinance was passed in good faith, and, although it creates an exclusive right, we cannot say that this is not the result of an attempt to safeguard the public health by means which are reasonable and bear a real and substantial relation to the end to be accomplished—the final disposition of the refuse matter.

In Nicoulin v. Lowery, 49 N. J. Law, 391, 8 Atl. 513, the charge was that the defendant in the nighttime carted, carried, and took into and within the limits of the township a load of night soil. It was said that the complaint, although it used the words of the ordinance, was defective in not charging facts to show an offense within the spirit and meaning of the law; but all that the case really decided was that the defendant ought to have taken an appeal to the court of common pleas, and that for his failure to do so the certiorari ought to be dismissed. The remark that the ordinance would be held unreasonable if its penalties were sought to be enforced against any one making a use of the public streets which was harmless in fact was obiter, and was accompanied by the statement that it might be adjudged reasonable when applied to another state of facts; citing Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Jersey City, 47 N. J. Law, 286. In the present case the defendant was in the employ of one Steelman, who resided at Bargaintown and raised hogs. The inference is, and it is so said in the prosecutor's brief, that he was collecting garbage and conveying it to Bargaintown to feed his hogs. In view of the importance to public health of a populous city like Atlantic City attending to the final disposition of garbage, we think this ordinance cannot be held unreasonable for limiting the final disposition to the territorial limits of the municipality, at least as applied to the state of facts presented by the case.

It is argued, further, that the ordinance takes private property without compensation, because it deprives the owners of the garbage of the privilege of selling it and the purchasers of the privilege of using it. The defendant is neither owner nor purchaser, but only an employé of the purchaser. Whether he is in a position to raise this objection need not be considered, since we think the ordinance is not objectionable as taking private property without compensation. In City of Passaic v. Paterson Bill Posting Co., 71 N. J. Law, 75, 58 Atl. 343, Mr. Justice Van Syckel said: "The true rule to be extracted from the cases, and the one abundantly supported by them, is that, when statutes are obviously intended to provide for the public safety and the ordinances prescribed under them are reasonable and in compliance with their purposes, both the statutes and the ordinances are lawful and must be given due effect." This statement of the law was approved by the Court of Errors and Appeals. 62 Atl. 268. We have already stated our reasons for holding the regulation now in question reasonably necessary. This view is supported by the authorities. Weller v. Snover, 42 N. J. Law, 341; Shivers v. Newton, 45 N. J. Law, 469. Newark & South Orange Horse Car Railway Co. v. Hunt, 50 N. J. Law, 308, 12 Atl. 697, are cases in which the taking of private property was sustained as an exercise of the police power. More immediately in point are two cases decided since the argument of the present case by the Supreme Court of the United States. California Reduction Co. v. Sanitary Reduction Works of San Francisco (November 27, 1905) 199 U. S. 306, 26 Sup. Ct. 100, 50 L. Ed. —. Gardner v. Michigan (November 27, 1905) 199 U. S. 325, 26 Sup. Ct. 106, 50 L. Ed. —. In the first case the city ordinances gave the contractor an exclusive right to cremate the garbage, and required that it should be delivered at the crematory at the expense of the person conveying it. In the second case the court considered the validity of an ordinance of Detroit very similar to the ordinance of Atlantic City now in question. In both cases, the ordinances were sustained as a valid exercise of the police power.

The conviction should be affirmed, with costs.

PERRY v. MARTIN.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 26, 1906.)

COSTS — COMMITMENT TO REFORMATORY — HOLDING BEYOND TERM FOR PAYMENT.

A person committed to the New Jersey Reformatory, under a sentence authorized by the act for the management of that institution, approved March 21, 1901 (P. L. 1901, p. 231), cannot be held therein beyond the maximum term of imprisonment, which the statute fixes as the penalty for the crime for which he was convicted. He cannot be held beyond such period under such a sentence until the costs are paid.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 13, Cent. Dig. Costs, § 1202.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Petition of William E. Perry for writ of habeas corpus to Joseph W. Martin, superintendent of the New Jersey Reformatory. Order of discharge granted.

Argued November term, 1905, before GARRETSON, REED, and FORT, JJ.

Henry Marell, for petitioner. Edward D. Duffield, for respondent.

FORT, J. William Perry, the son of the petitioner, is confined in the New Jersey Reformatory under a sentence for larceny. The record of the sentence as certified is this: "The said defendant being placed at the bar for sentence, the court do order and adjudge that the said defendant do be confined in the New Jersey Reformatory as provided by law." This sentence was imposed December 20, 1901. Shortly after such sentence Perry was taken to the reformatory where he remained until May 24, 1904, when he was released on parole. He broke his parole on June 11, 1904, and was rearrested and brought back to the reformatory March 4, 1905, where he has since remained.

Larceny by our crimes act is made a misdemeanor for which the maximum penalty by way of imprisonment is three years. P. L. 1898, p. 854, § 218. The only act providing for commitments to the reformatory is that of March 21, 1901 (P. L. 1901, p. 231). The act approved March 28, 1895, was repealed by the act approved March 21, 1901 (P. L. 1901, p. 238). By the act of March 21, 1901 (P. L. p. 236, § 9), it is enacted as follows: "The courts in sentencing to the reformatory shall not fix or limit the duration of sentence, but it shall not in any case exceed the maximum term provided by law for the crime for which the prisoner was convicted and sentenced, and may be terminated by the managers of the reformatory as herein provided." P. L. 1901, p. 236, § 9. The sentence imposed in this case, above quoted from the record, seems to be in strict conformity with this act. The fact that Perry has served the full three years is not questioned, but it is claimed that the authorities at the reformatory may hold him until the costs are paid. There is no authority for this under sentence imposed under the act of March 21, 1901, supra. Persons sentenced under that act can only be held for the maximum term provided by law for the offense of which they were convicted. The maximum term here means the term of imprisonment specifically specified in the statute. Upon sentences under the act of March 21, 1901, there is no authority for a judgment that the prisoner be held for the maximum term fixed by statute and until the costs are paid. The judgment of the court simply is that "the defendant be confined in the New Jersey Reformatory as provided by law," and the statute says that the term of confinement shall not in any case exceed the maximum term provided by law. That means the maximum term of imprisonment authorized to be imposed by the statute, and named in the statute as the penalty for the offense. We cannot import into these plain words of the statute an additional term to cover the working out of costs if there be costs remaining unpaid.

There was also a further contention in this case that the prisoner could be held, because the indictment under which he was convicted contained two counts, one for larceny and the other for receiving, and that there was a general verdict of guilty; and, hence, under it, the court could have sentenced the defendant to three years' imprisonment on each count and made the one sentence to begin after the other had terminated. The contention being that under the reformatory act the limit of the duration of the sentence to the reformatory is "the maximum term provided by law for the crime for which the prisoner is convicted," and that the maximum in this case could be six years. This would be a strained construction. Penal statutes are to be construed strictly. Conceding that it is within the power of the court to impose consecutive sentences, still that will not authorize the managers of this institution to hold the defendant as if such sentences had been imposed or because the court might have done so if the defendant had been sentenced to some other institution and a definite term fixed in the sentence by the court. Where it is not a part of the judgment of the court that one sentence shall begin after the other terminates, all sentences, even on separate convictions, run concurrently. To make it possible for one sentence to begin after another ends there must be a judgment of a court. But, if this were not so, still upon the indictment in this case a sentence could not have been imposed upon each count. The facts before us show, it is true, that the indictment contained one count for larceny and another for receiving, but the proof in the case was that the defendant stole the articles in question. The same person cannot be both thief and the receiver in a criminal sense. In order to constitute the crime of receiving stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen, there must be a thief and a receiver. The statute never contemplated that the thief could be guilty of receiving stolen goods from himself.

On the return there appears to be no justification for the further detention of William Perry, and an order will be made for his discharge.

STOKES et al. v. HARDY.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 26, 1906.)

1. CERTIORARI—REMAND—PROCEDURE BELOW.

When the record of a cause removed from the common pleas to the Supreme Court by certiorari has been actually remitted by the Supreme Court to the common pleas for further proceedings, the latter court has authority to proceed therein, even though the formal order to remit has not been filed with its clerk.

2. ASSIGNMENTS FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—FILING.

The file mark of the clerk of the court will not countervail a recital by the court itself as to the filing of the paper upon which the order containing the recital is based.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari by Thomas Stokes and others against Albert Hardy, to review an order discharging defendant as an insolvent debtor. Affirmed.

Argued November term, 1905, before GARRISON, SWAYZE, and DIXON, JJ.

Freeman Woodbridge, for prosecutor.

DIXON, J. The certiorari in this case brings up an order of the Middlesex common pleas made April 25, 1905, discharging the defendant as an insolvent debtor under the proceedings of that court which had been reviewed by the Court of Errors in Stokes v. Hardy, 60 Atl. 403. The proceedings then before the Court of Errors were those leading up to and including an order for the discharge of the debtor, and the remittitur which came to the common pleas from the Supreme Court in pursuance of the judgment of the Court of Errors declared that all of those proceedings should be affirmed, except so much as discharged the defendant from imprisonment, and directed that so much of said order should be reversed and the record remitted to the common pleas to be proceeded on according to law. According to that judgment, as explained by the opinion of the court in 60 Atl. 404, the only illegality in the proceedings of the common pleas was in discharging the debtor before he had made due assignment of his property. The affirmance of the other proceedings required such discharge to be ordered when due assignment was made.

In view of this remittitur the first nine reasons and the fourteenth reason now presented for the reversal of the present order are precluded by the judgment of the court of last resort. The tenth reason assigned for reversal is that the remittitur had not been filed in the court of common pleas when the order for discharge was made. The only evidence of this is the file mark of the clerk of the common pleas. The order of the court recites that the record had been previously remitted from the Supreme Court to the common pleas, and this record was sufficient to enable the common pleas to proceed, even though the remittitur itself had not been filed with its clerk. The eleventh reason is that the order for the debtor's discharge was not filed within the time required by law or the rules of the court. We know of no law or rule of the common pleas to support this reason. The twelfth reason is that the assignment executed by the debtor was not filed with the clerk before the making of the order for his discharge. The insolvent debtors' act (Gen. St. p. 1728, § 11) directs that, on making the assignment and filing it in the clerk's office, the court may by writing under their hands and seals direct the discharge of the debtor. No such writing appears in the present case. But the Court of Errors in the opinion above mentioned seems to have regarded an order to discharge entered in the minutes as the legal equivalent. The order now before us recites that the assignment had been previously filed by the clerk, and we cannot regard the file mark of the clerk as countervailing this declaration of the court itself. That mark is not essential to the filing, which is complete when the paper is properly deposited with the clerk (Hunter v. Caldwell, 10 Q. & B. 69), and the file mark is only presumptive evidence of the date of filing (8 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 927). The thirteenth reason is because the affidavit of the assignee to the assignment was taken before the attorney of the debtor. Section 22 of the insolvent debtors' act requires this oath to be taken immediately after the assignment is made, but it is not an essential preliminary to the order for discharge.

We find no sufficient reason for the reversal of the order, and it is affirmed, with costs.

GOTTLLOB et ux. v. NORTH JERSEY ST. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 26, 1906.)

CARRIERS — INJURY TO PASSENGER — QUESTION FOR JURY.

When it is reasonably inferable from the facts proven in the cause that the passenger was injured through some act or omission of the carrier's servant, which might have been prevented by the exercise of a high degree of care, there the question of the carrier's negligence is for the jury.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court of Newark.

Action by Henry J. Gottlob and wife against the North Jersey Street Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Argued November term, 1905, before GARRETTSON, REED, and FORT, JJ.

Joseph A. Beecher, for appellants. Hobart Tuttle, for appellee.

FORT, J. In this case there was a direction by the trial court of a verdict for the defendant. In this we think there was error. The agreed case, certified by the court, shows that the appellants were passengers on an open trolley car of the defendants. That as this car approached the west side of Market street in Newark, coming southerly on Washington street, it stopped at the cross-walk for passengers to board or alight. That persons got on the car as it stopped, or was coming to a stop. That the plaintiff Ellen N. Gottlob, after the bell had been given to stop, arose and placed herself by the side of the car, and took hold of the uprights, to await the stopping of the car, to alight. The plaintiff's proof showed that while in this position, and either before the car fully stopped or after it had stopped, and before she had alighted, or even stepped to the running board for that purpose, the car was suddenly started with a lurch or jerk, or with such force as to release her hold, and throw her clear of the car to the stone pavement, whereby she was injured. Testimony as to the lurch or jerk, or great force in the movement of the car, was made by several passengers who stated they were thrown from their feet and back into their seats, and the hat of one passenger on the platform was lifted from his head and thrown to the street. The defense was that the car did stop at the crossing, and that two passengers boarded the car and that the motorman then started the car at a moderate speed, and that it was moving at the time Mrs. Gottlob got off, and that the car was not stopped until it reached the other crossing where it again stopped; and that there was no lurch or jerk of the car. There is nothing in the state of the case certified to show that the motorman got a bell to start the car after the two passengers boarded it at the crossing at which Mrs. Gottlob intended to get off. Where the conductor was or what he was doing does not appear. This seems significant.

On this state of facts a motion to direct a verdict for the defendant was made and granted. The district court placed the granting of this motion on the case of Faul v. North Jersey Street Railway Company, 70 N. J. Law, 795, 59 Atl. 148. But that case does not sustain the court in our view. This case is rather within the principle stated in Whalen v. Consolidated Traction Company, 61 N. J. Law, 606, 40 Atl. 645, 41 L. R. A. 836, 68 Am. St. Rep. 723, so far as the defendant is concerned. In view of the fact that the car was signalled to stop, and that Mrs. Gottlob and others were preparing to alight, and that the car was started after it stopped and after two persons had boarded it, as the defendant's evidence showed, and of the further fact that it would appear that the motorman started the car before the passengers, indicating a purpose to alight, had opportunity to do so, and apparently without the conductor giving any bell for the car to start, we think the negligence of the defendant's servants in operating the car was for the jury, as was also the contributory negligence of Mrs. Gottlob in what she did in preparing to alight.

The judgment of the district court is reversed, and a new trial granted.

MAYOR, ETC., OF CITY OF NEWARK v. NORTH JERSEY ST. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 26, 1906.)

MANDAMUS—STREET RAILROADS—TRANSFERS TO PASSENGERS.

A writ of mandamus should not issue at the instance of a municipal corporation to compel a street railway company to give transfers to its passengers within the municipality, when the obligations of the company to do so arises wholly from its assent to certain municipal ordinances which, of themselves, have no legislative force.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application by the mayor and council of the city of Newark for writ of mandamus against the North Jersey Street Railway Company. Rule discharged.

Argued November term, 1905, before GARRISON, SWAYZE, and DIXON, JJ.

Malcolm MacLear, for plaintiff. Frank Bergen, for defendant.

DIXON, J. The city of Newark has a rule requiring the North Jersey Street Railway Company to show cause why a mandamus should not issue to compel the company to give transfers to its passengers within the city under certain circumstances in which the company denies its obligation to do so, and this rule is now before us for consideration.

The claim of the city is based upon its construction of the municipal ordinances. We have not been able to find that these ordinances possess any legislative force with regard to the matter now in dispute, viz., the fare which the company may collect for transportation. Their efficacy is derived wholly from the assent of the company thereto, given as a condition on which certain privileges were granted by the city. These ordinances and the assent constituted a contract. Jersey City v. J. C. & B. Ry. Co., 70 N. J. Law, 360, 57 Atl. 445. The benefits of this contract are to be enjoyed, not by the city in its corporate capacity, but by the individual passenger within the city limits. The rights thus created are essentially private, and their denial may be made the subject of a private action. Prac. Act (P. L. 1903, p. 537) § 28. Mandamus is not the appropriate remedy for enforcing private rights growing out of contract. Rosenfield v. Einstein, 46 N. J. Law, 479, and authorities there cited. The case of Wilbur v. Trenton Pass. Ry. Co., 57 N. J. Law, 212, 81 Atl. 238, was quite different. There the defendant, having the right to place railway tracks in the borough streets, had laid rails which were unfit and impaired the use of the streets for general purposes. A mandamus was awarded to compel the defendant to remove those rails and to substitute such as were suitable. The writ was warranted on the principle that the defendant was bound by the common law not to obstruct the highway and to exercise its privilege in a proper manner. Felders v. North Jersey St. Ry. Co., 68 N. J. Law, 843, 846, 53 Atl. 404, 54 Atl. 822, 59 L. R. A. 455, 96 Am. St. Rep. 552. The duty was independent of contract.

The present rule must be discharged.

TREEFTZ v. BOARD OF EXCISE COM'RS OF CITY OF LAMBERT-VILLE et al.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 26, 1906.)
INTOXICATING LIQUORS — TRANSFER OF LI-CENSE—VALIDITY.

A resolution of a board of excise commissioners transferring a liquor license to one of its members who was present and voted for the resolution is voidable upon certiorari.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari by the state, on the prosecution of David Treeftz, against the board of excise commissioners of the city of Lambertville and Eugene M. Beaumont to review a resolution of the board. Resolution set aside.

Argued February term, 1906, before GARRISON, GARRETSON, and SWAYZE, JJ.

John H. Backes, for the prosecutor.

GARRISON, J. This writ brings up a resolution of the board of excise commissioners of the city of Lambertville transferring a liquor license to the defendant Eugene M. Beaumont, one of the members of the board.

At the meeting at which the resolution was adopted five members of the board were present and voted upon the resolution, three for and two against its adoption; the transferee being one of the three. This statement is sufficient to condemn the resolution, which, inasmuch as it did not lay down a general rule, but, on the contrary, granted a special privilege, was in its nature judicial as distinguished from legislative. Traction Co. v. Board of Public Works, 56 N. J. Law, 431, 29 Atl. 163.

In the case cited an ordinance of a municipal board was set aside because one of its voting members was a stockholder in the corporation to which a special privilege was granted by the ordinance, although the vote of such member was not needed to pass the ordinance. A fortiori must the same result follow when the voting member is the person actually benefited by a resolution to the adoption of which his vote was necessary.

The resolution is set aside, with costs.

CORISH v. NORTH JERSEY ST. RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 26, 1906.)
DAMAGES—PERSONAL INJURIES—MITIGATION.

In actions for personal injuries damages are not mitigated by insurance paid to the plaintiff under a contract to which the tortfeasor was a stranger.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Damages, § 113.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Action by John J. Corish against the North Jersey Street Railway Company. Verdict for plaintiff. Rule to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside as inadequate. Rule made absolute.

Argued November term, 1905, before DIXON, GARRISON, and SWAYZE, JJ.

Louis Hood, for the rule. Hobart Tuttle, opposed.

GARRISON, J. By this rule to show cause the plaintiff seeks to set aside a verdict recovered by him upon the ground that the damages are inadequate. The action was for personal injuries. The verdict was for $250. The jury was instructed that the testimony showed that, in expenses and earnings, the plaintiff had lost $390 as a result of his injuries. The charge then proceeded as follows:

"But his injury produced some benefit to him; that is, he got a chance to call on the insurance company to pay him $8 a week, which was their contract in case he should receive harm, or meet with an accident while at work, I suppose. At any rate, he got $88 from the insurance company; so that he lost actually in the neighborhood of $310. From $300 to $325, between those figures, is the amount he is actually out, by reason of this accident, so far as expenditures and loss of earnings are concerned."

This instruction, by which the jury was permitted to give to the defendant the benefit of the plaintiff's insurance, was erroneous.

The fund out of which such payments were made was created in part by the plaintiff's contributions made under a contract with strangers to the defendant and the tort-feasor was no more entitled to be credited with the sums repaid to the plaintiff under such contracts, than it would be to his withdrawal of his accumulations in a savings bank.

The principle is settled for this court by the opinion in Weber v. Morris & Essex Railroad Company, 36 N. J. Law, 213, where Chief Justice Beasley says: "A person committing a tort cannot set up in mitigation of damages that somebody else, with whom he has no connection, has either in whole or in part indemnified the party injured."

The rule to show cause is made absolute.

MORRIS v. CITY OF NEWARK.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. March 5, 1906.)

1. STATUTES—VALIDITY—DETERMINATION.

Whether a public law is invalid, upon the ground that it was approved by the Governor after final adjournment of the Legislature, is not to be decided upon the stipulation of parties as to the facts upon which such claim of invalidity is based.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Statutes, § 53.]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN — TAKING LAND FOR STREETS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The act of March 24, 1892 (P. L. p. 255), providing for permanent commissioners of assessment in cities of the first class, applies to an assessment of damages for the taking of land for a public street in the city of Newark, and is not rendered inapplicable to that city by the passage of the general condemnation act of 1900 (P. L. p. 79); the charter of the city of Newark bringing that municipality within the exception contained in the 17th section (page 86) of the later statute.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari by the state, on the prosecution of Benjamin Morris, to review an assessment for the taking of lands for a public street by the city of Newark. Affirmed.

Argued November term, 1905, before DIXON, GARRISON, and SWAYZE, JJ.

Pitney & Hardin, for prosecutor. Malcolm MacLear, for defendant.

GARRISON, J. This writ brings up an assessment of the damages sustained by the prosecutor by reason of the taking of his lands for a public street by the city of Newark. The assessment was made by the persons appointed by the mayor of said city to constitute the permanent commissioners of assessment provided for by the act of March 24, 1892 (P. L. p. 255).

This statute the prosecutor claims was not enacted in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution touching the approval of bills, for the reason that the bill in this case received the approval of the Governor after the final adjournment of the Legislature. The contention is that the Constitution of this state confers no power upon the Governor after the final adjournment of the Legislature to approve bills left in his hands, and hence that such approval does not make them laws.

The great importance of this question justifies the extended consideration given to it by counsel who have treated it as presented for judicial determination by the fourth reason filed by the prosecutor for the reversal of this assessment supported by a stipulation as to an agreed state of facts.

The reason and stipulation thus referred to undoubtedly present the constitutional question; but a preliminary inquiry is whether upon such a stipulation which is a mere admission of the parties this court will adjudge that a public statute, prima facie one of the laws of the state, was not enacted in compliance with the Constitution, to the end that such statute may be declared to be invalid. To this inquiry the case of Freeholders of Passaic v. Stevenson, 46 N. J. Law, 178, affords a conclusive answer.

The question in that case was whether the public notice of the intention to apply for the passage of a special law had been given in compliance with the requirements of the Constitution. In the opinion delivered for the Court of Errors and Appeals Mr. Justice Van Syckel said: "The publication of an act in the pamphlet laws is prima facie evidence that legal notice was given. The only counter evidence in this case is the admission of the parties that no notice was given. Courts cannot act upon such admissions in determining the constitutionality of statutes."

The statement of this judicial rule by the court of last resort effectually disposes of the present controversy so far as the constitutionality of this enactment is concerned. This result renders it unnecessary to consider the larger question as to the conclusive effect of the enrollment of a statute passed upon in Pangborn v. Young, 32 N. J. Law, 29, and the other cases that have since followed it.

With respect to the questions of statutory construction presented by the reasons, the prosecutor contends in the first place that the word "assessment," in the title of the act of 1892, means ascertainment of benefits only, and hence is not broad enough to support the enactment authorizing the assessment of damages as well as benefits. We see no reason why this purely arbitrary distinction should be made for the purpose of frustrating the plain object of the act.

A further contention is that the act of March 24, 1892, has been repealed by the general condemnation act of 1900 (page 79) and is not saved as to the city of Newark by the seventeenth section (page 86) of that act, which excepts from the practice prescribed by it the taking of land for a public improvement where the award for damages is authorized by statute to be offset by benefits. Two points are made in support of this contention: (1) That it is the practice only, and not the procedure, that is excepted by this section; and (2) that the present assessment is for damages alone. As to the first point, we think "practice" was used by the Legislature as synonymous with procedure, and hence includes the tribunal as well as the conduct of matters before it. As to the other point, our conclusion is that the exception deals with statutory classes and not with individual cases, and hence is satisfied by the statutory authority to offset benefits against damages contained in the charter of the defendant. Manufacturers' Land & Improvement Company v. Camden (N. J. Sup.) 59 Atl. 1.

It is, however, further claimed that the seventeenth section of the general condemnation act of 1900 is itself unconstitutional, in that the classification upon which its proviso rests, namely, the authority to offset benefits against damages, is not based upon identical provisions to this end in the charters of the several cities that constitute the excepted group. This contention is not tenable. The end to which the several charter provisions tend is identical, namely, the authority to offset benefits against damages, which is the substantial feature of the classification; hence, if the proviso of the seventeenth section exclude no city whose charter contains this grant, it is general both in form and effect, notwithstanding the details of procedure by which this end is attained may be variant.

Finding no illegality in this assessment for any of the reasons urged, the report of the commissioners is in all respects affirmed, with costs.

KING v. MORRIS.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 26, 1906.)

1. PLEADING — DEMURRER — MISJOINDER OF CAUSES.

A general demurrer to a declaration containing a count in replevin and counts in trover, for misjoinder of causes of action, is good.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, § 503.]

2. SAME—ABANDONMENT OF COUNT.

After a general demurrer to a declaration for misjoinder, the plaintiff cannot obviate the objection by abandoning one of the counts.

3. REPLEVIN—PLEADING—COUNT IN TROVER.

It is not permissible to declare in trover, where the action is in replevin.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Camden County.

Action by Charles S. King against Artemisia Morris. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Argued November term, 1905, before DIXON, GARRISON, and SWAYZE, JJ.

George M. Bacon and G. Dore Cogswell, for plaintiff in error. Wilson, Carr & Stackhouse, for defendant in error.

SWAYZE, J. This was an action of replevin. After issue joined, the plaintiff applied for and was granted leave to amend by inserting counts in trover. To the whole declaration as amended the defendant demurred for misjoinder of causes of action. The plaintiff thereupon gave notice of a motion to strike out the demurrer as irregular and defective, and so framed as to prejudice, embarrass, and delay a fair trial of the action. The demurrer was stricken out, the defendant excepted, and the order was entered on the record, and error is now assigned pursuant to section 110 of the practice act (P. L. 1903, p. 569).

The order was erroneous. There was a misjoinder of causes of action. The object of a suit in replevin is to recover the specific property; of a suit in trover, to recover damages for the conversion. The pleas and the subsequent proceedings are altogether different. Such an objection is available upon a demurrer to the whole declaration. Green v. Morris & Essex R. R. Co., 24 N. J. Law, 486; American Linen Thread Co. v. Sheldon, 81 N. J. Law, 420; Dale Manufacturing Co. v. Grant, 84 N. J. Law, 138; McDermott v. Morris Canal & Banking Co., 88 N. J. Law, 53; Wilkins v. Standard Oil Co., 71 N. J. Law, 399, 59 Atl. 14. An attempt was made to cure this difficulty at the trial by abandoning the count in replevin. It was too late, after a demurrer for misjoinder. 1 Chitty on Pleading (14th Am. Ed.) 206; Drummond v. Dorant, 4 Term Reports, 360. The insuperable difficulty in the way of the plaintiff was that his action was in replevin. It would be incongruous to seek to recover in the same suit the specific property and also damages for conversion, satisfaction of which would pass the title to the defendant. Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Skillman, 52 N. J. Law, 263, 19 Atl. 260. The seventeenth rule of this court expressly excepts the action of replevin from those actions ex delicto which are now styled "actions of tort." In an action of replevin, counts in trover would be bad on demurrer. The New Jersey cases in point are cited in Wilkins v. Standard Oil Co., 71 N. J. Law, 399, 59 Atl. 14.

The judgment must be reversed, and judgment should be entered for the defendant upon the demurrer, unless this court allows the plaintiff to amend.

STATE v. GOLDSTEIN.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 28, 1906.)

1. OBSCENITY—INDECENT EXPOSURE—PUBLIC PLACE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

On a trial for indecent exposure, the evidence showed that the exposure was made in a store of accused in the presence of a girl 15 years old, who had gone there to purchase goods. In the front part of the store there were plate glass windows about three feet above the sidewalk. Double doors made largely of glass opened from the store into the street. Held, that the store was as a matter of law a public place.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Obscenity, § 3.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—COMPARISON OF HANDWRITING—COMPETENCY OF WITNESS.

A witness who has had correspondence with another concerning business transactions is competent to give his opinion on the issue of the genuineness of a writing alleged to have been written by the latter, though he never saw the latter write.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1055, 1066; vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, §§ 2210, 2211.]

Error to Court of Quarter Sessions, Morris County.

Max Goldstein was convicted of indecently exposing his person in a public place, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Argued February term, 1905, before GUMMERE, C. J., and FORT, GARRETSON, and PITNEY, JJ.

Willard W. Cutler, for plaintiff in error.
Charles A. Rathbun, for the State.

GUMMERE, C. J. The defendant was indicted for and convicted of the crime of indecently exposing his person in a public place. The exposure was made in the grocery store of the defendant in the town of Butler, on the 29th day of August, 1903, in the presence of one E. B., a girl about 15 years old, who had gone there to purchase goods. It appeared from testimony submitted on the part of the defendant that, in the front of the store, were two plate glass windows, 4 feet and 10 inches in width, and 6 feet in height, and a third one 3 feet 6 inches in width and 6 feet in height, and that the bottom of each of these three windows was about 3 feet above the sidewalk. It further appeared that there were double doors opening from the store into the street; that the lower part of those doors, to a point about three feet above the sidewalk, was made of wood, and that the remaining portions thereof were of glass.

According to the law of this offense, the place where it is committed is a public one. If the exposure be such that it is likely to be seen by a number of casual observers. Van Houten v. State, 46 N. J. Law, 17, 50 Am. Rep. 397. That a store to which the public is invited for the purpose of trading, and the interior of which may readily be seen by people passing by along the street, is such a place, seems to us not a matter of doubt; and consequently an instruction by the court to the jury to that effect is not erroneous. Van Houten v. State, supra. The assignment of error, therefore, which is based upon the assumption that the trial judge should have left it to the jury to determine whether or not the place where the exposure was alleged to have been made was a public one, must fail.

The defendant, being called as a witness in his own behalf, denied having committed the offense charged against him, and, for the purpose of substantiating that denial, testified that, during the latter part of August, 1903, and particularly on the 29th day of that month, he was engaged in moving his business from a store occupied by him in a building in Butler, belonging to the Noble estate, into the store in which the indecent exposure was said to have taken place; and that during all of that time, whether he was at the one place or the other, he was never alone, some of his employes being always present at each of the two stores. In order to break the force of this testimony the prosecutor of the pleas, on cross-examination of the defendant, exhibited to him a letter addressed to the executor of the Noble estate, and signed "Max Goldstein," the body of which contained a statement that his (Goldstein's) tenancy had expired on the first of August, and referred to the fact that a check was inclosed in settlement of the rent due to that date, and asked him if the signature to the letter was not in his handwriting. The defendant denied that it was, or that the letter had been written by his authority. After the close of the defendant's case the state called Mr. Hinchman, the executor of the Noble estate, as a witness, and he testified that the defendant had been a tenant of the estate for nearly three years, and that during all of that period a business correspondence had been carried on between himself and the defendant; letters passing between them at least as frequently as once a month on the average. The letter which had been exhibited to the defendant, being then shown the witness, he expressed the opinion that it was in the latter's handwriting. Counsel for the defendant interposed an objection to the witness being permitted to express an opinion as to the authenticity of the letter, on the ground that his testimony failed to show that he had ever seen the defendant write, or that he knew that the letters which he had received during Goldstein's tenancy were written by him; and error is assigned upon the overruling of the objection. Except for the fact that counsel has earnestly contended before us that this testimony was improperly admitted, we should consider the assignment so frivolous as not to be entitled to specific mention. A reference to any text-book in which this subject is discussed will disclose that it is universally admitted that a witness, who has a proper knowledge of a party's handwriting, may declare his belief in regard to the genuineness of a writing which is in question; and that such knowledge may be acquired, not only by having seen him write, but also by having had correspondence with him concerning business or other matters transacted between them. In West v. State, 22 N. J. Law, 212, the rule is thus tersely stated: "To prove handwriting, in general, a witness must know it by having seen the person write, or by having corresponded with him."

Two other errors are assigned, one of which challenges the legality of a question asked of the defendant on his cross-examination, with relation to the date of the last payment of rent made by him to the Noble estate, and the other of which is directed at the refusal of the trial court to quash the indictment because, as alleged, it failed to aver that the offense charged against the defendant was committed in a public place. These assignments were not strongly pressed before us upon the argument as affording ground for reversal, and our examination of the case leads us to the conclusion that the question objected to was properly admitted, and that the indictment sufficiently avers that the exposure of his person by the defendant was made in a public place.

The conviction under review should be affirmed.

STATE v. NEWMAN.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 26, 1906.)

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY—SIMILAR OFFENSES.

The defendant was convicted of embezzlement as a chosen freeholder in selling second-hand bridge plank to one Mahler for the sum of $4.50 and applying the proceeds to his own use. The defense offered was that there was no sale and no money paid, but a permission to take only. The state proved that Mahler bought the plank for an organized club, and called as a witness the secretary and treasurer of the club, who was permitted to testify, over objection, to a conversation with Mahler to the effect that Mahler had paid for the plank and had received a credit for the price upon his dues as a member of the club. The defendant was not present at the conversation nor connected by any proof with the transaction testified about. Held, on review, that the evidence admitted was hearsay and irrelevant, and its admission was error. The admission of the evidence of one Purdy that he had on another occasion bought plank from the defendant and out of the same lot, over objection, was also error.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Court of Quarter Sessions, Passaic County.

Charles H. Newman was convicted of embezzlement, and brings error. Reversed.

Argued November term, 1905, before GUMMERE, C. J., and PITNEY and HENDRICKSON, JJ.

Wood McKee, Munson Force, and Michael Dunn, for plaintiff in error. Eugene Emley, for the State.

HENDRICKSON, J. The defendant below was convicted at the Passaic sessions upon an indictment charging him with embezzlement as a public officer, to wit, a member of the board of chosen freeholders of the county of Passaic, and brings error. The particulars of the charge are that, having in his care and custody as such member 18 oak plank of the value of $5, the property of said board, the defendant fraudulently took and embezzled the same to his own use with intent to cheat and defraud the said board, etc.

One of the errors complained of was the admission of illegal evidence. The state called as a witness one Mahler, who testified that he bought these plank of the defendant and paid him $4.50 for the same, and further proved that the defendant had not accounted or paid to the county any part of the money thus alleged to have been received by him. Mahler further testified for the state that he purchased the plank for the purpose of repairing the piazza of the clubhouse of the Mohawk Outing Club, of which he was a member, and in order to further support the allegation of sale by the defendant and the latter's receipt of the money therefor, the state called one Schmitt as a witness, who testified that he was a member of the club and its secretary and treasurer, and he was permitted to testify, over objection, to a conversation of the witness with Mahler with regard to the payment for the plank; that Mahler had paid out for the plank $4.85 and was credited by the club with that amount as a credit upon the dues Mahler was owing to the club. These declarations involved transactions which took place in the absence of the defendant, and which were in no way binding upon him. The evidence was objected to by the defendant, and insisted upon by the state as corroborative proof, and admitted by the court. The entire record of the trial is before us under the certificate of the trial judge made pursuant to section 136 of the criminal procedure act (P. L. 1898, p. 915), and the plaintiff in error has specified this admission of testimony objected to as one of the causes relied upon by him for reversal in accordance with the provisions of the act; so that, although an exception was not sealed at the trial, this alleged error is properly before us for review. We think the admission of this evidence was erroneous. These declarations of Mahler recited by the witness involved transactions which occurred, if at all, in the absence of the defendant, and without any authority or consent of his, so far as the proofs show. The testimony objected to was hearsay in character and irrelevant. The defendant had testified that these plank were old ones left from the replanking of Beatty's Bridge, which had been done by order of the board; that he had given Mahler the liberty of taking them, saying to him that he (the defendant) did not want them; that he did not sell them to Mahler, and had received no money for them. It seems to us that under these circumstances the admission of this evidence objected to was injurious to the defendant. And the rule is that when the court of review can see that the error complained of may have harmed the plaintiff in error, it is the court's duty to reverse. Bell v. Samuels, 60 N. J. Law, 370, 37 Atl. 613; Ruckman v. Bergholz, 37 N. J. Law, 437-441; State v. Hendrick et al., 70 N. J. Law, 41, 56 Atl. 247.

Another error specified as a ground of reversal grew out of the admission, over objection, of the evidence of a witness called by the state whose name was Purdy. The defendant was asked, on his cross-examination, whether he remembered a man named Purdy coming to get some of the plank, and he answered, "He never came to me in his life to get any." Purdy was then called by the state in rebuttal, and was permitted to testify that he got two loads of the plank, and that he got it from Mr. Newman. He was then asked, "Did you buy it from him?" and he answered that he did. This testimony was admitted over objection, and it seems to us was clearly incompetent. In the case of Bullock v. State, 65 N. J. Law, 574, 47 Atl. 62, 86 Am. St. Rep. 668, the Court of Errors declares that on the trial of the accused for a crime it is not competent to prove that he committed other crimes of a like nature, for the purpose of showing that the accused would be more likely to commit the crime charged in the indictment. It is not relevant to show that the defendant has committed other similar crimes that are not connected in any way with the one in question. In the Bullock Case the defendant had testified on cross-examination that he had never had any previous trouble with any person whatever, whereupon the state called a man named Campbell to contradict this story, and prove the occurrence of an assault upon him by the defendant. The admission of Campbell's testimony was held to be error, and for that reason the conviction was set aside.

I have examined the other grounds for reversal discussed in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, but find nothing of merit in them; but upon the grounds already stated the judgment below must be reversed and a venire de nova issued.

SPENCER et ux. v. HAINES.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Feb. 26, 1906.)

TRIAL—VENIRE DE NOVO—DEFECTIVE VERDICT.

A jury returned a single sum as damages, when the declaration contained a claim by a husband in his own right, added to a claim of the husband and wife for an injury to the wife. Held that, because the sum found cannot be applied to either claim or apportioned between them, the court, on application of the plaintiff, on the return of the postea will award a writ of venire de novo.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 802.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Action by George H. Spencer and wife against Newlin Haines. Verdict for plaintiffs. Motion for venire de novo granted.

Argued at November term, 1905, before FORT, GARRETSON, and REED, JJ.

John J. Crandall, for the motion. James Buchanan, opposed.

REED, J. This motion is made on the coming in of the postea, and the insistence by the counsel for the plaintiff is that the verdict is so imperfect that no judgment can be entered upon it. From the postea it appears that the action was brought to recover damages arising from an injury to one Lizzie Spencer, a married woman, which injury was caused by a machine in the laundry of the defendant. The counsel for the plaintiff, taking advantage of the provisions of section 21 of the practice act (P. L. 1903, p. 540), added to the claim of the wife, in which the husband joined, a claim of the husband for loss of services by his wife resulting from her injury. The jury returned as damages, by reason of the injuries sustained by the said Lizzie Spencer, a verdict for $500.

It is perceived that there was no assessment of damages for the claim of the husband and wife, and then a distinct assessment for the claim of the husband alone. There is no basis by which the sum assessed can be appropriated to one or the other of these claims, nor is there any standard presented by the postea by which the sum found can be apportioned between the two claims. It is at once apparent that it is impossible to enter a legal judgment upon this verdict, under the pleadings. The only course to be taken to rectify the situation is to have a new trial. The object of the plaintiff is to obtain this object by the issuance of a venire de novo. He could have accomplished this after a judgment entered in the language of the verdict by writ of error. The appellate court, after the reversal of the judgment entered upon this imperfect verdict, could have directed a venire de novo. 2 Tidd's Prac. 933; Hooper v. Shepherd, 2 Strange, 1069; Grant v. Astle, Doug. 722; Miller v. Frits, 1 Ld. Raym. 324; Graham & Waterman on New Trials, p. 36. The plaintiff could have accomplished his purpose, also, by a rule to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial granted. Redfern v. Smith, 2 Bing. 262. Plaintiff could also probably have accomplished his purpose by a motion in arrest of judgment. This motion is usually made on behalf of a defendant, and section 163 of the practice act (page 581) applies only to parties against whom a verdict has passed; but I see no reason why it cannot be made at the instance of the plaintiff, where none or a judgment injurious to his interest can be entered on an imperfect verdict ostensibly in his favor. But the plaintiff was not confined to either of these methods of procedure.

Mr. Stephen, after stating the rule that a period of four days elapses after a trial before judgment can be actually obtained, remarks that during this period the unsuccessful party, to avoid the effect of the verdict, may move the court to grant a new trial, or to arrest the judgment, or to give judgment non obstante verdicto, or to award a repleader, or to award a venire facias de novo. This writ, he says, will be awarded where the jury has been improperly chosen, or have given an uncertain, ambiguous, or defective verdict. The consequences and object of a venire de novo are, of course, to obtain a new trial; and accordingly this proceeding is in substance the same as a motion for a new trial. Where, however, the unsuccessful party objects to the verdict in respect to some irregularity or error in the practical course of proceedings, rather than upon the merits, the form of the application is a motion for a venire de novo, and not for a new trial. Stephen on Pleading, 93, 100. The most frequent instance of the allowance of this writ is where a special verdict is so imperfect, by reason of the failure to find some fact, that no judgment can be entered upon the verdict. Bouvier v. Balt. & New York R. R. Co., 65 N. J. Law, 313-328, 47 Atl. 772. It is, however, not confined to imperfect special verdicts, but is issued when a general verdict is so uncertain or ambiguous that a legal judgment cannot be entered. The most frequent instances of the issuance of the writ after general verdicts to be found in the English Reports are where entire damages have been assessed upon a declaration containing several counts, some good and some bad, and evidence has been introduced which would support an assessment of damages under the defective as well as good counts. "In such a case," says Mr. Tidd, "the only remedy is by awarding a venire de novo, because it would be impossible for the judge to say on which of the counts the jury had found the damages, or how they had apportioned them." 2 Tidd's Prac. 894. Such a general verdict on such a declaration would be good in this state. Practice Act (P. L. 1908, p. 581) § 161. This fact, however, does not diminish the precedential force of this method of dealing with defective verdicts by the British courts. The function of a venire facias de novo is stated in Witham v. Lewis, 1 Wils. 48. The cases where a trial de novo can be awarded are cited by Mr. Stephen at page 100 of his work on Pleading. Distinction between granting this writ and the granting of a new trial is the subject of remark in Graham & Waterman on New Trials, p. 36.

The writ will be awarded.

STATE (BRANSFIELD Prosecutor), v. COLLINS.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Jan. 3, 1906.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—PROSECUTIONS—JURISDICTION.

Gen. Laws 1896, c. 92, prohibits the maintenance of a liquor nuisance, and section 2 provides that the district court shall have criminal jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, whose jurisdiction to try offenses only exists where the penalty prescribed does not exceed a fine of $500; and Court and Practice Act 1905, p. 44, c. 10, § 150, provides that with reference to other offenses the district court shall have jurisdiction only to cause the defendant to be apprehended, examined, bailed, or committed to jail, according to law, to answer before the superior court. Held that, the maintenance of a liquor nuisance being an offense for which the penalty may exceed a fine of $500, the district court had no jurisdiction to try the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 29, Cent. Dig. Intoxicating Liquors, § 216.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW—CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS—POWER TO CERTIFY.

Court and Practice Act 1905, p. 135, c. 27, § 475, provides that, whenever the constitutionality of any act shall be brought in question in the trial of a criminal cause in any court, the decision of the question shall be reserved and the trial of the case in other respects shall proceed as if the statute were constitutional; and if the defendant shall be found guilty sentence shall be stayed, and the constitutional question raised, together with a record of the case and a transcript of the testimony, or so much as pertains to the constitutional question, shall be certified to the Supreme Court for decision. Held, that such section only authorized the certification of a constitutional question by a court having jurisdiction to "try and determine" the prosecution, so that, where a district court had only power to adjudge a defendant charged with maintaining a liquor nuisance "probably guilty" and transmit the case to the superior court, as provided by Court and Practice Act 1905, p. 51, c. 10, § 172, it had no power in such prosecution to transmit a constitutional question to the Supreme Court.

Prosecution by the state, on complaint of Cornelius Bransfield, against Albert B. Collins for maintaining a liquor nuisance. Heard on motion of complainant that the case, certified to the Supreme Court on a constitutional question by a district court, be remanded to the district court. Granted.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DUBOIS, BLODGETT, JOHNSON, and PARKHURST, JJ.

Thomas H. Peabody and Harry B. Agard, for the State. Clarence A. Aldrich and John W. Sweeney, for defendant.

PARKHURST, J. This is a criminal case, wherein the defendant was brought before the district court of the Third judicial district, charged with keeping and maintaining a liquor nuisance in violation of certain of the provisions of chapter 92 of the General Laws of 1896. Upon arraignment the defendant pleaded not guilty, and after one continuance the court proceeded with the examination of the case. It appears from the transcript of evidence offered by the complainant during the examination, and now before this court, that the defendant was, during the time covered by the complaint, engaged in business as a retail druggist at the place alleged in the complaint to be a nuisance, and that on a certain day during the time covered by the complaint a search warrant was executed at the place in question, and a large quantity of intoxicating liquors of various kinds was seized under said warrant, a part of them in the drug store, part in the back room, and part in the stable on the premises. The complainant also offered other evidence in support of the several allegations of the complaint, making a prima facie case in support of the charge alleged, showing the existence of a back room, connected with the drug store, having the appearance of a barroom, with beer, glasses, liquors, ice chest, etc.; also evidence as to selling and drinking liquors on the premises. Evidence was also introduced as to the notoriously intemperate character of persons frequenting the place, and as to the notorious character of the place.

At the conclusion of the complainant's evidence the following motion was offered by the defendant: "It appearing in the above-entitled case that the respondent was during all the time covered by the complaint in this case a retail druggist and apothecary, and now during the trial of said case the respondent raises the constitutionality of section 1 of chapter 1223 of the Public Laws passed at the January session A. D. 1905, entitled 'An act in amendment of and in addition to chapter 102 of the General Laws, entitled "Of the suppression of intemperance,"' and the respondent avers that said section 1 of chapter 1223 is unconstitutional and void because it conflicts with section 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state, and with section 1 of article 14 of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and moves that if the respondent shall be found probably guilty that said constitutional question, together with a record of the case and a transcript of the testimony, or so much thereof as pertains to the constitutional question, shall be certified and transmitted forthwith to the Supreme Court for decision." After argument upon this motion, the defendant was adjudged probably guilty. The defendant's motion was then granted by the court and the following record of the case was made: "Arraigned Oct. 27, 1905. Pleading not guilty. Continued to Nov. 10, 1905. Required to give recognizance in the sum of $1,000, with surety. Surety, Gurdon B. Hiscor, of Westerly. Nov. 13, 1905. On examination adjudged probably guilty, and the constitutionality of section 52 of chapter 102 of the General Laws, as amended by chapter 1223 of the Public Laws, making the finding of any liquors enumerated in said section, so amended, upon the premises of any retail druggist or apothecary, in quantities exceeding one half gallon, evidence that the same is kept for sale, having been raised by the respondent, it is ordered that the constitutional question thus raised, together with a record of the case and a transcript of the evidence, be certified and transmitted to the Supreme Court for decision."

Upon the record, papers, transcript, etc., in the case being certified to this court by the justice of the court below, the complainant filed in this court the following motion: "In the above-entitled case the complainant moves that said case be remanded to the district court of the Third judicial district, with directions to said court to proceed with said case in the same manner as if a constitutional question had not been raised by the respondent, and the complainant so moves, because he says: (1) That the offense with which the respondent is charged in the above-entitled case, namely, keeping and maintaining a common nuisance in violation of the provisions of chapter 92 of the General Laws of this state, is an offense which is not within the jurisdiction of the district court of the Third judicial district to try and determine. (2) That section 475 of chapter 27 of the court and practice act, under and by virtue of the provisions of which it was moved to certify the above-entitled case to this court, and under and by virtue of the provisions of which said case was certified to this court, does not extend to or apply to a criminal case wherein the offense charged is beyond the jurisdiction of the court before which the same is pending to try and determine, and consequently said case was improperly and unlawfully certified to this court. (3) That the respondent in the above-entitled case was adjudged probably guilty of the offense charged in the complaint, by the justice of the district court of the Third judicial district, as appears by the record in said case, and it thereupon became the duty of said justice forthwith to certify the complaint in the above-entitled case and all papers connected therewith to the clerk of the superior court for the county of Washington, in accordance with the requirements of section 172 of chapter 10 of the court and practice act. (4) That all the evidence offered by the complainant and received by the court (claimed by the respondent to raise a constitutional question under the provisions of section 52 of chapter 102 of the General Laws as amended by section 1 of chapter 1223 of the Public Laws) in the trial in the case below would have been competent, relevant, and proper in proof of the offense alleged in the complaint aside from the provisions of section 52 of chapter 102 of the General Laws, as amended by section 1 of chapter 1223 of the Public Laws. (5) That the fact of the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of section 52 of chapter 102 of the General Laws as amended by section 1 of chapter 1223 of the Public Laws can not affect the present case, because all the evidence submitted by the complainant in the trial of the case is competent evidence, under said chapter 92 of the General Laws and at common law, in support of the charge contained in the complaint. (6) That the complainant could not, and cannot, obtain for any of the evidence submitted by him in support of the nuisance charge the probative force to which the same would be entitled in a prosecution under the provisions of section 52 of chapter 102 of the General Laws as amended by section 1 of chapter 1223 of the Public Laws, and the court below would have been in error to have attached the presumption therein created to the evidence submitted."

The offense charged in the complaint, namely, keeping and maintaining a liquor nulsance in violation of the provisions of chapter 92 of the General Laws, is one beyond the jurisdiction of the district court to try and determine, as the penalty prescribed may exceed a fine of $500, the limit of the justice's jurisdiction. Gen. Laws 1896, c. 92, § 2; Court and Practice Act 1905, p. 44, c. 10, § 150. The district court therefore had jurisdiction, in this case, only to cause the defendant "to be apprehended, examined, bailed, or committed to jail, according to law, to answer * * * before the superior court." Court and Practice Act 1905, p. 44, c. 10, § 151. The question now before this court is whether the district court had the power to certify and transmit the constitutional question raised to this court, under the provisions of Court and Practice Act 1905, p. 135, c. 27, § 475, as it has assumed to do, or whether it should have certified and transmitted the complaint and all papers connected therewith to the clerk of the superior court for the county of Washington, under the provisions of Court and Practice Act, c. 10, § 172, as follows: "Whenever a district court upon a criminal complaint shall adjudge a defendant in any criminal complaint probably guilty of an offense, said complaint and all papers connected therewith shall forthwith be certified and be transmitted to the clerk of the superior court for the county in which said district court is established."

The provisions of Court and Practice Act, § 475, under which the district court assumed to certify and transmit, are as follows: "Whenever the constitutionality of any act of the General Assembly shall be brought in question in the trial of a criminal cause in any court, the decision of the question shall be reserved and the trial of the case in other respects shall proceed as if the statute were constitutional; and if the defendant shall be found guilty, sentence shall be stayed, and the constitutional question raised, together with a record of the case, and a transcript of the testimony, or so much thereof as pertains to the constitutional question, shall be certified and transmitted forthwith to the Supreme Court for decision." It will be noted that section 172, above quoted, does not contain any exception, but is peremptory in its terms. If it had been intended that the proceedings should be suspended, after the court had adjudged the defendant "probably guilty," it would have been easy to say so. Again, it will be noted that section 475 uses the word "trial," and provides that if the defendant is "found guilty, sentence shall be stayed" and the constitutional question shall be certified, etc. We think the word "trial" is used advisedly in this section, and is intended to have its technical meaning, viz.: "The examination before a competent tribunal, according to the law of the land, of the facts or law put in issue in a case for the purpose of determining such issue." Bouv. Law Dict. The distinction between "examination" and a "trial" has been well set forth in State v. Bergman, 37 Minn. 407, 34 N. W. 737. In that case Gilfillan, C. J., says (page 408 of 37 Minn., and page 737 of 34 N. W.): "The question in the case is, do these provisions apply to an examination by a justice of the peace, under chapter 106 [Gen. St. 1878], of a person accused of crime? Such an examination is, of course, a proceeding; and if there were nothing else but that word and the word 'action' to indicate the cases in which a transfer can be demanded, the right would apply to such examination. But the words, 'at any time before the trial commences,' and 'proceed to hear and determine the same,' show that the proceeding must be one in which there is to be a trial before the justice, and which on such trial he is to determine. The word 'trial,' which means the judicial hearing upon the issues in a cause for the purpose of determining it, cannot properly be applied to such an examination, which is a mere preliminary inquiry to ascertain if the evidence is such that the accused ought to be put upon trial for the offense charged. The issue being the guilt or innocence of the accused, it is not affected by the result of the examination. If he is discharged, new proceedings may be at once commenced against him for the same offense; if he is held, that fact can have no influence on the issue of his guilt when he is put on his trial to have it determined. The justice neither tries nor determines the issue in the proceeding. And we are satisfied that section 20 [c. 65, Gen. St. 1878] refers only to actions or proceedings that he does try and determine. In an analogous case the Supreme Court of Wisconsin decided as we do. See Duffies v. State, 7 Wis. 672. Order reversed." And the same distinction has been observed in Withers v. State, 36 Ala. 264; Com. v. Harris, 8 Gray, 470; Com. v. Boyle, 14 Gray, 3; Com. v. Hamilton, 129 Mass. 479; Com. v. Sullivan, 156 Mass. 487, 489, 31 N. E. 647; Waldo v. Spencer, 4 Conn. 71, 78; and is recognized by all the leading authorities on criminal proceedings.

Again, a careful examination of the court and practice act shows that this same distinction is clearly maintained, throughout the act, wherever it touches the question of the power of the district court either "to try and determine" or to apprehend, examine, bail, or commit to jail to answer before the superior court. See Court and Practice Act 1905, pp. 44, 47, 49, 50, c. 10, §§ 150, 151, 160, 165, 166, 167. Again, the words, "if the defendant shall be found guilty, sentence shall be stayed," etc., are not appropriate to the proceedings in a case which is not within the jurisdiction of the district court "to try and determine." The defendant can only be "found guilty" and "sentenced" by a court having power "to try and determine"; and it is evident that the finding, "adjudged probably guilty," in this case, is not equivalent to the words "found guilty" in the statute, so as to operate as the requisite condition precedent to the certification of a constitutional question to this court. It is apparent, therefore, that Court and Practice Act, § 475, authorizes a district court to certify to this court a constitutional question only in the case of an offense within its jurisdiction "to try and determine," and only in such a case when it has found the defendant "guilty," and that in a case not within its jurisdiction "to try and determine" such a question cannot be certified by the district court, under section 475.

The court and practice act does, in our opinion, substantially change the practice of the courts in this matter in a criminal case from the practice established by Gen. Laws 1896, c. 250, §§ 1 and 2, which are as follows:

"Section 1. If, in any cause or proceeding, civil or criminal, pending before any court, the constitutionality of any act of the General Assembly shall be brought in question, the court shall rule the act to be constitutional, and in writing note the question and sufficient of the evidence to explain the same, and such note and evidence shall form part of the record; and thereafter shall go on and try the cause as though such question had not been raised: Provided, that if the constitutionality of any such act shall be brought in question in any civil cause or proceeding so pending, but before the trial or hearing thereof shall have begun, the parties to such cause or proceeding may concur in stating such question in the form of a special case, and the statement thereof shall form part of the record; but said cause or proceeding shall not be assigned for trial or hearing in the court in which the same then is, until said question shall have been determined, and said question shall, by the clerk of said court, be at once certified to the appellate division for its decision of said question, subject to the same procedure thereafter as is provided in this chapter as to such questions.

"Sec. 2. If verdict or decision be rendered in the cause against the party raising the constitutional question, judgment shall be stayed, and the clerk of the court shall, after the period of five days from the day on which such verdict or decision was rendered, certify and transmit the record of the cause to the appellate division of the Supreme Court, for its decision of such constitutional question.

A similar practice was authorized under Pub. St. 1882, c. 220, §§ 1, 2, as follows:

"Section 1. If in any cause or proceeding, civil or criminal, pending before any court other than the Supreme Court, the constitutionality of any act of the General Assembly shall be brought into question, such court shall rule such act to be constitutional and go on and try the cause as though such question had not been raised.

"Sec. 2. If judgment be rendered in the cause against the party raising the constitutional question, the court shall forthwith certify the cause to the Supreme Court for their decision of the constitutional question, if in session, and if not in session, then to the session thereof next to be holden in any county of the state by adjournment or at a regular term."

Under these statutes, in a criminal case which was not within the jurisdiction of the district court "to try and determine," it was competent for the district court, after "decision" (chapter 250 § 2, Gen. Laws 1896) or "judgment" (chapter 220, § 2, Pub. St. 1882) "against the party raising the constitutional question," to certify the cause for decision of the constitutional question; and this was so held, under the statute of 1882, in State v. Brown & Sharpe Mfg. Co., 18 R. I. 16, 25 Atl. 246, 17 L. R. A. 856, on the ground that the word "judgment," used in chapter 220, § 2, Pub. St. 1882, was broad enough to include the finding of a district court "adjudging" the defendant "probably guilty." The changes in the statutes, which are apparent upon a comparison of the sections heretofore quoted and discussed, leave no doubt in our minds that the Legislature intended to change the practice, and that it is so changed as we have set forth.

The cause is remanded to the district court of the Third judicial district, with directions that the complaint and all papers connected therewith be forthwith certified and transmitted to the clerk of the superior court for the county of Washington, pursuant to the provisions of chapter 10 of the court and practice act, and particularly of section 172 of said chapter.

STATE v. McMANUS.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Washington. Feb. 16, 1906.)

FORGERY — INVALID INSTRUMENTS — LIQUOR PRESCRIPTIONS.

Acts 1904, p. 135, No. 115, § 22, authorizes licensees to sell intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes, and section 24 (page 137) provides that a licensee shall sell only on the written prescription of a legally qualified physician, which shall state, among other things, that it "is given and necessary for medicinal use." Held, that a prescription containing no statement that the liquor prescribed was necessary for medicinal use was invalid on its face, so that the alteration thereof would not constitute forgery at common law.

Exceptions from Washington County Court; John W. Rowell, Judge.

Barney McManus was informed against for forgery, consisting of the alteration of a physician's prescription for whisky. From a pro forma decree overruling a demurrer to the information, he brings exceptions. Reversed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, WATSON, HASELTON, POWERS, and MILES, JJ.

S. Hollister Jackson, State's Atty., for the State. Senter & Senter, for respondent.

MUNSON, J. The information charges the respondent with committing the crime of forgery, by altering a physician's prescription for whisky. The alteration alleged is the change of "one" to "four" in the designation of the quantity. It is not claimed that the alteration of such an instrument is forgery under our statute. The question is whether the information is good at common law. Section 22, No. 115, p. 135, Acts 1904, authorizes licensees to sell intoxicating liquors of any kind for medicinal purposes. Section 24 (page 137) of the act provides that such licenses shall be issued only to retail druggists and apothecaries who are registered pharmacists, and provides, further, that the holder of such a license shall sell only upon the written prescription of a legally qualified physician, which shall state, among other things, that it "is given and is necessary for medicinal use."

The respondent urges that the instrument alleged to have been altered was so defective that its alteration would not be forgery. Of the several defects claimed we shall notice but one, as to which there is no room for argument. The prescription in question contains no statement that the liquor prescribed is necessary for medicinal use. It therein fails to comply with the statute in a very essential particular. The paper is invalid upon its face, and could not be relied upon as authority for a sale. This has been held in respect to similar provisions in other states. State v. Tetrick, 34 W. Va. 137, 11 S. E. 1002; State v. Nixdorf, 46 Mo. App. 494. It has been long and uniformly held that a paper that is invalid on its face will not sustain a charge of forgery at common law. The writing must be such that, if genuine, it would be apparently of some legal efficacy. It is not to be presumed that any one could be deceived or defrauded by a document that is void on its face. 2 Bish. New Cr. Law, §§ 523, 524 (3), 538; State v. Briggs, 34 Vt. 501; People v. Shall, 9 Cow. 778.

Pro forma judgment reversed, demurrer sustained, information quashed, and respondent discharged.

HOWARD & BROWN v. GAMMON et al.
(FRENCH, Intervener).

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Windham.
Feb. 16, 1906.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE — GARNISHMENT — JUDGMENT FOR CLAIMANT—APPEAL.

Plaintiff in a trustee suit is entitled to appeal from a justice's judgment sustaining a claimant's title to the credits disclosed by the trustee and discharging such trustee, the amount in issue between plaintiff and the claimant being in excess of $20, though the suit is not appealable as between plaintiff and defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 31, Cent. Dig. Justices of the Peace, § 482.]

Exceptions from Windham County Court; Seneca Haselton, Judge.

Action by Howard & Brown against H. P. Gammon and another, in which Valeria

P. French intervened as claimant of the disclosed property. From a justice's judgment in favor of claimant, plaintiff appealed, and from an order overruling claimant's motion to dismiss the appeal, she brings exceptions. Affirmed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, START, WATSON, POWERS, and MILES, JJ.

A. H. Humphrey and Stickney, Sargent & Skeels, for plaintiff. Sanford E. Emery and Davis & Davis, for claimant.

ROWELL, C. J. The question is whether the plaintiff in a trustee suit can appeal from the judgment of a justice sustaining the claimant's title to the credits disclosed by the trustee and discharging the trustee, although the suit is not appealable as between the plaintiff and the defendant; the amount in issue between the plaintiff and the claimant exceeding $20. That a trustee can appeal when the amount in issue between him and the defendant exceeds $20, although the action is not appealable as between the plaintiff and the defendant, has been decided. Church v. French, 54 Vt. 420; American Express Co. v. Gray, 62 Vt. 421, 20 Atl. 276. It is said in the Church Case that it was undoubtedly the intention of the statute to place trustees upon perfect equality with the principal parties in respect of appeals; that if, in that case, suit had been brought by the defendant against the trustee directly, the trustee would have had a right to appeal; and that when compelled to litigate the same matter as trustee he should have the same right, and that a proper construction of the statute gave it to him. It is said in the Express Company Case that the contention that the only question was whether the amount in controversy between the plaintiff and the defendant exceeded $20 could not be acceded to without overruling the Church Case, which the court was not disposed to do. It is said in Van Buskirk v. Martin, 28 Vt. 726, that it was the purpose and intention of the act allowing trustees to appeal in respect to their liability to put them on the same ground as the other parties to the suit, and that the act would have been "a very one-sided affair" had it extended the right of appeal to the trustee and denied it to the plaintiff, who litigated the question with the trustee.

The claimant can appeal, because, as to the merits of his title, he is a party to the suit, within the meaning of the statute allowing an appeal by "either party." Hutchinson v. Bigelow, 23 Vt. 504. In the case at bar the claimant could have appealed, had the judgment been against her, because the amount in issue between her and the plaintiff exceeded $20, as that amount was the amount of the plaintiff's judgment, there being funds enough in the trustee's hands to pay that judgment in full; and, as said of the act allowing a trustee to appeal, so it may be said of the statute allowing a claimant to appeal, it would be a very one-sided affair to extend the right of appeal to the claimant and deny it to the plaintiff, the party contending against the claimant's title. Nor can the plaintiff's right of appeal be tested by the right as between the principal parties, any more than the trustee's right can be thus tested. The intent of the statute is to put the claimant and the plaintiff on perfect equality in regard to appealing from a judgment respecting the claimant's title, and the test is the right of appeal as between them, and that right is mutual. If one can appeal, the other can. This is the only fair construction of the statute. It would take clear language to warrant a different construction.

Judgment affirmed.

BUSHEY v. NORTHROP.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Franklin. Feb. 16, 1906.)

1. APPEAL—MISCONDUCT OF COUNSEL—ARGUMENT—REVERSIBLE ERROR.

In an action for services, it appeared that defendant gave plaintiff, who could not read, a check for $5, on which was written, "Balance in full to date." Plaintiff cashed the check and testified that the balance due him was $36, and that some time later defendant drew a check for $18 and offered it to plaintiff in full settlement, which plaintiff refused to receive. Defendant testified that he called plaintiff's attention to what was written on the $5 check, and told him that, if he accepted it, it would be in full settlement of his claim, and that no check was afterwards offered. Held, that a question asked of the jury by plaintiff's counsel in argument, "What is the feeling toward an intelligent man who takes advantage of a poor man's ignorance?" though erroneous, as based on an assumption of defendant's misconduct, was not reversible error.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 4135.]

2. TRIAL—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—EVIDENCE.

Where, before trial, plaintiff gave defendant notice to produce the stubs of all checks drawn by him between certain dates and all of the checks then in his possession, but defendant refused to produce the stub books and all books except three, claiming the books were lost, plaintiff's counsel was justified in arguing that defendant had failed to produce papers that were or ought to have been in his possession, and that it might be inferred therefrom that there was something wrong in the transaction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 299.]

Exceptions from Franklin County Court; James M. Tyler, Judge.

Assumpsit for labor by Louis Bushey against P. B. B. Northrop. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings exceptions. Affirmed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, and WATSON, JJ.

C. G. Austin & Sons, for plaintiff. Hogan & Hogan, for defendant.

MUNSON, J. The only questions presented are two concerning the argument, but these require some statement of the case. It appears that plaintiff quit defendant's employment before his time was out, and went to defendant for his pay, and that some claim of damages was made; that defendant finally gave plaintiff a check for $5, on which was written, "Balance in full to date"; and that plaintiff got the check cashed. Plaintiff testified that the balance due him on his wages was $36; that defendant gave him the $5 check towards his services, and agreed to pay the balance when his time was out; that he could not read, and was not told by defendant, and did not know, what was written on the check; that some time later he applied to defendant for the balance of his wages, and that defendant then drew a check for $18 and offered it to him in full settlement; and that he refused to accept it. Defendant testified that he called plaintiff's attention to what was written on the $5 check, and told him that if he took the check it would be in full settlement of his claim; and that no check was afterwards drawn or offered.

In his argument to the jury plaintiff's counsel asked, "What is the feeling towards an intelligent man who takes advantage of a poor man's ignorance?" and spoke of defendant's conduct as contemptible. This was a characterization of the defendant upon an assumption of his misconduct, rather than an argument of the evidence to prove the misconduct; but the case presented by the plaintiff's testimony justified some severity of remark, and it can hardly be held that the mistake indicated was reversible error.

Before the trial plaintiff gave defendant notice to produce the stubs of all checks drawn by him between certain dates, and all of the checks that were in his possession. The exceptions say that defendant did not comply with this notice, except to produce the $5 check and two previous checks cashed by plaintiff, and that he claimed his stub books were lost. Plaintiff's counsel argued that defendant had failed to produce papers that were or ought to have been in his possession, and that it might be inferred from this that there was something wrong in the transaction. The case afforded a sufficient basis for the argument.

Judgment affirmed.

COLSTON v. BEAN.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Windsor. Feb. 1, 1906.)

FRAUD — ACTION — EVIDENCE — BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where, in an action for defendant's fraud in selling plaintiff chattels as free from incumbrance when they were mortgaged, the defense was an agreement with the mortgagee whereby defendant had a right to sell and that plaintiff bought with knowledge of the mortgage, the burden was upon plaintiff to prove the fraud by a preponderance of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Fraud, §§ 46, 47.]

Exceptions from Windsor County Court; John H. Watson, Judge.

Action by J. F. Colston against W. W. Bean. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff brings exceptions. Affirmed. See 58 Atl. 795.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

Jos. C. Enright and Edward R. Buck, for plaintiff. J. D. Denison, for defendant.

TYLER, J. Action: Case, for the defendant's alleged fraud in a sale to the plaintiff of certain wagons as free from incumbrance, when they were incumbered by a mortgage to W. H. Dubois. Defense: That an agreement with Dubois the defendant had a right to sell the wagons; also that the plaintiff bought them with knowledge of the mortgage. The court instructed the jury that, as the plaintiff had alleged fraud in the sale, the burden as upon him to prove it by a preponderance of the evidence. The plaintiff contends that this was error; that, as the defendant had attempted to justify the sale upon the ground of the mortgagee's permission, the burden was upon him to prove such permission.

When the defendant had introduced evidence tending to prove the fact of permission, the burden was upon the plaintiff to overcome this evidence by a greater weight of his evidence in order to establish his claim of fraud. The record of the trial is not before us, but presumably the plaintiff proved the allegations in his declaration, and, resting there, was entitled to a verdict. The defendant did not set up an affirmative defense, but sought to relieve the case of the element of fraud claimed by the plaintiff to exist. Fraud is not presumed, but must be proved. Therefore the plaintiff was bound to maintain the affirmative of the issue tendered in his declaration. It is the rule that the obligation of proving a fact rests upon the party who substantially asserts the affirmative of the issue. 1 Greenl. Ev. 74; Bosworth v. Bancroft, 74 Vt. 451, 52 Atl. 1050. The burden of proof, in the sense of the duty of producing evidence, may pass from one party to the other as a case progresses, while the burden of proof, meaning the obligation to establish the truth of the claim upon which the plaintiff's case rests, is upon him throughout the trial. See Thayer's Treatise on Ev. c. 9; 1 Greenl. Ev. c. 3; 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. 22.

Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. WATERMAN.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Essex. Feb. 2, 1906.)

CRIMINAL LAW—PLEA IN ABATEMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

Under V. S. 1127, providing that a person drawn as juror from a town containing more than 200 inhabitants shall be disqualified from serving again for two years, a plea in abatement filed at the October term, alleging that on a date before the March term a certain juror was summoned as juror, and attended, qualified, and acted as such through the term, "without this, that said [juror] was during said last-mentioned session of said court summoned as a petit juror to serve at said session of court," was demurrable, because not showing that the juror was not drawn as a special or struck juror; the allegation that he was "drawn" not being sufficient for this purpose, in view of sections 1134, 1137, speaking of a struck jury as "drawn," and calling it a "special jury."

Exceptions from Essex County Court; George M. Powers, Judge.

Robert Waterman was indicted for murder. A demurrer to a plea in abatement was sustained, defendant excepted, and the case was certified to the Supreme Court. Affirmed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, WATSON, and HASELTON, JJ.

Clark C. Fitts, Atty. Gen., and Harry Blodgett, for the State. Harland B. Howe, for respondent.

ROWELL, C. J. This is an indictment for murder. The statute provides that "each person drawn by the sheriff or his deputy to serve as grand or petit juror from a town containing more than 200 inhabitants, shall be disqualified from again serving as juror for two years from such drawing." V. S. 1127. Relying on this statute, the prisoner pleads in abatement that Burt L. Blodgett, one of the grand jurors who participated in finding and presenting said indictment, was drawn within two years to serve as a petit juror from the town of Lemington, which contained more than 200 inhabitants. The sufficiency of this plea is challenged by demurrer. It alleges, in substance, as inducement, that on the 12th day of March, A. D. 1904, and before the session of the March term, 1904, of the Essex county court, said Blodgett was drawn and summoned to serve as petit juror at said session of said court, and did then and there attend as such juror, and qualified, acted, and served as such through said term, "without this, that said Blodgett was, during said last-mentioned session of said court, summoned as a petit juror to serve at said session of said court."

A plea in abatement must not only fully answer what is necessary to be answered, but must also anticipate and exclude all supposable matter that would, if alleged on the other side, defeat it. Tested by this rule the plea is bad, because the absque hoc does not perform its office by curing the argumentativeness of the inducement by negating that Blodgett was drawn as a special or struck juror; for to such a juror the statute relied upon does not apply. It is not enough to negate that Blodgett was summoned during said session, for a struck jury is to be summoned before the term, the same as an ordinary petit jury, except talesmen summoned to fill the panel. The argument that struck jurors are not drawn, but are selected and listed by the assistant judges and the county clerk, acting as commissioners, that there is no such thing in our law as a special juror, and that therefore it is sufficient to negate that Blodgett was summoned during the term, is not well founded; for the statute speaks of and regards a struck jury as "drawn," and calls it a "special jury," and its individual members "special jurors." V. S. 1134, 1137.

There are other objections made to this plea, but they need not be considered. The other pleas are waived.

Affirmed and remanded.

STATE v. PAIGE.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Caledonia. Feb. 1, 1906.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—ILLEGAL SALE—INFORMATION — NEGATING EXCEPTIONS IN STATUTE.

Under Acts 1902, p. 98, No. 90, § 21, prohibiting the exposing or keeping for sale of intoxicating liquor except as authorized by the act, but declaring that the act shall not apply to certain sales of cider and native wine, an information for violation of the statute need not state that the liquor sold was not of the kind specified in the exception.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 29, Cent. Dig. Intoxicating Liquors, §§ 245-248.]

2. SAME—DESCRIPTION OF OFFENSE.

An information under Acts 1902, p. 92, No. 90, forbidding the exposing or keeping for sale of intoxicating liquor except in accordance with the provisions of the act, need not show how the liquor was kept or exposed further than by following the language of the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 29, Cent. Dig. Intoxicating Liquors, § 251.]

3. SAME—DESCRIPTION OF LIQUOR.

Neither is it necessary to specify the kinds of liquor kept or exposed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 29, Cent. Dig. Intoxicating Liquors, §§ 231, 251.]

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DETERMINATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION—NECESSITY.

Inasmuch as the provisions of Acts 1902, p. 92, No. 90, authorizing searches and seizures in connection with prosecutions for the illegal sale of liquor, are not so connected with the remainder of the act as to render it unconstitutional as a whole, even though the search and seizure provisions should be conceded to be so, one who is prosecuted under the act, but has not been affected by the provisions as to searches and seizures, cannot question the constitutionality of the search and seizure clauses.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 10, Cent. Dig. Constitutional Law, § 39.]

Exceptions from Caledonia County Court; James M. Tyler, Judge.

Harry Paige was indicted for keeping and exposing intoxicating liquor for sale contrary to the provisions of the statute. Demurrer to the indictment was overruled, and defendant excepts. Judgment affirmed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, WATSON, START, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

Frank D. Thompson, State's Atty., and David E. Porter, for the State. M. M. Gordon and J. P. Lamson, for respondent.

POWERS, J. An information in two counts for keeping and exposing intoxicating liquor for sale contrary to the provisions of No. 90, p. 92, Acts of 1902. A demurrer thereto assigning ten causes, of which only those hereinafter considered are relied upon in the respondent's brief.

The first clause of section 21 of the act of 1902 prohibits the exposing or keeping for sale intoxicating liquor except as authorized in the act. The second clause of the same section provides that the act shall not apply to certain sales of cider and native wines, or to the furnishing liquor in one's own dwelling unless under the circumstances specified. The respondent claims that the information is fatally defective, in that it does not show by proper averment that the liquor referred to therein was not of the kinds specified in the second clause of the section to which the prohibition does not apply. Such averment was unnecessary. It is only when the exception in a penal statute is so incorporated with the enactment as to constitute a material part of the definition or description of the offense that it need be negated in the information; otherwise, it is matter of defense merely. To illustrate: In an indictment under a peddler's license act which excepted from its operation goods manufactured in this state. It was held, in State v. Hodgdon, 41 Vt. 139, that it was not necessary to aver that the goods peddled were not manufactured in this state. Under a statute prohibiting the killing of deer, the third section of which provided that it should not apply to deer partially or wholly domesticated, it was held, in State v. Norton, 45 Vt. 253, that it was unnecessary to aver that the deer referred to was not domesticated. In a prosecution for bigamy, under a statute one section of which provided that it should not apply to certain persons therein specified, it was held unnecessary, in State v. Abbey, 29 Vt. 60, 67 Am. Dec. 754, to negative the exception by averment. In a prosecution under V. S. 711, which requires children between certain ages to be sent to the public schools unless they belong to the classes therein specified, it was held, in State v. McCaffrey, 69 Vt. 85, 37 Atl. 234, to be unnecessary to negative the exceptions in the statute. The same result was reached in State v. Bevins, 70 Vt. 574, 41 Atl. 655, where the question is sufficiently discussed. If further authorities were required, reference might be had to Becker v. State, 8 Ohio St. 391, Com. v. Hart, 11 Cush. 130, and Com. v. Gagne (Mass.) 26 N. E. 449, 10 L. R. A. 442, wherein this very question was decided.

The respondent insists that the information should show how, where, and what kinds of liquors were kept or exposed for sale. It was not necessary to show how it was kept or exposed, for the statute which creates the offense fully defines it in clear and unmistakable terms, and the charge here is in the terms of the statute. Nothing more is required. State v. Jones, 33 Vt. 443; State v. Cook, 38 Vt. 437; State v. Hodgson, 66 Vt., at page 150, 28 Atl. 1089. The information does show where the liquor was kept and exposed—at Hardwick, in the county of Caledonia. This averment is sufficient. State v. Sutor, 78 Vt. —, 63 Atl. 182. It was unnecessary to specify the kinds of liquor kept or exposed. State v. Reynolds, 47 Vt. 297.

The respondent attacks the constitutionality of the act on the ground that the search and seizure clauses thereof in no wise provide for a notice and hearing before forfeiture, and so deprive a person of his property without due process. But the respondent, not being affected by the search and seizure clauses, is not in a position to challenge their constitutionality (State v. Scampini, 77 Vt. 92, 59 Atl. 201), unless those clauses are of such a character that their invalidity would vitiate the whole act. For, as was recently pointed out in the Scampini Case, and again in State v. Abraham, 78 Vt. 53, 61 Atl. 766, it is only when the invalid provision is so interwoven with the other provisions of the enactment as to constitute an essential element of its scheme, and is one without which the act would be incomplete and unenforceable according to the legislative intent, that it vitiates the whole. These clauses are not of that character, and can be rejected without marring the legal symmetry of what remains. This was so held in State ex rel. Potter v. Snow, 3 R. I. 64. So we decline to pass upon the constitutionality of the provisions complained of, since the respondent could gain nothing thereby, and hence is not in a position to raise the question.

Judgment affirmed, and cause remanded.

STATE v. WEBBER.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Caledonia.
March 2, 1906.)

1. PERJURY—INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

An indictment for perjury in the form prescribed by V. S. 5417, form 49, is not demurrable for failing to allege that defendant was sworn by a person legally qualified to administer the oath, as the allegation that defendant committed the crime of perjury implies an oath legally administered.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Perjury, § 77.]

2. INDICTMENT — SUFFICIENCY — STATUTORY FORMS—CONSTITUTIONALITY.

The legislature may prescribe the form of indictments, providing it does not contravene the constitutional provisions.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Indictment and Information, § 90.]

3. SAME — CONSTITUTIONAL REQUIREMENTS — SETTING OUT CAUSE AND NATURE OF ACCUSATION.

An indictment for perjury alleged to have been committed before the grand jury, and which does not specify the subject-matter of the investigation then being pursued by the grand jury, is violative of Const. art. 10, guaranteeing to an accused the right to demand the cause and nature of the accusation against him.

Exceptions from Caledonia County Court: Loveland Munson, Judge.

Henry Webber was indicted for perjury. A demurrer to the indictment was overruled, and defendant brings exceptions. Demurrer sustained.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

Frank D. Thompson, State's Atty., and David E. Porter, for the State. Taylor & Dutton, for respondent.

POWERS, J. This is an indictment in two counts charging the respondent with perjury before the grand jury of Caledonia county at its June session, 1905. The indictment and each count thereof is demurred to: and we are called upon to determine the sufficiency of the statutory form (V. S. 5417, form 49), in conformity to which this indictment is drawn.

The first ground of demurrer urged by the respondent is that neither count contains a sufficient allegation that the respondent was sworn before the grand jury by a person legally qualified to administer the oath. The first count is entirely silent on this subject. The second alleges that the respondent was "sworn by and before said grand jury to tell the whole truth," etc. Each count alleges that the respondent "committed the crime of perjury," and under the decision in State v. Camley, 67 Vt. 322, 31 Atl. 840, this is all that is required in respect of the respondent's being sworn. A direct averment that he was sworn is not necessary, since the term "perjury," ex vi termini, implies an oath lawfully administered. State v. Corson, 59 Me. 137; State v. Peters, 107 N. C. 876, 12 S. E. 74; State v. Gates, 107 N. C. at page 834, 12 S. E. at page 320. And this is so, whether the crime charged is common-law perjury or statutory false swearing; for in this respect they are essentially the same.

It is further urged that the indictment is fatally defective because neither count specified the subject-matter of the investigation then being pursued by the grand jury. On this point the Camley Case is not authority, for the question was not there involved; and, as was pointed out in State v. Rowell, 70 Vt. 405, 41 Atl. 430, that decision went no farther than to cover certain elements of the crime itself. The respondent insists that the indictment here and the form prescribed by the statute are insufficient to meet the requirements of the Constitution, and that therefore the Legislature had no authority to establish its sufficiency. The Legislature may simplify and mold the form of indictments at pleasure, provided in so doing it does not contravene the constitutional provisions and leaves enough to meet the constitutional requirements. State v. Comstock, 27 Vt. 553. But this power of the Legislature is thus limited, and if, as claim-d by the respondent, this indictment does not sufficiently apprise him of the cause and nature of the accusation brought against him, as required by article 10 of the Constitution of the state, it is fatally defective, notwithstanding the Legislature has declared that such an indictment shall be sufficient. Is it necessary, then, in order to meet this requirement and to sufficiently inform this respondent of the cause and nature of the charge, to specify the matter then under consideration by the grand jury? We think it is. The highest degree of certainty is not required, but the charge must be set forth with such accuracy of circumstance as will apprise him with reasonable certainty of the nature of the same, that he may intelligently prepare to meet it, and, if convicted, successfully plead his conviction in a subsequent prosecution therefor. This must not be left to conjecture or inference. It must appear by positive averment. In no other way can a respondent get the full benefit of this salutary provision of the Constitution. It is strongly intimated, though not decided, in Commonwealth v. Pickering, 8 Grat. (Va.) 628, 56 Am. Dec. 158, that in charging perjury committed before a grand jury the particular inquiry then before that jury must be set out in the indictment; and it is expressly held in Commonwealth v. Taylor, 96 Ky. 394, 29 S. W. 138, that such allegation is necessary to fully apprise the accused of the nature of the charge against him.

The pro forma judgment is reversed, the demurrer sustained, the indictment adjudged insufficient and quashed, and the respondent let go without day.

MIXER v. HERRICK et al.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Windham. Feb. 2, 1906.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREETS—DEFECTS—LIABILITY OF ABUTTING OWNER.

Where a hole in a sidewalk in front of defendants' property was made with the consent of the municipal authorities having power to grant such consent, defendants were liable for injuries sustained by a defect in the covering thereof only on proof of negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 1692.]

2. SAME—COMPLAINT—NOTICE.

Where, in an action for injuries to a pedestrian by the alleged defective covering of a hole in a sidewalk in front of defendants' property, the declaration charged that defendants for a long time prior thereto had owned the adjoining premises and that a hole in the sidewalk had been used by them, their agents and tenants, as a means of entering the basement of the building, that the hole had been covered by an iron grate which had not been safely protected, in that the pins on which the grate rested were so short that the grate would slip therefrom and fall into the hole, such allegations were sufficient to charge defendants with notice of the defect.

Exceptions from Windham County Court; George M. Powers, Judge.

Action by Roy H. Mixer, by his next friend, against J. Newton Herrick and others. From an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint, defendants bring exceptions. Affirmed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, WATSON, and HASELTON, JJ.

Frank E. Barber, for plaintiff. F. D. E. Stowe and Waterman & Martin, for defendants.

WATSON, J. This case is here on demurrer to the declaration, which is in two counts. The declaration is based upon the negligence of the defendants in permitting the hole in the sidewalk in front of their block, and used by them in connection with it on the easterly line of Main street in the East Village of Brattleboro, to be and continue to be insufficiently and defectively covered. It contains no allegation that the existence of the hole was unlawful, or that it constituted an unauthorized obstruction of the sidewalk, and hence a wrong or a nuisance. There is a distinction between an action for injuries suffered by reason of a positive wrong committed by some other person, and an action for injuries sustained by reason of such person's negligence, and this is of the latter kind. Dickinson v. Mayor, etc., 92 N. Y. 584; Clifford v. Dam, 81 N. Y. 52. The general rule is that any unauthorized obstruction or excavation in a public street impairing its safety constitutes a public nuisance, and subjects the person creating or maintaining it not only to indictment, but also to liability in a civil action by any person who, without fault on his part, suffers special injury therefrom, and no question of negligence on the part of the wrongdoer can arise; his act being wrongful. But, when an obstruction or excavation is made with the consent of municipal authorities having power to grant it, as we assume it was in this case, the rule of liability is less severe and rests upon the ordinary principles of negligence. Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 699, 700, 1032; Baggage v. Powers, 130 N. Y. 281, 29 N. E. 132, 14 L. R. A. 398; Jorgensen v. Squires, 144 N. Y. 280, 39 N. E. 373; Calder v. Smalley, 66 Iowa, 219, 23 N. W. 633, 55 Am. Rep. 270. Whether by neglect the obstruction or excavation made with such consent may become a nuisance there is no occasion to inquire. The case of Buchanan v. Town of Barre, 66 Vt. 129, 28 Atl. 878, 23 L. R. A. 488, 44 Am. St. Rep. 829, relied upon by the defendant, is not in conflict with this doctrine. There the plaintiff sought to recover for injuries received by slipping and falling on the sidewalk in the village of Barre, in consequence of its slippery condition, at a point two to four feet from the steps of the town hall or opera house, when going there to attend an entertainment given by an opera company. It was held that the plaintiff could not recover, since (1) there was no statutory liability on the part of the town or village, and (2) there was no liability consequent on the fact that the defendant owned the opera house and rented it on the occasion in question to the opera company, receiving rent therefor; for, considered as a private individual, the defendant had no control of the sidewalk which was a part of the public street, owed no duty to the plaintiff in respect to its condition, and consequently was under no liability for its defects.

It is urged that the declaration contains no allegation that the defendants had notice or knowledge of the defect complained of, which it is argued is necessary to render them liable in this action. Assuming, but not deciding, that it must appear from the declaration that the defendants did have such notice or knowledge, yet the second count is sufficient. It is there alleged that the defendants, at the time in question and for a long time prior thereto, owned, possessed, and occupied the premises and building described therein, and that there was, and had been for a long time prior thereto, a certain hole in the sidewalk, etc., the same being used by the defendants, their agents and tenants, as a means of entering the basement of said building with merchandise and other articles of personal property. It is averred that the hole was three feet by three feet and about four feet deep; that it then was, and for a long time had been, covered by an iron grate, when not in use by the defendants, their agents or tenants, for the purposes aforesaid. The alleged negligence of the defendants consisted in their failure to keep the hole safely protected and securely covered, in that the iron pins on which the grate rested were so short, and the grate was so small, that the latter would slide and slip from the iron pins and fall into the hole. This defect, if it existed, was patent, and we think the allegations of the defendants' occupancy of the premises and of their use of the hole sufficiently show that they had notice of the condition of the grate and of the pins which supported it. It thus appearing that the defendants had such notice, an express averment thereof was unnecessary. Gould's Pl. Ch. 111, § 8. The second count shows a cause of action, and is sufficient.

Since the demurrer is to the declaration, and one count is sufficient, the demurrer must be overruled.

Judgment affirmed, and cause remanded.

MANLEY v. VERMONT MUT. FIRE INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Windham. Feb. 2, 1906.)

1. ACCORD AND SATISFACTION — UNEXECUTED ACCORD.

An unexecuted accord is no bar to an action on the original undertaking.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 1, Cent. Dig. Accord and Satisfaction, § 116.]

2. SAME—PROMISE—ACCEPTANCE.

A fire loss was adjusted, payment to be made according to insurer's rules. No dispute having arisen, defendant mailed a notice that its directors had allowed the sum stated, and inclosed a receipt informing plaintiff that the company's check would be forwarded on the return of such receipt. No proof of tender of such check having been made, plaintiff subsequently filed additional proofs of loss, purporting to cover articles not included in the original proofs and omitted by mistake, after which a tender of the amount called for by the original proof of loss, with interest and costs, was made. Held that, defendant's promise to pay the loss as originally proved not having been accepted in satisfaction, the agreement amounted to a mere executory accord, which was no satisfaction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 1, Cent. Dig. Accord and Satisfaction, § 116.]

Exceptions from Windham County Court; John H. Watson, Judge.

Action by Prucius W. Manley against the Vermont Mutual Fire Insurance Company. From a judgment for defendant for costs after tender, plaintiff brings exceptions. Reversed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, START, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

F. D. E. Stowe, for plaintiff. E. L. Waterman, J. L. Martin, and E. W. Gibson, for defendant.

POWERS, J. The plaintiff took out a fire insurance policy in the defendant company, covering certain property in Dummerston. On the 13th day of July, 1902, during the life of the policy, the property was totally destroyed by fire. The next day the plaintiff gave the company's agent at Brattleboro notice of the fire, and, with the assistance of the defendant's regular adjuster, who happened to be in the vicinity, made out, on blanks furnished by the adjuster, a sworn proof of loss in due form showing, among other things, four items of damage, aggregating, according to the plaintiff's valuation, $500.37, to which was appended the following statement, signed by the plaintiff: "It is hereby agreed that if the said company [defendant] allow the sum of $500.37 on this claim it shall be accepted by the undersigned as a full, final adjustment of the same. Payment to be made agreeable to the rules and regulations, and in accordance with the act of incorporation and by-laws of said company. The amount allowed to be cancelled from the policy." No question, controversy or dispute arose between the adjuster and the plaintiff as to the company's liability for the loss, or the amount of damage suffered by the plaintiff as shown by the proof of loss, nor has the company since questioned its liability for that amount. On the 4th day of August, 1902, the defendant mailed to the plaintiff a notice that the directors had allowed the sum stated, inclosing a receipt in full for him to execute and return, and informing him that the company's check would be forwarded to him upon the return of such receipt properly executed, which notice was received by the plaintiff in due course of mail. It was claimed at the trial below by the defendant's counsel that this receipt was signed by the plaintiff and returned to the company, agreeably to such notice, and as this was not denied and was apparently treated by the court as a concession of fact, we so regard it, though no evidence concerning the receipt was received.

It was alleged in the defendant's notice of special matter, filed with the general issue, that on the 8th day of September, 1902, the defendant mailed to the plaintiff its check for the amount called for by the proof of loss, which the plaintiff claimed was never received by him, and that on the 17th day of October, 1902, the defendant executed another check for the same amount and offered it to the plaintiff, with interest from the date the loss became payable, which the plaintiff declined. Allusion was made to these checks by the defendant's counsel in the trial below, but the plaintiff's counsel expressly denied that the check was ever tendered to the plaintiff, and no proof was made concerning either of them, so we do not regard them as in the case. On the 27th day of December, 1902, the plaintiff filed with the company an additional proof of loss purporting to cover articles of personal property not included in the original proof and omitted therefrom by mistake. Payment of this loss became due according to the rules and charter of the company, October 14, 1902. This suit was brought January 17, 1903, and on August 6, 1903, a tender of the amount called for by the original proof of loss, with interest and costs to that date, was duly made by the defendant, and the same kept good as required by law. On these facts, the trial court held the agreement of July 14th, above recited, to be binding upon the plaintiff, and ordered a verdict for the defendant to recover its costs accruing after the tender.

It is a familiar rule that an unexecuted accord is no bar to an action on the original undertaking. Bryant v. Gale, 5 Vt. 416; Rising v. Cummings, 47 Vt. 345; Welch v. Miller, 70 Vt. 108, 39 Atl. 749; Gowing v. Thomas, 67 N. H. 390, 40 Atl. 184. The agreement here relied upon is an accord executory, unless the plaintiff accepted the defendant's promise to pay (treating the notice of August 4th as such) in satisfaction of his claim. For, while the general rule is as just stated, that the accord must be executed in order to discharge the obligation, it is equally well settled that when the creditor accepts the mere promise of his debtor to perform some act in the future in satisfaction of the debt, the mere promise itself, without performance, is sufficient to extinguish the debt. Hard v. Burton, 62 Vt. 322, 20 Atl. 269; Gowing v. Thomas, supra; note to Harrison v. Henderson (Kan.) 100 Am. St. Rep., at page 433. To have this effect, however, the new promise must be one legally binding, operating to extinguish the existing claim, which can be enforced in substitution therefor. An essential element of such an agreement—like any other contract—is a legally sufficient consideration. But, if one promises to do what he is already legally bound to do, the promise is nude. It creates no new duty and cannot support an action; nor does it afford a consideration for a promise by the other party. Wheeler v. Wheeler, 11 Vt. 60; Cobb v. Cowdery, 40 Vt. 25, 94 Am. Dec. 370. See, also, Chase v. Soule, 76 Vt., at bottom of page 357, 57 Atl., at page 755. Of this character is the agreement in question. As the matter stood at the time it was entered into, the defendant owed the plaintiff $500.37, the sum specified therein, payable in 90 days thereafter. So the plaintiff agreed to accept just what he was bound to accept, and the company agreed to pay just what it was bound to pay, both at the time and in the manner specified in the original contract. Neither yielded anything. Neither gained anything. The new agreement resulted in no advantage to the one or detriment to the other. It was not a compromise as was the case in Insurance Co. v. Chesnut, 50 Ill. 111, 99 Am. Dec. 492; for there was no disagreement, and hence there was nothing to compromise. Insurance Co. v. Sweetser, 116 Ind. 370, 19 N. E. 159.

The adjustment agreement was without consideration, and revocable, by either party to it, at any time before full performance. It was a mere accord without satisfaction, and does not bar an action on the policy. Vining v. Insurance Co., 89 Mo. App. 311; Giboney v. Insurance Co., 48 Mo. App. 185. The question here decided was not considered in Powers v. Insurance Co., 68 Vt. 390, 35 Atl. 331. That case was argued and determined without allusion to the validity of the partial adjustment.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

JOHNSON v. BOSTON & M. R. R.
(Supreme Court of Vermont. Windsor. Feb. 2, 1906.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO BRAKEMAN—LOW BRIDGES—ASSUMED RISK.

Plaintiff, a brakeman on defendant's railroad, as his train approached a low bridge of which he had knowledge, lay face downward, prone on the car on which he was riding, that he might pass under the bridge in safety. He was surrounded, however, by a cloud of smoke and steam so dense that it cut off his view of objects about him, and, being choked by the smoke, he raised his head to catch his breath, and came in violent contact either with the bridge or ice hanging therefrom, and was injured. Plaintiff had knowledge that the engine drawing the train had been leaking steam in unusual quantities ever since the train was started, and that defendant's engines generally were in bad condition in that respect at the time of the accident. Held, that plaintiff assumed the risk and was not entitled to recover.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 84, Cent. Dig. Master and Servant, § 590.]

2. SAME—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

In an action for injuries to a brakeman while passing under a low bridge, plaintiff's testimony that he thought that he was struck by ice on the bridge, in the absence of anything else in the record to show whether plaintiff's opinion was well-founded, was insufficient to establish that the presence of ice was the cause of the accident, or that the presence of such ice as might have been on the bridge at the time was unusual.

3. SAME—NEGLECTENCE—FELLOW SERVANTS.

A railroad fireman is a fellow servant of a brakeman on the same train, precluding the brakeman from recovering for injuries sustained by the fireman's negligence in throwing fresh coal into the boiler, contrary to custom, when the train was on a downgrade and while the brakemen were required to be on top of the cars, thereby causing a dense volume of smoke and gas to be emitted, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 84, Cent. Dig. Master and Servant, §§ 501, 504.]

Exceptions from Windsor County Court; Loveland Munson, Judge.

Action by Samuel Johnson against the Boston & Maine Railroad. A verdict was directed in favor of defendant. Judgment was rendered thereon, and plaintiff brings exceptions. Affirmed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, START, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

R. E. Stevens and Frank Plumley, for plaintiff. Hemton & Stickney, for defendant.

POWERS, J. The plaintiff seeks damages for injuries sustained in the defendant's service at Lebanon, N. H., on January 2, 1902. At that time he was, and for more than 11 years prior thereto had been, employed by the defendant as a freight brakeman, running usually between Concord, N. H., and White River Junction, Vt. During all that time there had been maintained at Lebanon an overhead bridge spanning the defendant's track, so low as to endanger one passing under it on the top of a freight car and compel him either to descend between the cars or lie flat upon the car to escape its perils. On the day named the plaintiff's train reached Lebanon between 8 and 9 o'clock in the evening. It was a moonlight night, and freezing. From Lebanon toward White River Junction the defendant's road is descending, and agreeably to the defendant's rule the plaintiff was at his post on top of the fourth car from the engine as the train left the station at Lebanon and approached this dangerous bridge. The plaintiff knew all about the bridge and its dangers, and being then mindful of its perils, in conformity with a custom which he had observed during the entire period of his employment on the road, as the train approached the bridge, he lay face downward prone upon the car, that he might pass under in safety. He was surrounded with a cloud of smoke and steam so dense as to completely envelop him and cut off his view of objects about him, and, being choked by the smoke, steam, and gas from the engine, he raised his head to catch breath, and came into violent contact with the bridge itself, or the ice depending therefrom, and was severely injured. A verdict was directed for the defendant in the court below, and to that direction the plaintiff excepted.

This accident happened in New Hampshire, but we need not pause to consider whether we are to apply the law of that state or our own; for upon the questions raised by this record their decisions are in entire accord with ours. The law of the case is found in the rule, variously stated in the different cases, but, so far as applicable here, amounting to this: The servant assumes, not only the risks ordinarily incident to his employment, but such unusual and extraordinary risks as he knows and comprehends. Carpenter's Adm'r v. Railroad Co., 78 Vt. 336, 50 Atl. 1099; Morrisette v. Railroad Co., 74 Vt. 232, 52 Atl. 520; Kilpatrick v. Railroad Co., 74 Vt. 288, 52 Atl. 531, 93 Am. St. Rep. 887; Leazott v. Railroad (N. H.) 45 Atl. 1084; Burnham v. Railroad (N. H.) 44 Atl. 750. So it is that a servant, when in the course of his employment a special and obvious risk is presented to him—one not ordinarily incident to the business—may, as a rule, decline to accept it; but, if he choose to encounter it, he assumes it. And this is so, though the risk arises from the negligent performance of the master's duties. Tibbot v. Sims (Pa.) 62 Atl. 107; Furnace Co. v. Abend, 107 Ill. 44, 47 Am. Rep. 425. This case, then, so far as the dangers arising from the low bridge are concerned, comes within the decisions in Carbine's Adm'r v. Railroad, 61 Vt. 348, 17 Atl. 491, Allen v. Railroad, 69 N. H. 271, 39 Atl. 978, and many such cases. For the plaintiff knew all about the bridge and the dangers arising from it, and by continuing in the service had assumed these as among those incident to his employment. Indeed, this proposition is not seriously questioned; but the plaintiff insists that he was at the time of the accident subjected to an unusual and extraordinary hazard, in that the engine hauling this train was defective, and leaked steam in extraordinary volume; that this was a condition which ought not to have existed, and would not have existed but for the negligence of the defendant, and consequently was not a danger assumed by him; and that this condition was a proximate cause of the injury, and affords a legal basis for a recovery. And so it does, unless, as we have seen, the condition and its dangers were known to and voluntarily incurred by him. That the condition of this locomotive was as plaintiff claims, and that such condition resulted from the negligence of the defendant, is not denied. But the record shows that its condition had been the same in respect to leaking steam in unusual quantities all the way from Concord. Not only that, but it appears that the engines generally on the defendant's road were in bad condition in the respect indicated at the me of this accident. All this was known to the plaintiff. The risk of being blinded and choked by the usual volume of smoke and steam necessarily emitted from the locomotive while passing under the low ridge was one of the ordinary hazards of the service. Hardy v. Railroad, 68 N. H. 36, 41 Atl. 179. The increased danger arising from an engine leaking unusual quantities of steam was as obvious to the plaintiff as to the defendant; and it must be held that the plaintiff, by continuing in the service with full knowledge, assumed the increased hazard—that of passing under a dangerously low bridge while enveloped in an unusual cloud of steam emitted from a leaky engine.

It is further insisted by the plaintiff that there was evidence in the case tending to show that the plaintiff was struck by the ice depending from the bridge, and that this affords evidence of the defendant's negligence sufficient to sustain a recovery. The only evidence on this subject was the statement of the plaintiff to the effect that he thought that he was struck by the ice on the bridge, and here is nothing in the record to show whether this opinion was well-founded or otherwise. Nor is there anything in the record tending to show that the condition in this respect at the time of the accident was unusual. For aught that appears, it was usual for ice to form on the bridge as it had that night. It was incumbent on the plaintiff to show this—to show an unusual condition—over the ordinary condition in this respect was, like the others, covered by his assumption of risk. Nor would the negligence of the fireman, if any, in throwing into the boiler fresh coal on a downgrade while the brakemen had to be on top of the cars, contrary to the custom of the fireman, thereby causing a dense volume of smoke and gas to be emitted, avail the plaintiff. For this would be the negligence of a fellow servant, not shown to have been incompetent, which could not form the basis of a recovery.

Judgment affirmed.

WALTER A. WOOD REAPING & MOWING MACH. CO. v. ASCHER.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Feb. 13, 1906.)

GUARANTY—CONSTRUCTION.

Where one guaranties the payment of a note, and not merely its collectibility, he is liable when it is not paid at maturity, without a showing that the payee exhausted his remedies against the principal or that the principal was insolvent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 25, Cent. Dig. Guaranty, §§ 87-90.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kent County; Edwin H. Brown, Judge.

Action by the Walter A. Wood Reaping & Mowing Machine Company against Marcus J. Ascher. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRIS-

COE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Hope H. Barroll and James P. Gorter, for appellant.

SCHMUCKER, J. The appellant corporation sued the appellee in the circuit court for Kent county upon his written guaranty of the payment of the promissory note of C. R. Atkinson. The defendant pleaded the general issue. At the trial of the case before the court without a jury the plaintiff's prayer was rejected, and the defendant's prayer, asserting the want of legally sufficient evidence to entitle the plaintiff to recover, was granted. A verdict and judgment were entered for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

The note was in the following form: "$100. Chestertown, September 1, 1901. On or before the first day of September, 1902, I, —, of Chestertown post office, Kent county, Md., for value received, promise to pay to the order of the Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Machine Co. one hundred dollars, payable at Chestertown National Bank, Chestertown, Md., with interest at legal per cent. per annum from September 1, 1901, until paid. C. R. Atkinson." On the back of this note was written the following guaranty: "For value received I hereby guaranty the payment of the within note. Demand for payment, protest, and notice of protest waived. Marcus J. Ascher." The signatures to the note and the guaranty were admitted, and there was evidence tending to show that the note had been given by its maker in part payment for a mowing machine sold to him by Ascher as the plaintiff's agent.

The only bill of exceptions in the record is to the rulings of the circuit court upon the prayers. The plaintiff offered one prayer, which asked the court to rule as matter of law that if it appeared from the evidence that the note in question was executed by Atkinson and the guaranty thereon was executed by Ascher, and the note was then passed to the plaintiff in part payment for the machine, and that no portion of the note was ever paid, then the verdict must be for the plaintiff for the amount of the note and interest, less any credits thereon to which Atkinson appeared to be entitled. This prayer the court rejected, and granted the one of the defendant, asserting that there was no legally sufficient evidence to entitle the plaintiff to recover. We have not the benefit of any expression by the learned judge below of the views which led to his action upon these prayers, nor do we find in the record any sufficient support for that action. No brief was filed in this court on behalf of the appellee, and the case was submitted to us by both parties without argument. It is stated, however, in the brief filed by the appellant, that the judge who heard the case was of the opinion that the guaranty sued on was a conditional one, and that therefore the plaintiff's case was defective, because it had offered no evidence tending to show either the exhaustion by it of its remedies against the maker of the note before suing the guarantor or the insolvency of the maker.

If such was the view of the case entertained by the judge of the circuit court, he fell into an error. The guaranty is in terms predicated upon no contingency, nor is it merely one of the collectibility of the note. It is a distinct and unequivocal guaranty of the payment of that obligation. Such a guaranty is uniformly treated by the leading text-books as an absolute one. 2 Randolph on Com. Paper (2d Ed.) c. 28, par. 850; Daniel on Negotiable Instruments (5th Ed.) p. 799; Brandt on Suretyship and Guaranty, vol. 1, § 220; Stearns on Suretyship, § 61; 14 A. & E. Encycl. of Law, p. 1142, where it is said upon the authority of many cases that "the most usual form of absolute guaranty is that of payment." In Townsend v. Cowles, 31 Ala. 429, the court held the words, "I guaranty the payment of the within," indorsed on a promissory note and signed by the defendant, to constitute an absolute engagement to pay the debt when due on default of the maker, and permitted the holder of the note to recover from the guarantor without proof of having attempted to recover of the maker. In Hungerford v. O'Brien, 37 Minn. 307, 34 N. W. 161, it was held that the indorsement on a note of the words, "For value I hereby guaranty the payment of the within note to Cassie Hungerford or bearer," constituted an absolute guaranty. The court in that case said: "The nature of the obligation of the guarantor is affected by the character of the principal contract to which the guaranty relates. The note expresses the absolute obligation of the maker to pay the sum named at the specified date of maturity or before. The guaranty of the payment of the within note imported an undertaking, without condition, that in the event of the note not being paid according to its terms—that is, at maturity—the guarantor should be responsible. The nonpayment of the note at maturity made absolute the liability of the guarantor, and an action might at once have been maintained against him without notice or demand. Such was the effect of the unqualified guaranty of the payment of an obligation which was in itself absolute and perfect and certain as respects the sum to be paid and the time when payment should be made, all of which was known to the guarantor and appears upon the face of the contract. The liability of the guarantor thus becoming absolute by nonpayment of the note, the neglect of the holder to pursue such remedies as he might have against the maker (the guarantor not having required him to act) would not discharge the already fixed and absolute obligation of the guarantor, nor would neglect to notify the guarantor of the non-payment have such effect." The same doctrine has been asserted or recognized by this court in Heyman v. Dooley, 77 Md. 165, 166, 26 Atl. 117, 20 L. R. A. 257, Emerson v. C. Aultman & Co., 69 Md. 135, 14 Atl. 671, and Mitchell v. McCleary, 42 Md. 377.

The judgment appealed from must be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

Judgment reversed, with costs, and new trial awarded.

PRESTON, Building Inspector, v. LIKES, BERWANGER & CO.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Feb. 13, 1906.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — OFFICERS — GRANT OF FRANCHISE TO USE STREET.

Baltimore City Charter (Acts 1898, p. 290, c. 123), § 37, as amended by Acts 1900, p. 117, c. 109, requiring grants of franchises to use streets to be by ordinance referred to the board of estimates, provided that the right to use them for bay windows, hitching posts, areaways, steps, planting trees, storm doors, drains and drainpipes, stands, or other such temporary or similar uses may be granted by the board of estimates, supersedes a prior ordinance requiring permits for the erection of awnings from the inspector of buildings, so that the right to maintain such an awning can only be granted by the board of estimates.

2. SAME.

An application for a permit to erect in a street an awning with an iron frame and covered with iron and luxfer prisms is not within an ordinance authorizing the inspector of buildings to grant a permit to erect an awning covered with wood, iron, tin, or canvass.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas; Henry Stockbridge, Judge.

Suit by Likes, Berwanger & Co. against Edward D. Preston, inspector of buildings. From a decree awarding a writ of mandamus directed to the inspector of buildings, he appeals. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

S. H. Lanchheimer, for appellant. Wm. Pinkney Whyte, for appellee.

BRISCOE, J. The appellees are the lessees of certain property, known as Nos. 8, 10, and 12, East Baltimore street, in the city of Baltimore, and are engaged in the business of merchant tailors and men's furnishing goods in a building newly erected thereon. On July 12, 1905, they made application to E. D. Preston, building inspector of Baltimore, for a permit to erect an awning over the show windows of the building to protect the goods therein in front of the building, the size to be 10 feet wide by 55 feet long, the rails to be of iron and to be approximately 12 feet above the pavement, to be covered with iron and luxfer prisms, in accordance with Ordinance 116 of the mayor and council of Baltimore, approved July 18, 1895. By the first section of this ordinance it is provided that "it shall not be lawful for any person to erect an awning without first obtaining a permit from the inspector of buildings, for which the applicant shall pay the sum of four ($4) dollars. The awning may be covered with wood, iron, tin, or canvass, and the rails of all awnings shall be at least 8 feet above the pavement." The inspector of buildings declined to issue a permit for the reasons stated in his answer, as follows: First, that under section 37 of the new charter of Baltimore city no right to use the street for the purpose named in the petition can be granted until the application has been considered by the board of estimates. Second, the board has the discretion to grant or refuse the application in any given case; that the application of the petitioners was considered by the board of estimates and refused, because to grant it in the form presented would have meant an undue obstruction to the principal business street of Baltimore city, and the existence of such a structure would be dangerous to life, would impede firemen in case of fire, and by the breaking of glass or some portion thereof pedestrians might be injured and thereby liability imposed upon the city; that the board has uniformly refused to permit structures of the kind on Baltimore street, but has granted applications for the erection of rolling awnings, and is willing to grant such an application to the petitioners. At the trial of the case below a writ of mandamus was directed, requiring the inspector of buildings to issue a permit for the erection of the awning as set out in the petition, and from this order an appeal has been taken.

The first and controlling question to be determined by us is whether Ordinance No. 116 of 1895, or section 37 of the new charter (Acts 1898, p. 290, c. 123, as amended by Acts 1900, p. 117, c. 109), controls, in the granting of a permit for the erection of awnings in the city of Baltimore similar to the one here in controversy. It is conceded that, if the right to erect awnings is to be controlled by Ordinance No. 116, then it was the duty of the inspector of buildings to issue the permits upon compliance with the terms of the ordinance. But, on the other hand, if their erection or construction was within the powers conferred by section 37 of the city charter as amended by the act of 1900, then the petition filed in this case should have been dismissed, because the right to so use the street had not been passed upon by the board of estimates nor authorized by a municipal ordinance. By chapter 109, p. 117, Acts 1900, the Legislature repealed section 37 of the new charter of Baltimore (Acts 1898, p. 290, c. 123) and re-enacted the same with amendments. The section as amended is in part as follows: "Before any grant shall be made by the mayor and city council of Baltimore of the franchise or right to use any street, avenue, alley or highway or the grant of the franchise or right for the use of any public property mentioned in section 7 of this article, the proposed specific grant, with the exception hereafter in this section made, shall be embodied in the form of an ordinance with all the terms and conditions required by the provisions of this article. * * * The ordinance shall after having been introduced in either branch of the city council, and after the first reading, be referred forthwith, by the branch in which the same is offered, to the board of estimates. The board of estimates shall make diligent inquiry as to the money value of the franchise or right proposed to be granted and the adequacy of the proposed compensation to be paid therefor to the city as offered in the ordinance and the propriety of the terms and conditions of the ordinance. The provisions of this section shall apply to the renewal or extension of any franchise or right relating to the use of any of the public property mentioned in section 7 of this article now existing, or which may hereafter be granted to any person or body corporate, provided, that the right to use the streets, avenues, alleys, or other public property by any person or body corporate for bow or bay windows, hitching post, areaways, steps, planting trees, storm doors, drains and drain-pipes, stands, or other such temporary or similar uses, may be granted by the board of estimates for such an amount of money and upon such terms and conditions as the board may consider right and proper. Before the board shall grant any such right, the person or body corporate seeking the same shall file before the board, in writing, an application for such use, and in the application the use desired shall be stated, and what the applicant is willing to pay for the same must be given, and such person or body corporate shall only enjoy such use on the payment of the amount of money named by the board, and on the terms and conditions the board shall prescribe in writing, and no ordinance or advertisement shall be necessary or made in such cases as are named in the proviso of this section."

It will be thus observed that the appellee's right to the relief sought by this proceeding is based upon Ordinance No. 116, approved July 18, 1895, while the appellant rests his contention upon section 37 of the new charter, as amended by the subsequent act of 1900 (Acts 1900, p. 117, c. 109). As this involves a construction of those acts, we will proceed to consider them, in so far as they are applicable to this case. There can be no question that the erection of an awning similar to the one here described involves a right to use the street, and cannot be obtained except by a compliance with the provisions of law. By the new charter (Acts 1898, p. 290, c. 123, § 37) application for a franchise or right to use the streets shall be embodied in the form of an ordinance, and after its introduction in either branch of the city council be referred to the board of estimates for its consideration according to the terms of the charter. Subsequently, by Acts 1900, p. 117, c. 109, this section of the charter was amended, and it was provided as to certain minor privileges that the right to use the streets, avenues, alleys, or other public property by any person or body corporate for bow or bay windows, hitching posts, areaways, steps, planting of trees, storm doors, drain and drainpipes, stands, or such other temporary or similar uses, may be granted by the board of estimates without an ordinance, upon terms and conditions prescribed by the act. The acts of 1898 and 1900 are subsequent to Ordinance 116, approved July 18, 1895, and while the word "awnings" is not specifically mentioned in Acts of 1900, p. 116, c. 109, we think they are manifestly included and comprehended within the meaning of the terms "or similar uses," and must be controlled by section 37 of the city charter, as amended by the act of 1900. The erection of an awning or structure like the one in dispute is clearly as much a use of the street as a bow or bay window, and is therefore covered by the term "or similar uses," set forth in the act just referred to. The obvious intent and purpose of the new charter, as disclosed by an examination of its provisions was to prevent the grant of a franchise or right to use the streets without "full municipal superintendence, regulation and control" and after a careful consideration by the board of estimates. By section 10 of the new charter (Acts 1898, p. 273, c. 123), as amended by Acts 1900, p. 117, it is distinctly provided that before any grant of the franchise or right to use any highway, avenue, street, lane, or alley, or other public property, either on, above, or below the surface of the same, shall be made, the proposed specific grant, except as provided in the proviso to section 37 of this article, shall be embodied in the form of a brief advertisement prepared by the board of estimates, and all the provisions of section 37 of this article shall be complied with. And in Acts 1900, p. 116, c. 109, it is provided, in reference to the minor privileges, that they may be granted by the board of estimates only upon such terms and conditions as the board may consider right and proper. It is quite clear that the provisions of the charter as to the erection of awnings could not be enforced or carried out if the provisions of Ordinance No. 116 should be held to be in force and a subsistence ordinance.

But, apart from this, it will be seen that the application of the appellees here does not fall within the terms of the ordinance relied on. By the express provisions of this ordinance it applies to an awning covered with wood, iron, tin, or canvass, and the rails of all awnings shall be at least eight feet above the pavement. According to the application for the permit and the proof in the case, the awning applied for is to be an iron frame with glass, and "covered with iron and luxfer prisms." So, without discussing the other questions raised on the record, we are of the opinion, for the reasons stated, that this case falls within the terms of section 37 of the city charter as amended by Acts 1900, p. 117, c. 109, and that, inasmuch as the provisions of the act have not been complied with, the order appealed from must be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

Order reversed, and bill dismissed, with costs.

DECOLA v. COWAN et al.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 9, 1906.)

1. NEGLIGENCE—DANGEROUS PREMISES—INJURIES—ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—SUBMISSION TO JURY.

In an action for injuries to a pedestrian from the fall of a brick from a building which defendants were constructing, evidence held sufficient to take the case to the jury.

2. SAME—LIABILITY—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTORS—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to a pedestrian on a public street, caused by the fall of a brick from a building being erected by defendant, evidence held to require the submission to the jury of the question whether or not the defendant contractor having charge of the erection of the building, in employing a codefendant to lay the bricks, gave the latter complete control of the erection of the walls of the building and of the persons employed by him to do the bricklaying.

Appeal from Superior Court of Baltimore City; Danl Girard Wright, Judge.

Action by Frances Decola against John Cowan and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Argued before MCSHERBY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

R. R. Boarman, for appellant. Carroll T. Bond and Thomas Ireland Elliott, for appellees.

SCHMUCKER, J. The appellant sued the appellees in the superior court of Baltimore city to recover damages for an injury claimed to have been caused by a brick falling upon her from a house in course of erection as she was walking on the pavement in front of it. The case was taken from the jury by the court below by granting the prayers to that effect, offered at the close of the plaintiff's testimony, by the defendants Cowan and Berndt. The North Baltimore Construction Company of Baltimore city was originally included among the defendants as the owner of the house from which the brick is alleged to have fallen and that company appeared to the action and filed a plea of non cul., on which issue was joined, but no further notice is taken of it in the record or on the briefs. As there was no evidence tending to make that company liable for the injury complained of, we assume that the suit as to it was abandoned.

The amended declaration, on which the case was tried below, alleges that while the three defendants were together engaged in erecting the building in question the plaintiff was passing along the sidewalk in front of it, using due care and caution, when "a brick or large substance fell or was thrown from the building, being so erected as aforesaid by said defendants, by the carelessness and want of due care of the said defendants, their servants and agents," and struck her on the head and seriously injured her. There is evidence in the record tending to show the following facts: In the year 1901 the defendant Cowan, who was a carpenter and builder, was engaged in erecting a four-story brick apartment house, on a lot of ground at or near the northwest corner of North and Maryland avenues in Baltimore city, under an independent contract with the owner of the lot. Cowan furnished all bricks and mortar required for the building, and employed his codefendant Berndt to lay the bricks at a fixed rate per thousand, and Berndt employed such additional bricklayers as were requisite to enable him to do the work. Cowan testified that he paid Berndt the stipulated price per thousand for laying the bricks, and that Berndt paid the bricklayers who did the work, and that he (Cowan) had nothing to do with the laying of the bricks, other than to see that they were properly laid. Goucher Tase, who was employed by Cowan as "foreman of the job" of erecting the building and had charge of the job, testified that he gave directions about the height, thickness, etc., of the walls to Berndt when he was there, and to his foreman when he was not there, but that Berndt directed the bricklayers "as to the manner of doing their work, in the manner of laying bricks." Tase further testified that he had often seen Berndt pay the bricklayers, but that he had also on one or more occasions seen Cowan pay them.

In the latter part of August, 1901, when the walls of the building had reached about the third story, while the plaintiff and her daughter were walking on the sidewalk of Maryland avenue in front of the south end of the building, something fell upon the head of the mother with such violence that it fractured her skull and inflicted serious injury upon her. She was rendered unconscious by the blow and could give no account of the details of the accident. Oscar E. Ross, who happened at that time to be sitting on a porch on the opposite side of the street, testified: "I saw her hit on the head with a brick. I do not know where it came from. It came out of the air some place in the neighborhood. It was close to that building. I could not see it come off that wall, but I saw her walking along the pavement on the side of that wall. I could not say that I saw the brick come down, but I saw the brick at the time it hit her, and I also saw the brick picked up by somebody. As far as I could see I am almost positive that it was a brick that hit her." He further said that he had been sitting on the porch looking at the workmen laying brick on the wall, and after the accident he noticed that they went to the other end of the building. Rosie Decola, the daughter, testified that as they were walking along the pavement, within two or three feet of the wall, she heard a brick fall, and turned around and saw her mother lying on the ground with a brick alongside of her. The brick and the mother's head were both bloody, and there was blood on the ground. Tase, the foreman of the defendant Cowan, also testified that he was on the street at the northeast corner of the building when the accident occurred, and had his attention called to it by the cry of the injured woman, and that just before the accident there were bricklayers working on the front wall, but that he did not notice them at the time of the accident. There was also the testimony of several physicians touching the nature and extent of the plaintiff's injury.

With this evidence before it the court below erred in taking the case from the jury. The fact of the accident and the resulting injury to the plaintiff were clearly proven. There was also evidence from which the jury, if they believed it, might have found that she was injured by a brick falling from the wall which was being erected under the management of the defendants or their servants. It is true no brick was followed by an eyewitness in its flight from the wall down to the head of the plaintiff, who was passing underneath it; but she was struck on the top of the head, and the witness Ross testified that he saw the brick when it struck her. Her daughter, who was walking by her side, testified that she heard her mother struck, and saw the bloody brick lying by her head on the pavement after she fell down. Bricks, when handled with due care in constructing a wall, do not ordinarily fall to the ground. The erection of walls of brick houses abutting on the sidewalks of public streets is constantly in progress in every city and large town. As was said by the court in Scott v. London Dock Co., 3 H. & C. 696: "Where the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from want of care." In Byrne v. Boadle, 2 H. & C. 722, a barrel of flour fell from an upper window of the defendant's warehouse and injured the plaintiff who was passing on the public street in front of it. A witness saw the plaintiff struck upon the shoulder by the barrel but did not see it until it struck him. Another witness testified: "I saw a barrel falling, I don't know how, but from defendant's." The evidence was held to be sufficient to go to the jury, the court (Pollock, C. B.) saying, at page 727: "Suppose in this case the barrel had rolled out of the warehouse and fallen on the plaintiff; how could he ascertain from what cause it occurred? It is the duty of persons who keep barrels in a warehouse to take care that they do not roll out, and I think that such a case would beyond all doubt afford prima facie evidence of negligence. A barrel could not roll out of a warehouse without some negligence, and to say that a plaintiff who is injured by it must call witnesses from the warehouse to prove negligence seems to me preposterous. So in the building or repairing a house, or putting pots on the chimneys, if a person passing along the road is injured by something falling on him, I think the accident alone would be prima facie evidence of negligence." In the present case the evidence to which we have already alluded was sufficient to call upon the defendants for an explanation of the falling of the brick.

The question next presents itself whether there was any evidence legally sufficient to go to the jury to hold the defendant Cowan, who contracted to erect the whole building and employed Berndt to lay the bricks, liable for the accident. In Bonaparte v. Wiseman, 89 Md. 21, 42 Atl. 919, 44 L. R. A. 482, we said: "The question of the extent to which the employment of an independent contractor to do work which is placed entirely under his control will relieve the employer from liability for injuries resulting to third persons has been much discussed by the courts. The general principle, broadly stated, is that when the work is done by a competent contractor under an agreement which gives him complete control of the work and of the persons employed by him to do it, such persons will be his servants and not those of the employer, and the latter will not be liable for injuries caused by the negligence of the workmen, because they are not his servants and are not under his control." In Deford v. State, to Use of Keyser, 30 Md. 179, our predecessors carefully considered the authorities bearing upon the subject of the liability of the employer of a contractor for injuries resulting from the negligence of the latter's servants. It is there said in the court's opinion: "The greatest difficulty, however, in these cases, is in determining upon the facts who is to be regarded as the master of the wrongdoer. This, of course, depends mainly upon the terms and character of the contract of employment. * * * The terms and manner of employment were, of course, matters of fact for the jury; it being for the court to declare the legal relation that existed between the parties upon any given state of facts."

The evidence in the present case as to the terms and character of the contract of employment of Berndt by Cowan is so conflicting as to present a material issue of fact. No written or verbal contract was proven definitely giving to Berndt complete control of the erection of the walls of the building and of the persons employed by him to do the bricklaying. Berndt himself was not called to the stand, and Cowan's testimony on that subject was: "I had bricklayers to build the walls. Mr. Berndt employed the bricklayers. I employed him to do that work, and he employed the bricklayers. I do not know whether there was a written contract or not. Mostly we get estimate from a bricklayer or subcontractor. We seldom make a written contract such as this you have submitted here a while ago [referring to his own contract to erect the building]. We take his estimate. * * * The estimate would state that he would lay the bricks for so much per thousand. This is a contract." He further testified, as we have already said, that Berndt controlled the manner and method of laying the bricks and he (the witness) had nothing to do with laying them, except to see that they were properly laid. This evidence, taken in connection with that of Cowan's foreman, Tase, presents the question of fact for the jury whether Cowan, in employing Berndt to lay the bricks, gave him complete control of the erection of the walls of the building and of the persons employed by him to do the bricklaying.

The defendant should have been required to proceed with their testimony, if they had any which they desired to submit, and the case should then have been given to the jury, with proper instructions as to the law governing it upon a specified state of facts to be found by them. The judgment for the defendants will be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

Judgment reversed, with costs, and case remanded for a new trial.

HAYS v. CRETIN.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 22, 1906.)

1. MORTGAGES—REDEMPTION—RIGHT OF DOWER.

A widow who has joined in a mortgage in release of dower may redeem, though there has been no legal assignment of dower, and though the husband has made a second mortgage in which the wife did not join.

2. SAME—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT—PAYMENT OF DEBTS.

A widow, redeeming from a mortgage in which she joined, cannot be required to pay a second mortgage in which she did not join, or to pay an open account due the first mortgagee.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 35, Cent. Dig. Mortgages, § 1761.]

3. SAME—BILL TO REDEEM—QUESTIONS INVOLVED.

On a bill by a widow to redeem from a mortgage in which she joined, it is not necessary to consider the rights of heirs at law not parties.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Frederick County, in Equity; James B. Henderson and John C. Motter, Judges.

Action by Emily T. Cretin against James T. Hays. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Vincent Sebold and Wm. P. Maulsby, Jr., for appellant. Hammond Urner and Milton G. Urner, for appellee.

BRISCOE, J. This is a suit in equity, brought in the circuit court of Frederick county by the appellee, the widow of John T. Cretin, deceased, against the appellant, as assignee of a mortgage from Cretin and wife to Clayonia F. Maynard and Fanny Noonan, for an injunction to restrain the assignee from selling the mortgaged real estate and to enforce her equity of redemption as the alleged owner of a dower interest in the land. The injunction and the relief asked by the bill were granted by the court below, and from a decree so granting the relief an appeal has been taken.

It will be necessary for us to briefly state the material facts disclosed by the record, in order to obtain a clear and proper understanding of the case. The bill avers that John T. Cretin, of Frederick county, died intestate on the 6th of December, 1903, seised and possessed of a tract of land situate in that county containing 200 acres, more or less; that the appellee is his widow, and as such is entitled to a dower estate in the land; that on May 24, 1889, Cretin and his wife executed a mortgage of this farm to secure the payment of two promissory notes, dated the 24th day of May, 1889, payable 5 years after date, and given by Cretin to Maynard and Noonan, each for the sum of $2,000; and that the mortgage was subsequently assigned to the appellant. The mortgage debt being overdue, the appellant advertised the property to be sold at public sale on the 13th of February, 1904, to pay the mortgage debt. The bill then avers that on the 10th of February, 1904, the appellee, as owner of the dower interest, offered to redeem the mortgage, and tendered the defendant the sum of $4,800 in legal tender currency in payment and redemption of the mortgage debt, interest, and costs; but the defendant declined to accept the tender and refused to permit her to redeem. The prayer of the bill, in addition to the prayer for general relief, is, first, that the defendant may be enjoined and restrained by injunction from executing the power of sale contained in the mortgage, and from selling or assigning the mortgage debt, pending the proceedings; and, second, that the appellee's equity of redemption may be enforced, and the defendant be required to accept the amount of the mortgage debt, interest, and costs, so tendered and paid into court, and that the appellee may be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee. The defendant, in his answer, admits the allegations contained in the first, second, and third paragraphs of the bill, but denies that the appellee has such a beneficial interest and estate in the mortgaged land as entitles her to redeem. The answer avers that the alleged tender and offer to redeem is not for the purpose of protecting any beneficial interest in the real estate, but is a fraudulent scheme on the part of the appellee to defeat and destroy the rights and interest of those who have a legitimate beneficial interest in and to the land; that the estate of the decedent is largely indebted on other claims, including a second mortgage, in which the widow did not join, of $300, and an unsecured balance due and owing to the appellant. The answer then avers that to grant the relief prayed by the bill would defeat the appellant's rights as second mortgagee and creditor of the estate, and would also destroy the interests of the heirs at law and the other general creditors of the estate.

It appears, then, according to the pleadings and the conceded facts of the case, the principal question raised for our consideration is the legal right of the appellee, the widow of Mr. Cretin, to redeem her interest in the equity of redemption from the first mortgage, in which she joined with her husband. There can be no difficulty, we think, as to the general proposition that a widow who has joined in a mortgage has the undoubted right to redeem, notwithstanding the fact there has been no legal assignment of the dower. This proposition is well settled upon reason and authority, because of the wife's inchoate right of dower and of her interest in the estate. In Jones on Mortgages, vol. 2, § 1067, it is said that a widow who has joined in a mortgage in release of dower may redeem, for she is entitled to dower as against every person except the mortgagee and those claiming under him. She has an undoubted right to redeem, although she has released her dower. And even a wife having only an inchoate right of dower may redeem land from a mortgage in which she has joined with her husband to release dower. In Gatewood v. Gatewood and Others, 75 Va. 413, the court, after citing a number of authorities to sustain the position that a tenant in dower may insist upon the redemption of a mortgage, says that the dower interest of the wife in the husband's estate is such as entitles her to redeem seems too clear for controversy. And it was also said that it may be laid down as a rule of almost universal acceptance that, when there is a mortgage upon real estate, any person who has the right to redeem such mortgage, and actually does redeem it, is entitled for his indemnity to be subrogated to the lien of the mortgage and to hold the land until he is reimbursed to the amount so paid. The case of Davis v. Wetherell, 13 Allen, 60, 90 Am. Dec. 177, and Lamb v. Montague, 112 Mass. 352, are express decisions on this point. In Mantz v. Buchanan, 1 Md. Ch. 202, the Chancellor said: "There can be no doubt that a wife, notwithstanding she joins her husband in the mortgage, may nevertheless take her dower in the lands subject to the mortgage, and that she has a right to redeem, and may call on the personal representatives of her deceased husband to apply the personal assets to the extinguishment of the mortgage debt, so as to free her dower from the incumbrance." And the doctrine enunciated by the court in this case, is approved in Lynn v. Gephart, 27 Md. 547; Bank v. Owens, 31 Md. 327, 1 Am. Rep. 60; Glenn v. Clark, 53 Md. 603; McNiece v. Eliason, 78 Md. 176, 27 Atl. 940; Pomeroy, Equity Juris. 1220; Story's Equity Jurisprudence, vol. 2, § 1023.

But it is contended earnestly by the appellant that the right of redemption in this case should be denied, because the husband in the year 1896 executed a second mortgage to the appellant for $300, by which he conveyed away his equity of redemption in the property in question, and at the time of his death he was not seised of such an estate as the wife could be dowerable. The cases cited and relied upon by the appellant do not maintain the proposition asserted by him. In Bank of Commerce v. Owens, 31 Md. 325, this court said: "But in this case it must be remembered the husband was seised of a legal title, upon which the wife's inchoate right of dower attached by the common law. And can it be said that, pledging this right to secure her husband's indebtedness, she thereby puts it in his power or that of his creditor to defeat it altogether. To this view we cannot yield our assent. The husband may assign the equity of redemption, but no act of his could deprive the widow of the right to redeem to which she is entitled under the common law." Glenn v. Clark, 53 Md. 603. The case of Smith v. Hall, 67 N. H. 200, 30 Atl. 409, is directly in point. In that case the husband and wife executed a mortgage on certain lands to secure a note given by the husband to the Farmington Savings Bank for $641.78. Subsequently the husband executed a second mortgage, in which the wife did not join, to secure a promissory note of $1,000. It was held that the wife was entitled, on redeeming the bank mortgage, to hold the whole estate until the defendant shall repay her the amount of the mortgage, when she will be entitled to have a homestead assigned; that her right to the equity of redemption was not affected by the second mortgage, to which she was not a party. The right of the wife in the case at bar to redeem the land from the first mortgage, in which she joined, notwithstanding the making of the second mortgage by her husband, rests upon her contingent right of dower and her interest in the land. She is entitled to exercise this right in order to protect her dower interest and to prevent a sale of the property. It would be a useless right, indeed, if it could be defeated and destroyed by the bare making of a second mortgage by the husband without her uniting therein. In Pollard v. Noyes, 60 N. H. 184, it is held that a sale of the equity of redemption by the husband did not defeat the wife's homestead right in that equity.

As to the contention that the appellee should be required to pay the second mortgage and the open account due the appellant, we need only say that these claims are not her debts, and she is not liable therefor. Brown v. Stewart, 56 Md. 431; Geiston v. Thompson, 29 Md. 595.

There can be no serious contention as to the tender made by the appellee. The tender was made in the bill and the money was paid into court. The defendant by his answer refused to accept the money as tendered and denied the right of the appellee to redeem.

It will be seen, from what has been said, that we have disposed of all the questions determined by the decree. We concur in the views expressed in the opinion of the court below that "as to the interests of the heirs at law they are not parties to the present proceeding, and we do not see that we are required to consider their rights in the determination of the single question of the right of redemption, as distinguished from that of subrogation." As the view we have taken is decisive of the case, the decree will be affirmed.

Decree affirmed, with costs.

SAFE DEPOSIT & TRUST CO. OF BALTIMORE et al. v. GITTINGS.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 9, 1906.)

1. EQUITY—BILL OF REVIEW—EFFECT OF DECISION ON APPEAL.

Where a decree dismissing a bill for an accounting was reversed, and the trial court entered a decree in conformity with the opinion of the appellate court, a bill of review may thereafter be allowed on the ground of newly discovered evidence.

2. SAME—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where a wife's executor filed a bill for accounting for property transferred to her husband, and he made the defense that it was a gift, and after hearing a decree was rendered in favor of her executor, it was within the discretion of the court to refuse leave to file a bill of review for newly discovered evidence that the proceeds of the property had been invested in specific securities which could be transferred to the executor, which facts were not discoverable by the husband in his invalid and infirm condition of health.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Howard County, in Equity: I. Thomas Jones, Judge.

Suit for accounting by John S. Gittings, as executor of Annie M. Winter, against the Safe Deposit & Trust Company of Baltimore and another, executors of Henry Winter. From an order refusing leave to file a bill of review, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, and BURKE, JJ.

Arthur W. Machen, Jr., and Arthur W. Machen, for appellant trust company. Julian I. Alexander and Bernard Carter, for appellee.

PEARCE, J. This appeal is taken from an order of the circuit court for Howard county as a court of equity passed July 25, 1905, in the case of John S. Gittings, executor of Annie M. Winter, against the Safe Deposit & Trust Company of Baltimore and Arthur W. Machen, executors of Henry Winter, refusing the petition of the said executors of Henry Winter for leave to file a bill of review to review the decree of said court passed in said cause on the 1st day of July, 1905. This litigation originated in a bill filed in 1903 by John S. Gittings, executor of his mother, Annie M. Winter, against Henry Winter, her surviving husband, alleging that Mrs. Winter in the year 1869 delivered to her said husband certain securities, set out in said bill, belonging to her and of the value of about $30,000, to be sold by him and the proceeds to be reinvested as her property, the income thereof to be enjoyed by him during his life, but the corpus to revert to her, if living at his death, or, in the event of her death before him, to go to her personal representatives. The prayer of the bill was that Mr. Winter should be required to return an inventory of the investments thus to be made, and to bring the same into court to be dealt with as should be decreed, and also for general relief. Mr. Winter answered, admitting that he had received all the securities mentioned in the bill except the eight shares of Northern Central Railroad stock, but he denied that he had ever agreed to hold or reinvest the proceeds in her name or for her benefit, and alleged that she had made him an absolute gift of all the securities delivered, and that he had accordingly sold the same for his own account and invested the proceeds in his own name and for his own benefit, together with other funds of his own, and that he could neither return an inventory of the investments of the proceeds of sale of said securities, or bring the same into court. After testimony was taken and hearing had, the plaintiff's bill was dismissed by the circuit court for Howard county. From that decree the plaintiff appealed to this court, which reversed said decree on April 9, 1905 (60 Atl. 634), and remanded the cause, "to the end that further proceedings should be had in conformity with the opinion of this court." That opinion sustained the plaintiff's claim, and declared "that, as the defendant did not invest the securities in his wife's name so that they could be easily identified, and has failed to say in his testimony in what they were actually invested, and at what price; it is but fair that he should be charged for the currency price in New York when the securities were sold; and this amount should be ascertained as $29,000." Pending these proceedings in this court, Mr. Winter died, and his executors were made parties to the case before the passage of the decree in this court. After the case was remanded to the circuit court for Howard county, that court proceeded to decree, "in conformity with the opinion and decree of the Court of Appeals, that the plaintiff recover against the Safe Deposit & Trust Company of Baltimore and Arthur W. Machen, executors of the last will of Henry Winter, deceased, to be paid out of the estate of said deceased, the sum of $29,000, the value, as ascertained by the said court, of the securities of the plaintiff's testatrix converted by the said Henry Winter deceased in his lifetime, and adjudged to have been the property of Annie M. Winter, the plaintiff's testatrix." This decree was passed July 1, 1905, and on the 6th of July the executors of Henry Winter filed in the circuit court for Howard county a petition for leave to file a bill of review, upon the ground of material evidence newly discovered since the passage of said decree. This petition alleged that Arthur W. Machen, one of the said Winter's executors, in April, 1905, being then in San Francisco, received letters testamentary from the proper authority in California to enable him to administer upon certain personal property of Mr. Winter in that state, and there learned that a firm of Parrott & Co., now out of business, had been, in 1869 and 1870, the bankers of Mr. Winter, and in charge of the investment of the proceeds of the securities delivered to him by Mrs. Winter; that Mr. Machen obtained access to the books of said firm which had been carefully preserved, and ascertained therefrom that the proceeds of sale of said securities amounted in gold to the sum of $21,027.50 and in currency to $26,310, which sum, together with the other large sums belonging to Mr. Winter, he invested in 355 shares of the stock of the San Francisco Gas Company (now reorganized as the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company) at a cost of $30,840 in gold, all of which shares constituted a part of his estate at his death, so that such number of said shares as represented the proceeds of sale of Mrs. Winter's securities could now be restored to her estate; and that these particulars were not known to Mr. Winter at the time of the filing of the bill of complaint of Mrs. Winter's executor, nor afterwards in the lifetime of Mr. Winter, nor discoverable by him by the use of any means in his power, in his then invalid and infirm condition of health. It also appeared from said petition that, while this stock was purchased at about $90 per share, its market value at the time of the discovery of these facts had declined to $57 or $58 per share. Mrs. Winter's executor answered this petition, denying that the facts alleged therein were material to the issues raised and decided in the case, and alleging that, even if material, they were obtainable before the passage of the decree of July 1, 1905 by the exercise of reasonable diligence on the part of Mr. Winter, and the petition was refused by the order of July 25th, now appealed from.

In the argument in this court it was contended by Mrs. Winter's executor that the circuit court for Howard county had no jurisdiction to grant leave to file a bill of review, to review a decree of that court passed in pursuance of a decree of this court reversing the former decree of the circuit court for Howard county, and such is the rule in the federal courts, as shown by the cases of Southard v. Russell, 16 How. 547, 14 L. Ed. 1052, and Kingsbury v. Buchner, 134 U. S. 671, 10 Sup. Ct. 638, 33 L. Ed. 1047. In the former case, it was said: "The better opinion is that a bill of review will not lie at all for errors of law alleged on the face of the decree after the judgment of the appellate court. These may be corrected by a direct application to that court, which would amend, as a matter of course, any error of the kind that might have occurred in entering the decree. Nor will a bill of review lie in the case of newly discovered evidence after the publication, or decree below, where a decision has taken place on appeal, unless the right is reserved in the decree of the appellate court, or permission be given on an application to that court directly for that purpose. This appears to be the practice of the Court of Chancery and House of Lords in England; and we think it founded in principles essential to the proper administration of the law and to a reasonable termination of litigation between parties to chancery suits. 1 Vernon, 416; [Stafford v. Bryan] 2 Paige, 45; [Haskell v. Raoul] 1 McCord, Eq. 22; [McCall v. Graham] 1 Hen. & M. 13; Mitford's Pleading, 88; Cooper's Pl. 92; Story's Eq. Pl. 408; [Brewer v. Bowman] 3 J. J. Marsh. 492 [20 Am. Dec. 158]." That case was decided in 1853, and was approved in Kingsbury v. Buchner, supra, decided in 1890.

Notwithstanding, however, the respect which is due and always rendered to the decisions of that tribunal, we cannot adopt that view after a careful examination of the authorities cited in Southard v. Russell. Some of these are cited in 2 Daniell's Ch. Pr. p. 1579, to sustain the opposite view. The author there says: "A bill of review, brought upon new matter, may, it seems, be permitted, even after the decree has been affirmed by the House of Lords"—and refers to Barbon v. Searle, 1 Vernon, 416; Cooper's Eq. Pl. 91, 92; Story's Eq. Pl. 418; and Stafford v. Bryan, 2 Paige, 45. It seems quite clear from the text alone that Mr. Daniell meant the bill should be filed in the court rendering the original decree, and this is confirmed on reference to the authorities he cites. Judge Story, in section 418 of Equity Pleading, says: "A bill of review upon new discovered matter has been permitted even after an affirmance of the decree in Parliament"—and he cites Cooper's Eq. Pl. 92. It cannot be doubted that he refers to the court of original jurisdiction, since he mentions a case where a demurrer was filed to the bill of review, and the demurrer was overruled and the defendant required to answer, which could not properly be done in the appellate tribunal. In 3 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 574, it is said: "After a decision has been rendered by an appellate court and the cause remanded to the court below, the latter court has no authority to entertain a bill of review for error apparent; but, when the ground of review is newly discovered evidence, the jurisdiction is generally conceded." This work is regarded as high authority, and the text is supported by reference to cases from New Jersey, Arkansas, Kentucky, Virginia, West Virginia, Georgia, Illinois, North Carolina, and Maryland. In Griffin's Heirs v. Griffin's Ex'rs, 11 N. C. 403, the court said: "Where a lower court has passed a decree as directed by the appellate court, an application for leave to file a bill of review for newly discovered evidence is properly addressed to the lower court." In Schaefer v. Wunderle, 154 Ill. 577, 39 N. E. 623, it is said: "The application for leave to file a bill to review a decree affirmed by the Supreme Court must be made to the court of chancery where the decree was originally rendered, and not to the Supreme Court." In Reynolds v. Reynolds, Ex'r, 88 Va. 152, 13 S. E. 395, 598, the court held that where the Court of Errors and Appeals has rendered a decree after hearing on the merits, and the decree has been entered on the minutes in accordance with the views of the court, and the record has been regularly remitted to the court below, it has no further jurisdiction of the case, and therefore will not entertain an application for leave to file a bill of review. Such application is to be made to the court of chancery. In King v. Ruckman, 22 N. J. Eq. 551, the court said: "When the judgment of this court on appeal has been rendered after a hearing on the merits, and the record has been regularly remitted to the inferior court, this court has no further jurisdiction in the case." In Putnam v. Clark, 35 N. J. Eq. 145, Chancellor Runyan said: "Stafford v. Bryan, 2 Paige, 45, and Southard v. Russell, 16 How. 547, 14 L. Ed. 1052, have neither the authority of the books nor of adjudged cases for their support. The Court of Chancery has inherent power, without the consent of the appellate tribunal, to review, on the ground of newly discovered evidence, its decree, though it has been passed upon on appeal, and no principle or practice requires that it shall refrain from doing so until the consent or countenance of the superior court shall have been obtained. These propositions are established by the following citations: Needler v. Kendall, cas. t. Finch, 468; Mitford's Pl. 88; Cooper's Pl. 92; 2 Daniell's Ch. Pr. 1579; Story's Eq. Pl. §§ 408-418; 2 Hoff. Ch. Pr. 12; Tommey v. White, 1 H. L. Cases, 166; Flower v. Lloyd, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 297; Haskell v. Raoul, 1 McCord, Eq. 22; McCall v. Graham, 1 Hen. & M. 13." The two English cases cited by Chancellor Runyan put those courts in accord with the current of American authority. In Flower v. Lloyd, plaintiff had obtained a judgment which was reversed on appeal, and he applied to have the appeal reheard with fresh evidence, but it was held, in opinions by Sir George Jessel and Lord Justice James, that the Court of Appeals had no jurisdiction to rehear the appeal, and the same was held in Tommey v. White, 1 H. L. Cases, 166. In all these cases the strength of the position is that appellate courts, without original jurisdiction, exhaust their power in affirming the decree of the lower court, or in reversing it and remanding it for decree in conformity with its opinion, whether with or without further proceedings preliminary to decree. Moreover, our predecessors distinctly decided, in Pinkney v. Jay, 12 Gill & J. 69, that a bill of review for newly discovered evidence will lie in the lower court after affirmance on appeal, and we know of no principle which would discriminate in this regard between an affirmance and a reversal of the decree of the lower court. The reasons upon which that decision rest commend themselves to us as sound, and we must adhere to its authority, notwithstanding our deference to the views of the Supreme Court of the United States.

No question was made at the argument or in the briefs as to the right of appeal from an order refusing leave to file a bill of review, but, as it seems to be settled that the granting or refusing of such leave is left to the sound discretion of the court, the question suggests itself. In Hollingsworth v. McDonald, 2 Har. & J. 238, 3 Am. Dec. 545, and in Burch v. Scott, 1 Gill & J. 393, it was held that the application is addressed to the discretion of the court. There appears to be a diversity of view in the adjudged cases as to whether an appeal will lie from an order granting or refusing such leave. In Ricker v. Powell, 100 U. S. 107, 25 L. Ed. 527, and in Nickle v. Stuart, 111 U. S. 776, 4 Sup. Ct. 700, 28 L. Ed. 599, in both of which there was an appeal from an order refusing leave, the order was affirmed, the court declining to decide that the appeal would lie; but, in the former case, Mr. Chief Justice Waite said that, before a bill of review can be filed, the decree must first be obeyed and performed, and that, if it directs the payment of money, it ought to be paid before the bill of review was filed, though it might be afterwards ordered refunded, citing Judge Story's Equity, and Chancellor Kent in Wiser v. Blachly, 2 Johns. Ch. 488, as authority, and adding that it is only when the bill is for error of law alone that it becomes a matter of right and not of discretion. In this case, however, the execution of an approved appeal bond should be regarded as equivalent to performance of the decree. Without intending to decide that this appeal will lie, we are of opinion that the circuit court exercised a sound discretion in refusing the leave, since the facts set forth in the petition as newly discovered, though unknown to the executors and to their counsel, were facts which were all known to Mr. Winter in his lifetime, and his failure to remember them cannot entitle his executors to insist that they were in fact newly discovered. To allow this case to be reviewed upon the facts alleged would be to make an entire new case, instead of rehearing the old case. Mr. Winter made his defense upon the issue of a gift of the securities in question, to him, and upon that issue the alleged newly discovered evidence is not material. His executors now ask to be allowed to set up a new defense, to enable them to discharge a money decree by the surrender of securities held in his own name, of a less nominal value, and which have since declined in market value about 80 per cent. In Schaefer v. Wunderle, 154 Ill. 577, 39 N. E. 623, the true rule is said to be that, unless there has been an abuse of the fair discretionary power with which the circuit court has been invested in the matter of such application, its decision should not be disturbed. This rule was adopted in Michigan in Stockley v. Stockley, 93 Mich. 307, 53 N. W. 523; and in Craig v. Smith, 100 U. S. 226, 25 L. Ed. 577, the Supreme Court said that Judge Story, in Wood v. Mann, 2 Sumn. 334, Fed. Cas. No. 17,953, stated the rule none too strongly, when he said: "This discretion was to be exercised cautiously and sparingly, and only under circumstances which demonstrate it to be indispensable to the merits and justice of the cause."

Order affirmed, with costs to the appellee above and below.

SAFE DEPOSIT & TRUST CO. OF BALTIMORE et al. v. GITTINGS.

GITTINGS v. SAFE DEPOSIT & TRUST CO. OF BALTIMORE et al.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 9, 1906.)

1. APPEAL—REMAND OF CAUSE—DECREE IN LOWER COURT.

Where, on appeal from a decree dismissing a bill for an accounting, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover $29,000, and the cause was remanded to the lower court for further proceedings in conformity with the opinion of the Court of Appeals, a decree for the plaintiff for $29,000 constituted further proceedings in conformity with the opinion of the Court of Appeals, though Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 5, § 36, authorizes the Court of Appeals to pass a final and effective decree without remanding the cause.

2. INTEREST—COMPUTATION.

Where a wife transferred property to her husband for sale and reinvestment of the proceeds, the income during his life to belong to him, and an action for an accounting for the principal was brought against his executors by her executor, and on appeal from a decree dismissing the bill it was held that her executor was entitled to recover $29,000, the lower court, in rendering a decree in conformity with this opinion, properly allowed interest only from the date of the decree, and not from the death of the husband.

Appeals from Circuit Court, Howard County, in Equity; I. Thomas Jones, Judge.

Bill for accounting by John S. Gittings, executor of Annie M. Winter, against the Safe Deposit & Trust Company of Baltimore and another, executors of Henry Winter. From the decree, cross-appeals are taken. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, and BURKE, JJ.

Arthur W. Machen, Jr., and Arthur W. Machen, for Trust Company and another. Julian I. Alexander and Bernard Carter, for Gittings.

PEARCE, J. This record brings up cross-appeals from a decree of the circuit court for Howard county passed July 1, 1905, in a cause in which John S. Gittings, executor of Annie M. Winter, was plaintiff, and the Safe Deposit & Trust Company of Baltimore and Arthur W. Machen, executors of Henry Machen, were defendants. The facts leading up to the passage of that decree were sufficiently stated in an opinion rendered in another appeal embraced in this record (62 Atl. 1030), and need not be repeated here. The decree of July 1, 1905, was passed in obedience to a decree of this court (60 Atl. 634), reversing a former decree of the circuit court for Howard county, by which the plaintiff's bill had been dismissed, and remanding the cause "to the end that further proceedings may be had in conformity with the opinion of this court." The opinion states that "the object of the bill is in substance to declare the proceeds of certain securities which were derived from a sale of the wife's property, conceded to be her property at the time of her second marriage, but which was subsequently sold and reinvested by the husband in his own name and held by him at the time of his death, to be the property of the plaintiff's testatrix, and to belong to the plaintiff as the legal representative of the wife." It proceeds later on to state, after reviewing the evidence, that, "upon the facts thus disclosed and set out, we are of the opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief sought by his bill," and adds, "as to the question of the measure of recovery in the case, we think the proof shows that the amount realized from the securities when sold in New York was about $29,000. The memorandum in the handwriting of Mrs. Winter shows that they brought $29,000. The defendant, according to the testimony of the plaintiff, admitted in the several conversations with him that they sold for about the amount here indicated. The defendant in his testimony states that they brought in currency between $25,000 and $28,000, but when reduced to gold he realized over $21,000. We agree with the plaintiff's contention that the defendant did not invest these securities in his wife's name so that they could be easily identified, and has failed in his testimony to say in what they were invested, and of what price; it is but fair that he should be charged for the currency price in New York when the securities were sold; and this amount should be ascertained at $29,000." Upon the remanding of the cause with the decree and opinion above mentioned, the circuit court for Howard county proceeded to decree in its own language, "in conformity with the opinion and decree of the Court of Appeals, that the plaintiff recover against the said Safe Deposit & Trust Company of Baltimore and Arthur W. Machen, executors of the last will of Henry Winter, deceased, to be paid out of the goods, chattels, credits, and estate of the deceased, the sum of $29,000, the value as ascertained by the said Court of Appeals of the securities of the plaintiff's testatrix, converted by the said Henry Winter, deceased, in his lifetime, and adjudged by the Court of Appeals to have been the property of Annie M. Winter, the plaintiff's testatrix, together with interest thereon from the date of this decree and the plaintiff's costs of suit in this court and in the Court of Appeals to be taxed by the clerks of said courts respectively"; and then further proceeded to decree in the usual form that the defendants bring into court the money so decreed to be due and recoverable by the plaintiffs, together with the costs of suit.

The question presented by the defendants' appeal, as stated in their brief, is "whether such a decree constitutes further proceedings in conformity with the opinion of this court," and the substance of the argument made in their behalf is that the cause would not have been remanded "for further proceedings if this court had meant merely that a decree for payment of $29,000 should be passed. It may be conceded that under section 36, art. 5, Code Pub. Gen. Laws, this court could, without remanding, have passed a final and effective decree for the payment by defendants to the plaintiff, out of the estate of Mr. Winter, of the sum of $29,000 and costs of suit; but the question presented to us is not in what form has the court decreed what is to be done, but what is the substance of that which it has been decreed shall be done? That section, while permitting the court either to pass a final decree where this can be done, or to remand for further proceedings in its discretion, requires the court in remanding to express the reasons therefor, and also determine and declare the opinion of the court on all points made before it or presented by the record, and it has determined and declared that the plaintiff is entitled not to an accounting, but to a money decree for $29,000. Can it then be material whether the formal mandate for such payment is found in a decree of this court passed under one branch of the discretion reposed in it by section 36, art. 5, Code Pub. Gen. Laws, or in a decree of the circuit court passed upon the remand of the cause under another branch of the discretion reposed by the same section, with specific instructions as to the decree? With sincere respect for the distinguished counsel of defendants whose zeal and ability is so often displayed in this court, we are unable to agree with their contention. The opinion of the court we think was a definite, present ascertainment of the amount for which the defendants were responsible to the plaintiffs, and that as the court, instead of passing its own final decree for payment of that amount, remanded the cause that the circuit court might pass such decree, the passage of such decree by that court was a further proceeding in strict conformity with the decree of this court, and we find no error in the decree of the circuit court in this respect. The plaintiff's appeal is from so much of said decree as adjudges him to be entitled to interest only from the date of the decree, and not from the date of Mr. Winter's death, which occurred January 21, 1905.

It is argued for the plaintiff that, inasmuch as this court found that, under the agreement between Mr. and Mrs. Winter, the proceeds of her securities were to be reinvested as her property and in her name, though he was to be allowed the income during his life, therefore both the principal sum derived from the sale of said securities and all the increment therefrom, except the life estate in the income, always continued to be her property, and that it necessarily follows from this that her executor was entitled to the interest from the cessation of his life estate in the income. This is based upon the theory that interest is a mere incident, or integral part of the debt. This is true where there is an express contract for payment of interest, and in such case interest is recoverable as such as a matter of right up to the time of breach, but not after. 16 Amer. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) p. 999. In the leading case in this state (Newson's Adm'r v. Douglass, 7 Har. & J. 453, 16 Am. Dec. 317) it was held that on bonds, or contracts in writing to pay money on a day certain, or where the money claimed has been actually used, interest is recoverable as matter of right, but that in all other cases the question should be referred to the jury, who may allow it or not in the shape of damages, according to the equity and justice appearing between the parties. In Frank v. Morrison, 55 Md. 409, it was held that a subscription for stock in a corporation to be paid for in installments, at such times as should be called for, did not fall within that class of contracts upon which, under the rule in Newson's Adm'r v. Douglass, supra, interest was recoverable as of right. Equity allows interest in all cases where, under like circumstances, it might be recovered at law. Hammond v. Hammond, 2 Bland, 370. The allowance of interest therefore is discretionary with the court in equity cases where the court takes the place of the jury, unless in the given case interest is recoverable as of right. In the present case, Mr. Winter was using the proceeds of sale of his wife's securities, with her consent during his life, not only to such use, but to the retention by him of the income therefrom. The time of his death could not be known, and until then his use and retention of the income was rightful. When this suit was brought, he defended upon the ground that the securities were an absolute gift to him. His executors must be taken to believe that this defense was made in good faith, and they could not be expected to pay such a sum as here is involved, until the matter was determined adversely to the estate by a court of last resort. To have done so would be a dereliction of duty on their part, the thought of which cannot be imputed to them. Until the decree of this court was made, the right of her executor to recover at all was not established, nor was the amount recoverable definitely ascertained, so that his executors, before the passage of that decree, could not know what sum to pay, if they had desired to pay, nor could her executor have known what sum he was entitled to demand. In Lewis v. Rountree, 79 N. C. 122, 28 Am. Rep. 309, the court said: "It is a rule which may be gathered from the cases that, whenever a debtor has notice, or ought to know that he owes a certain sum, and when he is to pay it, if he fails to pay it, he ought to pay interest. In the present case, although we may assume that the defendant had notice by the commencement of the action, that he was looked to for the payment of damages, yet, as a fact, not only was the amount technically unliquidated, but, owing to the unsettled state of the law, it was uncertain. He could not safely and without risk pay any sum, until it was ascertained by a judgment which he might expect it speedily would be." We think this sound reasoning and applicable to the case before us. Moreover, the opinion of this court ascertained the amount due as $29,000, and said nothing about interest, and in passing its decree the circuit court certainly conformed literally to the opinion and decree of this court in allowing interest only from the date of its own decree. Had it allowed interest from the date of Mr. Winter's death, there can be small doubt that his executors would have appealed upon that ground as not in conformity with the opinion and decree of this court. We find no error in the decree in this respect.

Decree affirmed; costs to be paid by the executors of Henry Winter.

MARYLAND AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE v. ATKINSON, State Comptroller.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 11, 1906.)

1. STATUTES — CONSTRUCTION — LEGISLATIVE INTENT.

The object of statutory construction is to ascertain and effectuate the legislative intent, and that intent must be gathered from the words of the statute alone, if their meaning is plain and intelligible; but, if such meaning is doubtful, it may become necessary to look to contemporaneous circumstances, the evil to be redressed, and the object of the law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Statutes, § 291.]

2. STATES—APPROPRIATIONS—FORFEITURE.

Acts 1902, p. 912, c. 625, §§ 5, 6, appropriated $5,000 for the maintenance of buildings at the agricultural experiment station, the printing of bulletins, etc., and authorized the Comptroller to issue his warrant upon the treasury of the state for the sums appropriated, which should be payable to and expended by the board of trustees of the Agricultural College, and directed the first payment to be made during the fiscal year ending September 1, 1902. Acts 1904, p. 951, c. 557, § 4, appropriated the sum of $6,000 per annum for the formation and support of farmers' institutes, authorized the Comptroller to issue his warrant annually upon the treasury of the state for such sum of money, and declared such sum payable to the order of the Agricultural College on or after the 1st of October of each fiscal year, the first payment to be made during the year ending September 30, 1904. Held, that the appropriations payable during any year were not forfeited by failure to draw the same before the expiration of the fiscal year for which they were appropriated, and, if not drawn during that year, they could be drawn subsequently.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Anne Arundel County; Thomas Jones and Wm. H. Thomas, Judges.

Mandamus proceedings by the Maryland Agricultural College against Gordon T. Atkinson, Comptroller. From an order dismissing the petition, petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, PAGE, BOYD, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, and BURKE, JJ.

Charles H. Stanley, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Bryan and Thomas A. Whelan, Jr., for appellee.

BURKE, J. This is an appeal from an order of the circuit court for Anne Arundel county dismissing a petition for a writ of mandamus to be directed against the appellee requiring him to draw his warrant upon the treasury of the state for the payment of the sums of money specified in the petition.

The Maryland Agricultural College was incorporated by Acts 1856, p. 114, c. 97. The purpose of its creation was the instruction of young men in those arts and sciences indispensable to successful agricultural pursuits. The people finding that industry greatly neglected, and believing it to be the duty and within the power of the Legislature to encourage and promote the farming interests of the state, by the act above mentioned constituted the plaintiff an agricultural college, whose duty it should be, in addition to the usual course of scholastic learning, to instruct young men attending the college, theoretically and practically, in those arts and sciences which, with good manners and morals, should enable them to become intelligent, successful, and scientific farmers, and elevate the state to the position its advantages in soil and climate and the moral and mental capacities of its citizens entitle it to occupy. By the act of incorporation $6,000 per annum was appropriated to the payment of salaries of professors, and for such other purposes as should be found reasonably necessary to promote the welfare and success of the college. The legislation of the state indicates that the people have manifested a deep and abiding interest in the welfare of the college, and have aided its work by generous appropriations, and by other measures calculated to increase its efficiency, and to enable it to accomplish more fully the useful and beneficent purpose of its foundation. Under Acts 1864, p. 109, c. 90, the state board of education became ex officio members of the board of trustees of the college. By Acts 1866, p. 103, c. 53, the state purchased a one-half undivided interest in the college property. By Acts 1868, p. 573, c. 320, the Governor, the Comptroller, the Treasurer, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Delegates, and the Attorney General of the state became ex officio members of the board of trustees, and represented the state's interest in said board, which consists of 18 members. This board is constituted as follows: The six state officials mentioned above, five members elected by the private stockholders of the college, one person from each congressional district of the state, appointed by the Governor by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the United States Secretary of Agriculture. The state holds a mortgage of $15,000 on the stockholders' one-half interest. The college is controlled by the state, and is practically a state institution.

In pursuance of what appears to be a settled policy on the part of the state to contribute to the support of this institution, the General Assembly passed Acts 1902, p. 911, c. 625, and Acts 1904, p. 950, c. 557. The first of these acts set apart various sums for the use of the college, but in this case we are concerned only with sections 5 and 6 (page 912) of that act. These sections read as follows:

"Sec. 5. In order to provide for the maintenance, repairs and improvements of the buildings of the experimental station, to provide for the printing of bulletins, showing the results of the work, and also to provide for the investigation in the tobacco crop, meat production, and irrigation, an appropriation of five thousand dollars ($5,000.00) is hereby provided for and made.

"Sec. 6. The Comptroller be and he is hereby authorized to issue his warrant upon the treasury of the state for the several sums hereby appropriated, the same to be paid out of any funds not otherwise appropriated; that said sums of money shall be payable to the Maryland Agricultural College, and shall be expended under the direction of the board of trustees of said institution, and the first payment shall be made during the fiscal year ending September 1, 1902."

By Acts 1904, p. 951, c. 557, § 4, it was provided as follows: "That the sum of six thousand dollars per annum be and the same is hereby appropriated for the formation and support of farmers' institutes in this state; and that the Comptroller be and he is hereby authorized to issue his warrant annually upon the treasury of the state for said sum of money out of any funds not otherwise appropriated; that the said sum shall be payable to the order of the Maryland Agricultural College on, or after the 1st of October of each fiscal year, and that the first yearly payment shall be made during the fiscal year ending September 30, 1904."

It is admitted that the work contemplated to be done by the college by Acts 1902, p. 912, c. 625, § 5, has been done by its officers, but the appropriation therein made has not been paid. It is also admitted that $2,000 of the appropriation of $6,000 made by Acts 1904, p. 950, c. 557, remains unpaid. It is further admitted that said sum of $5,000 and said sum of $2,000, appropriated by the acts aforesaid, are in the treasury of the state, and not appropriated for any other purpose. On July 17, 1905, demand was made by the Maryland Agricultural College upon Hon. Gordon T. Atkinson, Comptroller of the Treasury, for the payment of said several sums of money. Upon the advice of the Attorney General, the Comptroller declined to pay the money, whereupon the petition for mandamus was filed. The respondent, instead of answering the petition, filed a general demurrer, which the court sustained, and dismissed the petition. By agreement of parties, all errors in pleading have been waived. The Comptroller rested his refusal to pay these sums upon the ground that neither of these sums, or any part thereof, could be lawfully drawn from the state treasury after the expiration of the fiscal year for which they were appropriated, and, as it appeared that these sums were not paid during the fiscal year for which the appropriation was made, there was no warrant of law by which they could now be paid. This contention raises the question of the proper construction of the acts of assembly hereinbefore mentioned under which the appropriations were made. If the position of the respondent is not well founded, and if the allegations of the petition could be supported by evidence, it must be admitted that the writ of mandamus should issue as prayed. Upon a question of statutory construction the principles which should guide the court have been repeatedly declared by decisions in this state, and elsewhere. The underlying principle of all construction is that the intent of the Legislature should be sought in the words employed to express it, and when found it should be made to govern, not only in all proceedings which are had under the law, but in all judicial controversies which bring those proceedings under review. Beyond the words employed, if the meaning be plain and intelligible, neither officer nor court is to go in search of legislative intent; but the Legislature must be understood to intend what is plainly expressed, and nothing then remains but to give the intent effect. If the words of the law seem to be of doubtful import, it may then, perhaps, become necessary to look beyond them in order to ascertain what was the legislative mind at the time the law was enacted; what the circumstances were under which the action was taken; what evil, if any, was meant to be redressed; what was the leading object of the law, and what the subordinate and relatively unimportant objects. Cooley on Taxation (2d Ed.) 264; Gill v. Cacy, 49 Md. 243; Smith v. State, 66 Md. 215, 7 Atl. 49; Hooper v. Creager, 84 Md. 195, 35 Atl. 967, 36 Atl. 359, 35 L. R. A. 202; Commercial Building Ass'n v. Mackenzie, 85 Md. 132, 86 Atl. 754.

There is no general law which declares that money not drawn in the fiscal year for which it has been appropriated cannot be drawn thereafter; but it is argued that it was the intention of the Legislature that these appropriations should fail, unless drawn during the time mentioned in the acts. It was undoubtedly within the power of the General Assembly to have provided that the money should not be paid after the expiration of the fiscal year. That it did not so declare in express or unquestionable terms must be conceded, but it is contended that this intention is manifest: First, because the appropriations were annual; and, secondly, because the first payments were directed to be made during the fiscal years named. It is to be noted that there is no duty imposed by either act upon the Maryland Agricultural College to make application for the payment of the appropriations within a specified time, but the authority is given to the Comptroller to draw his warrant upon the Treasurer for the payment of the several sums appropriated to the order of the college, and he is directed to draw his warrant for the first payment during the fiscal years named. This direction, given in express terms in the act, was not followed, and it is difficult to say how the failure to pay the money in the manner and at the times provided should operate to defeat the plain and evident intent of the Legislature respecting these appropriations. It is clear that the Legislature intended that the college should receive each year from the state treasury, out of any funds not otherwise appropriated, the several sums mentioned for the purposes specified in the act, and it indicated the time in which it became the duty of the financial officers of the state to see to the payment. To construe these directions as to the time of payment to be a limitation or a denial of the power to pay after the close of the fiscal year would be to frustrate the leading and evident purpose of the acts under consideration, as manifested by their language, and as gathered from the foundation, the history, and the relation and settled policy of the state respecting this college.

We are therefore of opinion that the court committed an error in dismissing the petition. The order of the lower court will be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

Order reversed, and cause remanded, with costs to the appellant.

MYLANDER v. BEIMSCHLA.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 11, 1906.)

1. APPEAL — REVIEW — INSTRUCTIONS — NECESSITY FOR OBJECTION AT TRIAL.

By the express provisions of Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 5, § 9, no instruction given is deemed defective on appeal, because of any assumption of fact, or because of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain it, unless the record shows that an objection for such defect was taken at the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 2, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 1309, 1313.]

2. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS REFUSED.

The statute does not apply to a rejected instruction.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT—REPAIRS—LANDLORD'S DUTY TO REPAIR.

A landlord is not obliged to make repairs during a tenancy, unless he has agreed to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, § 536.]

4. SAME—NEGLIGENCE AS TO PREMISES AFFECTING ADJOINING PREMISES—ACTION—INSTRUCTION.

In an action for defendant's negligence in permitting a rain spout to remain in such a condition as to throw water against plaintiff's building, the evidence showed that at the time when the conditions complained of first existed defendant's building was rented, and that defendant had not covenanted to make repairs, but that subsequently the building was rented to another and that at that time the defects existed. One of plaintiff's instructions on the measure of damages declared that in case of a verdict for plaintiff she was entitled to recover "for the injuries according to the evidence in the case." Held, that the prayer was erroneous, as not limiting recovery to the damages sustained after the termination of the first tenancy.

5. SAME—TENANT'S FAILURE TO REPAIR—INJURIES TO ADJOINING PROPERTY—LIABILITY OF LANDLORD.

Where, after the creation of a tenancy, a rain spout on the building became defective, and cast water upon an adjoining building, the landlord was not liable for the damage, where he had not covenanted to make repairs.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, § 670.]

Appeal from Baltimore City Court; John J. Dobler, Judge.

Action by Catharine Beimschla against Mary Mylander. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

William S. Bransmer, for appellant. Edward L. Ward, for appellee.

BOYD, J. The appellee sued the appellant for "negligently permitting the waste and rain water from her property to be thrown against and upon the north wall of the plaintiff," thereby causing the injury set out in the declaration. The appellee relied especially upon the ground that the appellant had permitted the rain spout, which was supposed to carry the water from the roof of her house, to become and remain in such condition that it turned the water upon the house of the appellee, injuring the wall and foundation, and causing the cellar to be damp and unhealthy. The appellant's defense was based mainly upon the fact that her house had been occupied by tenants during the time the damage was alleged to have been sustained, and claimed that the property was in proper repair when she rented it. A verdict was rendered against her, and she appealed from the judgment entered thereon. Exceptions were taken to the granting of the first, second, and fourth prayers of the plaintiff and to the rejection of the first, second, and fifth of the defendant. The bill of exceptions containing the rulings on those prayers present the only questions for review by us, as the exception to the refusal to grant two prayers offered at the conclusion of the plaintiff's case was waived by the defendant proceeding with her testimony.

There was legally sufficient evidence tending to prove that the plaintiff's house was injured by reason of the condition of the rain spout of the defendant and the way the yard of the latter was graded, turning the water from the spout against the plaintiff's house. The "shoe" or elbow at the bottom of the spout was off. There was some testimony that this condition of the plaintiff's property had existed for four or five years, but the plaintiff did not ascertain the cause of the injury for some time after it was first noticed. The evidence shows that Charles E. Smith & Co. rented the house of the appellant on October 16, 1899, at $20 per month. W. F. Mylander, a son of the appellant, testified that it was then rented by the year. In the fall of 1902 A. G. Fiedler bought the business of Charles E. Smith & Co., who were florists, and with the consent of the appellant took possession of the property and became her tenant. He testified distinctly that he was a monthly tenant and that the appellant accepted him as such. W. F. Mylander said "they consider Fiedler is a yearly tenant and not a monthly tenant;" but, however that may be, there is evidence tending to show that a new tenancy was created with Fiedler. Charles E. Smith & Co. had no written lease, and the term seems to have been an indefinite one, although Mr. Mylander said they rented by the year. But Fiedler and the appellant entered into an arrangement by which he was accepted as the tenant, and after that paid the rent monthly in advance, as Smith & Co. had done, and the exact terms of his tenancy are not material under the view we take of the case.

The plaintiff's first prayer instructed the jury that if they found that at the time of renting to Fiedler the down spout and gutter was in such improper and neglected condition as to be a nuisance, or were in such condition that they would in the nature of things become so by their user, and the defendant received the rent from Fiedler, then the defendant was liable, if the jury believed the plaintiff's property was damaged by virtue of such condition and as a direct consequence thereof. The evidence is not very clear about the actual condition of the down spout and gutter when Fiedler became tenant, but there was some evidence reflecting on it, and at any rate there was no special exception to the prayer for the assumption of any fact or the want of evidence. Section 9, art. 5, Code Pub. Gen. Laws, provides that "no instruction actually given shall be deemed to be defective by reason of any assumption therein of any fact by the said court, * * * unless it appear from the record that an objection thereto for such defect was taken at the trial; nor shall any question arise in the Court of Appeals as to the insufficiency of evidence to support any instruction actually granted, unless it appear that such question was distinctly made to and decided by the court below." The defendant's second prayer did ask the court to instruct the jury that as the defective condition of the rain spout and yard in the defendant's premises is only shown to have existed during a period when said premises were in the possession of one Fiedler, a tenant of the defendant, and as the said defective condition is not shown to have existed when possession of said premises was delivered to Fiedler, the plaintiff has not made out her case, and the verdict must be for the defendant. There was some evidence tending to show that such condition did exist four or five years before the trial (April, 1905), which was before Fiedler became tenant, and the prayer was therefore properly rejected. The statute just quoted does not apply to rejected prayers, and hence the assumption of a fact would make it defective. The plaintiff's first prayer was properly granted. Her second was very much to the same effect as the first, being somewhat fuller in the statement of questions submitted, and it will not be necessary to now say anything further about that.

The plaintiff's fourth prayer was on the measure of damages, and was, under the circumstances of this case, calculated to mislead the jury. It was as follows: "That if the jury find a verdict for the plaintiff under the instructions of the court, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover such damages as will fairly compensate her for the injuries to her property according to the evidence in this case, provided the jury believe the plaintiff has sustained such injury by reason and as direct consequence of the improper and neglected condition of the down spout and gutter in the defendant's yard." Under the evidence some of the injuries complained of were sustained before Fiedler became tenant, while Charles E. Smith & Co. were tenants. The rule of law in this state is that the landlord is not obliged to make repairs during the tenancy, unless he has agreed to do so, and "the common law has always thrown the burden of repairs upon the tenant, though it imposes no obligation on him to make them unless he covenants to do so." Gluck's Case, 81 Md. 326, 32 Atl. 515, 48 Am. St. Rep. 515. Of course, it may become necessary for the tenant to make the repairs for his own protection, as he is not relieved of paying the rent unless his landlord has agreed to make the repairs and the property has become untenable by reason of his failure or neglect to do so. Under those circumstances one of the tenant's remedies is to abandon the property and thereby relieve himself for liability for rent. In Gluck's Case, as there was no agreement on the part of the landlord to keep the property in repair and the tenant was consequently still liable for rent, the latter was bound to repair for his own protection, and hence we held he was entitled to recover as part of his damages (in the opening of a street by the city of Baltimore) the sum required to rebuild a front wall taken in the condemnation proceedings, and to restore an elevator which had to be removed. In this case neither the appellant nor the appellee nor Smith & Co. agreed to make repairs during the tenancy of either.

The uncontradicted evidence is that, when Charles E. Smith & Co. took the property, the appellant made some little repairs before turning it over to them, and her son testified "that in looking over the building he examined also the yard, and found everything in good shape, and there was a shoe on the rain spout in 1899, when witness was there looking [over] the property; that since that time witness' mother, the defendant, has never had possession of that property." Another witness, who was a carpenter, testified that he made improvements on the property for the appellant in 1895; that he had the yard graded; "that the yard was not paved until Mrs. Mylander got it, excepting that part against that wall had been; and that when Mrs. Mylander put the yard in condition she put a brand-new rain spout from top to bottom, with a shoe on the end of it, next to the plaintiff's house on her wall." There is no contradiction of the evidence of those witnesses as to the condition of the property at the times named by them. There is no evidence that the appellant had any notice of the down spout and gutter being out of repair while Charles E. Smith & Co. were occupying the property as tenants, and, of course, under the circumstances we have related, the appellant would not be responsible for damages by reason of the defective condition of the spout and gutter during the tenancy of that firm. The only theory upon which she could be held liable at all was that when she rented the property to a new tenant it was her duty to see that it was then in such condition as would, or was likely to, injure third persons. The plaintiff's first and second prayers are based on that theory, and the defendant's fourth prayer, which was granted by the court, not only recognized that to be the law on that subject, but went further than the defendant had a right to ask, as it altogether ignored the change of tenants.

This fourth prayer did not limit the damages to injuries to the property from the time that Fiedler became tenant, but the jury might very well have understood that they could allow the plaintiff damages for all injury sustained by reason of the defective condition of the spout and gutter, regardless of the time when it occurred. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the injuries commenced before Fiedler became tenant, and, indeed, both of her prayers are based on the theory that the conditions complained of then existed. The plaintiff's witnesses who testified as to the amount of damages to the property did not, and probably could not, say what part of the damages were caused before, and what after, Fiedler became tenant, and yet the plaintiff could not recover for damages sustained while Charles E. Smith & Co. were tenants, under the circumstances detailed in this record. The plaintiff's second prayer concluded by submitting to the jury to find "that by virtue of said condition [referring to that of the down spout and gutter], and as a direct consequence thereof, the plaintiff's property was flooded with water prior to 1902, and since 1902, and damages according to the evidence, if they so find, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action from the defendant." It is very questionable whether that may not have been misleading; but as we suppose the reference to the flooding prior to 1902 was intended to reflect upon the condition when Fiedler got possession, and the prayer only concludes that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, without stating for what, we did not hold that prayer bad. But, when we come to the fourth, that expression in the second undoubtedly might help to mislead the jury. So, taking all these matters into consideration, we are constrained to hold that there was error in granting the fourth prayer, because it did not limit the recovery to damages sustained after Fiedler became tenant, and is very misleading.

The defendant's first prayer was properly rejected, as there was legally sufficient evidence entitling the plaintiff to recover something. What we said about the second in another connection is sufficient, and we will not further refer to that. The fifth was manifestly erroneous, as it entirely ignored the condition of the down spout, gutter, etc., at the time Fiedler rented the property.

It follows that the judgment must be reversed for the error in granting the fourth prayer.

Judgment reversed, and new trial awarded; the appellee to pay the costs.

PRICE v. MUTUAL RESERVE LIFE INS. CO.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 9, 1906.)

1. INSURANCE—LIFE POLICY—BREACH OF CONTRACT—RIGHTS OF BENEFICIARY.

A beneficiary under a life policy has no right of action for damages resulting from the making by the insurance company of illegal assessments on insured, its failure to set apart a reserve fund, or to place insured in a particular class, etc.; the beneficiary being entitled only to what can be realized under the policy.

2. SAME—ACTION—DEFENSES—FORFEITURE—CANCELLATION.

Where an insured, with knowledge of all the facts, refused to pay assessments then due to the insurance company, and directed the company to cancel the policy, in consequence whereof the same was abandoned, the beneficiary named in the policy had no claim thereunder.

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—PLEA—FRAUD—SUFFICIENCY.

Where, in an action on a life policy, defendant set up that with full knowledge of all the facts insured voluntarily elected to discontinue payment of assessments and dues and suffered the policy to lapse, and that for four years insured, with full knowledge of cancellation by the company in the premises, assented thereto, well knowing that the policy had lapsed and become void, a replication to a plea of limitation to the effect that by the fraudulent conduct of defendant plaintiff's right of action was not discovered until less than three years before suit, was insufficient for failing to allege that the fraud was not discovered and could not have been discovered with ordinary diligence within three years before suit.

Appeal from Superior Court of Baltimore City.

Action by Eldridge C. Price against the Mutual Reserve Life Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, PAGE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

J. Kemp Bartlett, for appellant. John Prentiss Poe, for appellee.

PAGE, J. The questions in this case arise upon demurrers to the several pleadings. The narr. contains 13 counts, the first 4 being the ordinary money counts, the other 9 are special counts. The fifth count alleges that the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association, now known as the Mutual Reserve Life Insurance Company, in December, 1882, insured the life of Elias C. Price, deceased, father of the appellant, for the benefit of the plain tiff, and that the said appellee failed to carry out its contract with the said Elias; that the said Elias has since died, and by his last will and testament the appellant is the sole legatee of his estate; that the said insurance company failed to comply with its said contract of insurance, in that it did the things and omitted to do the things mentioned in the narr., as particularly mentioned in the fifth to the thirteenth counts inclusive. To this narr. the appellee filed 19 pleas, wherein he pleaded by the first plea limitations, by the second and third the general issue, by several pleas, from the fourth to the eighteenth, inclusive, special traverses, of the several breaches set out in the narr., and by the nineteenth plea "that with full knowledge of all the actings and doings of the defendant on the policy of insurance, and without any concealment or misrepresentations on its part, the said Elias Price voluntarily elected to discontinue payment on the mortuary assessments and dues, levied and assessed by the defendant, and thereby voluntarily suffered the said policy to lapse, whereby all the rights and claims of the said Elias Price wholly ceased and determined according to the express terms of said policy; and that said Elias Price, with full knowledge of all the acts and doings of the said insurance company, for more than four years fully acquiesced in and assented to all said doings, and well knew that said policy had lapsed and become null and void, wherefore it is further alleged that the said policy was canceled and terminated during the lifetime of the said Elias, and was acquiesced in by the said life association. The appellant, by his replication to the defendant's first plea, set up to the plea of limitations as follows: That by the false and fraudulent conduct and deceit of the defendant, his right of action was not discovered until within a period of less than three years prior to the bringing of this suit. He joined issue upon all the other pleas, except upon the nineteenth plea, to which he demurred. To this replication the defendant rejoined, setting up to the plea of limitations, first, that the defendant was not guilty of fraudulent conduct and deceit in relation to the policy, and that the said Price, with full knowledge of all the doings and acts of the said insurance company in reference to the said policy, had voluntarily refused to pay the assessment and had directed the company to cancel the policy, and, further, that said Elias lived for more than four years thereafter, and that the said Elias, as well as the appellant, did know of said alleged causes of action, and that the appellant could have discovered by the use of ordinary diligence the alleged causes of action, four years next preceding the institution of this suit. The appellant demurred to the second, third, and fourth rejoinders, and joined issue as to the fifth, whereupon the court sustained the demurrer as to the narr., overruled the rejoinders to the plea of limitations, and on the 19th of July, 1905, on motion of appellees, rendered judgment in their favor, and from this the appellant has appealed.

Without further particularity in stating the voluminous pleadings in the case, it is apparent that the real questions involved are whether or not a legal cause of action is stated in the narr., and also whether the plea of limitations was properly pleaded, and, if so, whether the facts set out in the rejoinders thereto were legally effective to constitute a bar. Stripped of its verbiage, the ground of the plaintiff's right of recovery appears to be that the appellant, the son and sole legatee of Elias C. Price, bases his right to sue upon the facts that Elias in his lifetime entered into a contract with the appellee, and that the appellee failed to observe the obligations resting upon it by the terms of said contract in the several particulars specially set out in the narr., notwithstanding the fact that in the lifetime of Elias the contract was by agreement between the said Elias and the company canceled. The appellant claims this right to sue, not because, under and by virtue of the contract itself, he has any such right, but solely because he was named as the beneficiary therein. It was laid down in Selgman v. Hoffacker, 57 Md. 321, and it seems to be well established, that "in a matter of simple contract a promise to one for the benefit of another may be enforced by the person for whose benefit the promise was made; but, 'unless the promisee has some beneficial interest himself, he cannot maintain the suit.'" It does not appear whether the policy mentioned in the narr. was under seal or not. Assuming, however, that it was not under seal, the only averments showing the interest of the appellant are that he was named therein as the beneficiary, and also that he was the sole legatee of his father. If he claims as beneficiary, he can claim only as entitled to the fruits of the contract; but as beneficiary he cannot claim for wrongs inflicted by the company upon Elias Price, for the reason that he can claim by the terms of the contract only what can be realized therefrom. Here the injuries alleged are that the insurance company made illegal assessments upon Elias Price, failed to set apart a reserve fund, and did not place him in a particular class, etc., and unfairly and fraudulently took from him a large sum of money. These and the other matters set out in the declarations as breaches of the contract are matters for which the contract of insurance furnishes the appellant no ground of complaint as beneficiary. They are damages to Elias Price, which, when recovered, would inure to the estate of the deceased. An ordinary insurance upon the life of an individual is a contract by which the insurer, for a consideration, engages to pay a sum specified to the beneficiary according to the terms of the policy, if the person who is insured shall die within the period limited by the policy. 19 Enc. of L. & Eq. 42, tit.

"Life Insurance." The interest of the appellant being that of a beneficiary, he had no interest in the policy further than that he could claim as beneficiary, and therefore no right to sue for the breach of the contract with Elias Price. If the breaches set out in the narr. can be recovered at all (and of this we are not to be understood as expressing any opinion), the personal representatives of Elias Price are the proper parties to sue. But, apart from this, the appellee by his nineteenth plea alleges that about April, 1898, Elias Price, with full knowledge of the actions of the defendant in relation to the said policy, "voluntarily elected to discontinue payment on the mortuary assessments and dues lawfully levied and assessed and suffered the said policy to lapse," and directed the policy to be canceled, and the same was canceled, and for more than four years acquiesced in the cancellation of the policy and in the doings and acts of the defendant and well knew that said policy had lapsed, etc., according to the express terms and conditions of the policy. The demurrer admits these facts, which are set out in the pleadings; and, further, by the second rejoinder to the said replication, it is alleged, that Price, with full knowledge of all the facts, failed and refused to pay the assessments then due, and directed the defendant to cancel the policy, and that in consequence thereof the policy was abandoned, etc. These facts are conclusive against any claim under the policy. Mutual L. I. Co. v. Sears, 178 U. S. 345, 20 Sup. Ct. 912, 44 L. Ed. 1096; Ryan v. Mutual Reserve Ins. Co. (C. C.) 96 Fed. 796; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Phinney, 178 U. S. 327, 20 Sup. Ct. 906, 44 L. Ed. 1088.

The plea of limitations was set up by the appellee's first plea. It applied to all the counts in the narr. To this the replication was "that by the false and fraudulent conduct and deceit of the defendant his right of action was not discovered until within a period of less than three years prior to the bringing of this suit." This replication was insufficient, in that it is not alleged that the fraud was not discovered and could not have been discovered with ordinary diligence within a period of three years prior to the bringing of the suit. Wear v. Skinner, 46 Md. 269, 24 Am. Rep. 517. Apart from this, upon the facts alleged in the appellee's rejoinder, the appellant was not kept in ignorance of his alleged cause of action by the fraud of the defendant, and could have discovered it within three years by ordinary diligence. Inasmuch as the plea of limitations as set out by the appellee's plea went to the whole declaration, including the four first counts, the court committed no error in sustaining the demurrer to the declaration and the plea of limitations. The appellant not having asked leave to plead over, the appellee, on motion, was entitled to judgment on the pleadings.

Judgment affirmed.

JACOB TOME INSTITUTE v. SHIPLEY et al.

SHIPLEY et al. v. SAME.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 11, 1906.)

1. TRUSTS—CONSTRUCTION—ADVANCEMENTS.

Where a grantor by a deed of trust provided that at her death each of her children should receive a share of her estate, and in general terms made any advancements by herself or her husband to each child a charge on his share, and also made an advancement by one child to another a charge on the share of the latter, the specific advancement referred to had no priority over other advancements as a charge against the interest of the child to whom they were advanced.

2. SAME.

Where a grantor by a deed of trust provided that at her death, one-fourth of her estate should go to each of three children and the other one-fourth should go to the trustee for the benefit of the fourth child during his life and at his death to his children free of the trust, and the deed of trust made advancements to each child a charge on his share, advancements to the fourth child were a charge only on his equitable life estate, and not on the share of his children.
